"We've lost a lot of manufacturing jobs and we can't replace them," says DiCaro. While it's hard to blame the state's high energy costs alone, he says, "we know that . . . energy is one of the largest portions of a manufacturer's operating budget."

But for those homeowners and businesses staying in California, the high prices have provided a big incentive for greater efficiency.

Laura Scher, chief executive of Working Assets, a wireless, long distance and credit card company that donates part of its revenue to socially progressive organizations, said she checked her home's meter every week during the electricity crisis in the summer of 2001 and unplugged her family's second refrigerator. "Part of it is our prices got really high," she said. But she added that California's habits go back much further. "It's sort of a culture to be an energy conserver here," she said.

The Future Of Farming (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Six months ago, it was an even bet whether there would be a new farm bill in 2007. The big commodity farmers, and the interest groups that represent them, were hoping that Congress would simply extend the 2002 Farm Bill, a regressive grab bag for big agriculture. These hopes have now been disappointed. Mike Johanns, the secretary of agriculture, has unveiled his proposals for a new farm bill, which on the whole seems remarkably promising.

Mr. Johanns seems to have little desire to protect entrenched subsidies and a very strong desire to improve the environment. The question is whether Congress will listen to him or to the lobbyists.

The problems with the current farm subsidy system are legion. At home, it drives small farmers out of business and compromises the environment. Abroad, it penalizes third-world farmers and jeopardizes international trade talks.

Mr. Johanns aims to change much of that, first by ending payments to farmers with an adjusted gross income above $200,000. There will also be money for small farmers and growers of specialty crops, loans and grants to poor rural communities and help for young farmers who want to get started in an industry that has grown gray with age.

The bill also calls for $7.8 billion over 10 years to help protect the environment — which makes it the most generous conservation program the Bush administration has offered in the last six years. The bill would make it easier for farmers to enroll in conservation programs and protect conservation acreage from the urge to plow it up when prices skyrocket. The bill could also turn out to be one of the administration's more innovative energy initiatives. Implicitly recognizing that corn ethanol needs no more subsidies, it offers incentives to grow grasses that could be turned into another fuel called cellulosic ethanol.

There is much to applaud in this bill. Then again, there was much to like about the last farm bill, and we know what happened to that. Congress left many of the old subsidies intact, and failed to nourish the conservation programs. We are hoping the new Congress will have the good sense to reverse the policies that have done so much damage to rural America, and in doing so offer hope to its small farmers.

Stronger CAFE (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0134115

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Competing bills to increase auto fuel standards are gaining traction, although some are better than others.

REPUBLICAN SEN. Ted Stevens' resistance to fighting climate change is melting faster than his home state's glaciers. The senior senator from Alaska proposed a bill last month aimed at raising automotive fuel economy standards, in some ways higher than a competing bill backed by such traditional environmentalists as Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.)

Stevens' about-face on fuel economy (he voted against a bill two years ago similar to the one he just introduced) is welcome, even if many of his proposal's details aren't. Across-the-aisle initiatives like his are part of the reason this Congress stands a good chance of making the most meaningful improvements to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards since they were created during the last fuel crisis in the 1970s.

There are several competing fuel economy packages percolating in Congress. Stevens' bill is the least helpful; it calls for a 40 miles per gallon minimum for all passenger cars by 2017 — higher even than the plan by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) — but it doesn't apply to pickups and SUVs, which are most in need of improvement. It also overreaches by creating a sweeping national trading system for greenhouse gas emissions.

Feinstein's bill, backed by Boxer, calls for automakers' entire fleets to average 35 mpg by 2019 (the current standard is 27.5 mpg for cars, 22.2 for pickups and SUVs, based on the averages of each vehicle sold). Feinstein's bill would do away with the separate light truck standard, which no longer makes sense. Pickups and SUVs were given a pass in the 1970s because at the time they were mostly commercial vehicles and relatively scarce; now that SUVs are commonplace passenger vehicles, there's no reason to give them special breaks.

Improving fuel economy would both reduce the carbon emissions that are warming the globe and lessen U.S. reliance on foreign oil. But would it prove financially unfeasible for Detroit? That's hard to predict, though a University of Michigan study last fall argued that improving fuel economy would actually boost automakers' financial health.

Such conclusions are highly speculative, but it doesn't take a PhD to see that Japanese automakers are growing U.S. market share while their American competitors shrink, at least partly because Japanese cars get better mileage. Japanese automakers would suffer less than Detroit because their lineups already tend not to be as heavily focused on gas guzzlers.

Of the bills on the table, Feinstein's looks to be the most sensible. But any of them would be better than the toothless mandate proposed last month by President Bush in his State of the Union address. Congress is giving Bush's CAFE proposals the attention they deserve: none at all.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI: No Role In Staging March (ORS)

By Henry Pierson Curtis, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, February 17, 2007

But use of informant at neo-Nazi rally doesn't surprise some

The FBI played no role in staging a neo-Nazi rally last year in Orlando, a statement released Friday says.

Questions about the bureau's possible involvement were raised earlier this week when a hearing in federal court disclosed that a paid FBI informant and member of the National Socialist Movement organized the white supremacist march.

"In no way did the FBI initiate, organize, or sponsor the NSM rally," the statement from the agency's Orlando office says.

The Orlando march, through a predominantly black neighborhood last February, came just months after neo-Nazi marches in Toledo, Ohio, erupted into violence.

The identity of the informant and march organizer, David Gletty of Orlando, came out in a hearing Wednesday concerning the arrests of two white supremacists charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

The suspects were arrested by the FBI with the help of Gletty, 39, who wore a recording device when he agreed to help John Rock, 35, and Tom Martin, 23, impersonate police officers in a scheme to rob black drug dealers, according to testimony.

Rock and Martin remain held without bail in the Seminole County Jail.

DOJ_NMG_0134116

Word that there was an FBI informant at the Orlando march came as no surprise to neo-Nazis, the ACLU or anyone involved with law enforcement.

Many agencies use informants, and in its statement Friday, the FBI explained some of the benefits.

"By the nature of its investigative mission, the FBI . . . must aggressively pursue intelligence avenues that bring it into contact with individuals and/or organizations in unsavory and/or illegal activity," the statement says.

In fact, snitches are so common in the underworld and fringe political movements that almost everyone is suspect.

"If someone starts talking about building bombs, we know right away they're a government agent or an idiot. We don't want either," said Jeff Schoep, head of the National Socialist Movement, in a telephone call from headquarters in Minneapolis. "We have a strict policy with our members to remain 100 percent legal."

Glen Katron, a spokesman for the American Civil Liberties Union's Orlando office, said it would have objected to the FBI's involvement only had the agency tried to restrict the marchers' constitutional rights.

Quite simply, observers say, the world of cops and robbers revolves around often dangerous characters willing to sell out their friends, family and enemies.

"It's kind of a delicate balance," said Boston College Law School Professor Robert M. Bloom. "How much do you allow an informant to do certain things?"

Law enforcement agencies often help informants avoid jail time on minor or nonviolent crimes in return for making cases against more dangerous criminals, Bloom said.

That type of arrangement came out in federal court Wednesday when an FBI agent detailed the bureau's work with its informant, who a defense lawyer identified as Gletty.

FBI Agent Kevin Farrington and Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Bodnar did not name their informant during that hearing.

But without naming him, Farrington testified under cross-examination that Gletty had been picked up in Alabama last year on a charge of impersonating a police officer. That charge was dropped after Alabama authorities contacted the FBI, even though the FBI did not request special treatment, Farrington said.

Gletty could not be reached for comment Friday.

The FBI has a long history of using informants and occasionally getting burned by them.

One of the most notorious examples was James "Whitey" Bulger, still on the 10 Most-Wanted List in connection with 18 murders alleged to have been committed while Bulger was working as an FBI informant in Boston.

"The costs outweighed the benefits," in that case, Bloom said.

Law enforcement agencies in Orange County spend more than $100,000 a year to buy information, primarily in drug cases, according to interviews Friday.

"All the good stories you get about busts going down are based on informants," said Bill Lutz, head of the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, which has used 1,100 informants since 1978.

"Here's the problem: As one of our lawyers once said, 'In order to catch fish you've got to use stinky bait.' They're the bait that allows us to catch the bigger fish."

Legal Sideshow, Not Home Run Hoopla, Follows Bonds (NYT)

By Murray Chass

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

When Babe Ruth broke Roger Connor's career home run record, no one paid much attention. Connor had hit 138 home runs in the 1880s and 1890s, and Ruth passed him in 1921 with little or no fanfare. Much was made of Henry Aaron eclipsing Ruth's record in 1974, but even then probably the most notable thing that happened was that Aaron shoved a box of strawberries in a reporter's face.

But Barry Bonds's threat to Aaron's record of 755 couldn't generate more of a sideshow.

Bonds's pursuit of the record — he needs 22 home runs to break it — is entwined with the issue of steroids. Did he or did he not use them to slug 213 home runs in a four-season span from 2000 through 2003? Or did he just use a good grade of flaxseed oil?

One act of the sideshow was written out of the script when Bonds signed his $15.8 million contract for the 2007 season the other day, 10 weeks after he and the Giants agreed to its terms and two weeks after he first signed it.

A second version of the contract became necessary when the commissioner's office struck an appearance clause from the original version. Bonds became upset by another clause in the contract after it leaked out. That clause says the Giants can void the contract if Bonds is indicted.

Any indictment would be put together by the United States attorney's office in San Francisco, which has a new interim head, Scott N. Schools, who replaced Kevin V. Ryan. Schools is a career federal prosecutor who previously served as a general counsel in the Justice Department. For now, he will run a San Francisco office that was apparently divided last summer over whether to push right then and there for an indictment of Bonds.

The term of the federal grand jury that was meeting at that point was about to expire, and lawyers involved in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid-distribution case say there was a split among assistant United States attorneys about seeking an indictment before that jury was dismissed. The lawyers said their understanding was that Ryan decided not to go forward.

Luke Macaulay, the spokesman for the San Francisco office, said Ryan would not comment. Jeffrey Nedrow and Matthew Parrella, assistant United States attorneys in that office who have been involved in the Balco case, declined to comment on the issue of division in the office. Attempts to interview Schools through requests submitted to the public affairs office of the Justice Department and to Macaulay were unsuccessful.

But a federal law enforcement official with knowledge of the San Francisco office, who was not authorized to speak publicly on the matter, did not dispute the notion that an indictment was debated last summer. In addition, Major League Baseball officials said they were told there was at least some sentiment within Ryan's staff to indict Bonds, but that Ryan was not ready to do so.

Michael Rains, a lawyer for Bonds, said he was given the same information.

"It was Ryan who had to pull back," Rains said, "because they didn't have the evidence and they made the decision to try and get additional evidence from Greg Anderson."

Anderson, Bonds's former trainer, has been jailed three times in connection with the Balco case. He served three months after pleading guilty to steroids distribution, and he is now in his second prison term for refusing to testify before grand juries seeking to determine if Bonds lied under oath about steroids use.

Anderson served 57 days on a civil-contempt charge last year and has been in prison for three months, since last Nov. 20, on another contempt charge. This sentence could run for another year, until the term of the current grand jury expires.

Based on Anderson's continued incarceration, the perception is that Ryan felt Anderson's testimony was essential to building a solid case that Bonds perjured himself before the initial grand jury.

Ryan, however, is gone, and it's not known how Schools will view the case.

Will he find that the case against Bonds is strong enough to proceed without Anderson? Will he keep Anderson in jail, hoping he will end his silence? Or will he abandon any effort to indict Bonds?

Asked how the office might proceed, Parrella said: "Without addressing the issue of whether there's a case or a grand jury investigation, typically the new U. S. attorney is the person who ultimately makes decisions on cases."

Mark Geragos, Anderson's lawyer, offered his own idea.

"Any reasonable, rational person at this point would realize that Greg Anderson isn't going to talk," Geragos said in a telephone interview. "Keeping him in there is punitive. They should take a page from the administration letting Ryan go. They should let Greg go."

Bonds also faces possible charges of money laundering, income-tax evasion and violation of banking laws, but Rains said: "This has never had the footprints of a tax case. This has always been about trying to nail Barry for perjury."

Anderson's willingness to remain in jail has prompted speculation that Bonds will take care of him financially. "There's no truth to that," said Geragos, adding that anyone who said that would be accusing Bonds of obstruction of justice.

The grand jury that is sitting in San Francisco, with its term expected to end next February, is the third in the Balco/Bonds investigation. The Bonds indictment debate would have come toward the end of the second grand jury's term last July.

A debate on whether to indict is not uncommon in a United States attorney's office, said Jerry Johnson, who as the United States attorney in Pittsburgh prosecuted the baseball cocaine cases in 1985.

"That kind of thing happens in U. S. attorneys' offices," he said in a telephone interview earlier this week. Then he explained the philosophy of the man in charge: "My name is on the door, and I will make the final decision. Whether it's declining or going forward on a case, if the U. S. attorney isn't making the final decision, that person wouldn't be doing his job. It's the U. S. attorney's decision, no one else's."

Johnson added, "Oftentimes, it takes as much or more courage to decline a case as it does to bring an indictment."

IMMIGRATION:

Support Swells For Agents Who Shot Drug Smuggler (WP)

By Darryl Fears, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Conservatives Lead Movement to Free Ex-Border Patrolmen

Early this week, the Bush administration urged angry conservatives to remain calm over the convictions of two former Border Patrol agents who shot an unarmed Mexican drug smuggler, but petitions for their release continued to flood the White House.

It did not help that one the lawmen, Ignacio Ramos, was attacked by Latino gang members in his cell at the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi and beaten bloody. Days after prison officials confirmed the beating on Feb. 8, Department of Homeland Security officials admitted that an inspector general's report erroneously quoted Border Patrol agents as saying Ramos and his partner, Jose Compean, intended to kill Mexicans.

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), founder of the House Immigration Reform Caucus and a presidential candidate, visited Ramos in prison and told him of the movement against his incarceration, including candlelight vigils, rallies, and a storm of criticism on conservative talk radio and television. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) threatened to call for impeachment proceedings against President Bush if the agents were harmed in prison, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) promised to look into the matter.

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said that the 700 people who will attend the organization's annual convention in Washington on Feb. 25 will "speak with one voice" against the prosecution and conviction of the agents. The union, which represents Border Patrol agents and other federal workers, implored Bush in a letter this month to pardon Ramos and Compean.

"We think this thing has been mishandled from the start," Gage said. "We're meeting . . . with the head of the Bureau of Prisons. I'm going to raise some hell there to find out why these guys are in that particular institution."

According to a report by the DHS inspector general's office, the incident that landed the agents in trouble started on Feb. 17, 2005, when Asvaldo Aldrete-Davila, an admitted Mexican drug smuggler, drove across the border into Texas with 740 pounds of marijuana. He saw Border Patrol agents trailing him, panicked, and drove into a ditch.

During the chase that followed, Aldrete-Davila scuffled with Compean after the agent tried to smack him with the butt of a shotgun. The agents said they saw something in the suspect's hand and feared for their lives, according to the report and court testimony.

A fuselage of bullets from Compean and Ramos missed. Finally, Ramos took careful aim as Aldrete-Davila neared the border and hit him in the buttocks.

After the shooting, the agents collected all shell casings at the scene, threw them away and did not mention the shooting to superiors, a violation of Border Patrol procedures that call for an oral report after a weapon is discharged, according to the report and court records.

Investigators granted immunity to Aldrete-Davila to lure him back across the border. The story he told was corroborated by other officers at the scene, the report said.

In March last year, Ramos and Compean were found guilty of multiple charges, including assault with a dangerous weapon, discharge of a firearm in commission of a crime, and tampering with a crime scene. Judge Kathleen Cardone issued an 11-year prison sentence to Ramos and a 12-year sentence to Compean in October. The agents appealed to a higher court, and their conservative supporters started to pressure Bush to release them.

Since the convictions, a group called Grassfire.org has collected 40,000 signatures on a "Pardon the Agents" petition. Angry congressional Republicans -- including Rep. Ted Poe (Tex.), Rep. Phil Gingrey (Ga.) and Rep. Walter B. Jones (N.C.) -- also wrote Bush to say they are flummoxed over why the government accepted the word of an illegal-immigrant drug dealer over that of government agents.

"There's clearly a lot of interest in this issue," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said. She said the Bush administration has a policy against revealing the number of letters, petitions and requests it receives on any given matter.

"The president has urged everyone to look at the facts of the case, as they were convicted by a jury of their peers," Perino said. "There is a legal process that every defendant is entitled to, and we should let that play out."

Mexico: U.S. Security Chief In First Visit (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

On his first official visit to Mexico, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he considered an expanded guest-worker program for Mexican migrants as key to stopping terrorists and criminals from slipping into the United States. “Every time a Border Patrol officer is transporting a load of future housekeepers and landscapers to some place to be returned, he’s not looking for drug dealers or drug loads,” Mr. Chertoff said after two days of meetings with Mexico’s top security officials.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Advances Minimum Wage Hike (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Washington Post Staff Writer

The House yesterday overwhelmingly approved a modest package of tax breaks for restaurants and small businesses, moving Congress one step closer to approving the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nearly a decade.

On a vote of 360 to 45, the House agreed to extend and expand credits and deductions to save taxpayers $1.3 billion over 10 years. It would adjust the tax code to increase collections by a similar amount. The measure would also guarantee that restaurant owners could keep a tax credit worth an estimated $500 million over 10 years.

The measure now moves to the Senate, which passed a far more generous $8.3 billion tax package this month under pressure from Republicans who refused to support a higher minimum wage unless it included tax relief for small businesses. Leaders in both chambers were optimistic yesterday that their differences could be resolved after Congress returns at the end of the month from its first break of the session.

"The House tax relief package aimed at the small businesses most affected by the increase in the minimum wage is a good first step, but we can do much better," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said in a written statement. "While I support the more robust Senate package, I know we can create a stronger bipartisan package that provides meaningful benefits to both those who earn the minimum wage and those who pay it."

Both chambers have agreed to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, from $5.15, over two years. The minimum wage now is the lowest in 50 years when adjusted for inflation, and a raise for the nation's lowest-paid workers is among the top priorities of the new Democratic congressional majority.

At first, House leaders insisted that the Senate approve the minimum-wage increase without adding small-business tax breaks. But that push failed in the Senate, and House leaders quickly reconsidered their position. Leadership aides were uncertain yesterday whether negotiations over the tax packages would take place in a conference committee or by some other method.

The two packages offer similar forms of tax relief, though the Senate bill is far more generous. For example, both packages would extend tax credits for employers who hire former welfare recipients, at-risk youth and other targeted groups, as well as a law that allows small businesses to quickly deduct $112,000 for equipment purchases. However, the House bill would raise the deduction amount to $125,000. And both packages contain specific breaks for restaurants, which employ a large number of the nation's minimum-wage workers.

The bigger difference is in how the each chamber would pay for the tax breaks. The House would close a loophole that permits wealthy taxpayers to shelter income by shifting it to their children. It would also create an accounting gimmick that would get more money from businesses with assets of more than $1 billion in 2012 and then reduce their taxes by the same amount in 2013.

The Senate package, in contrast, squarely targets corporations, executives and other highly paid workers by closing tax shelters, eliminating the deduction for fines and penalties paid in connection with lawsuits and barring executives from placing more than $1 million a year in deferred compensation plans.

Business lobbyists have already chosen sides, with the National Federation of Independent Business and small-business groups supporting the Senate package. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, meanwhile, is lobbying for the House bill in hopes of killing Senate provisions that it finds objectionable, including the limit on deferred compensation, one of the most popular perks in corporate America.

Tax Breaks Sweeten House Wage Measure (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House overwhelmingly approved more than $1 billion in small-business tax breaks to be attached to an increase in the minimum wage, paving the way for compromise talks with the Senate over lifting the hourly pay floor for the first time in a decade.

For the minimum-wage increase to become law, the chambers must meld the House small-business tax breaks with a bigger Senate-passed tax package valued at $8 billion in breaks in 10 years. The challenge: to settle on a tax package that is substantial enough to persuade a sufficient number of Senate Republicans to support a pay raise they say will hurt small employers, yet small enough to appease House Democrats, who initially balked at attaching any tax breaks to the minimum-wage bill.

On top of that, the House and Senate have agreed to work under a budgeting constraint that requires any tax breaks to be offset by revenue increases, so as not to increase the deficit. The Senate's larger tax-break package required an array of offsets that would restrict corporate tax shelters and loopholes and limit executive deferred-compensation plans, among other changes.

Some of those items have been criticized in the House, as well as by some business groups. In fact, many business groups have backed the House version of the wage measure because it avoids some of the more painful offsets, even though it means fewer tax breaks.

To get to the compromise on the size of the tax breaks, the House would likely have to agree to move closer to the Senate's view. Friday, just before the House's 360-45 passage of its small-business bill, Republican Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, the ranking member of the Finance Committee, called the House package "puny."

There is common ground on the substance of some breaks. Both the House and Senate bills would extend a credit for businesses that employ disadvantaged workers and a deduction for small companies' equipment expenses.

DOJ_NMG_0134121

"I know there are differences between the bills, but I'm confident they'll be worked out," said Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. The bill would raise the minimum wage by $2.10 an hour -- from $5.15 to $7.25 -- over two years.

Even if the House and Senate meet in the middle on the amount of tax breaks, it could be challenging to find $4 billion in offsets that are agreeable to both sides. Key members of the House have criticized some of the larger offsets in the Senate bill: limits on "sale-in, lease-out" tax shelters (SILOs) and "corporate inversions," in which companies reincorporate in a foreign country to avoid paying U.S. taxes on foreign income.

The deferred-compensation provisions have prompted an outcry from business groups much larger than the revenue the measures are estimated to raise, making some in the House question whether it is worth including them.

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, a New York Democrat, has said the SILO and inversion provisions are problematic because they are retroactive.

Specifically, the Senate bill would move back the effective date of existing limits and bar companies who used such arrangements from getting tax benefits in the future.

Familiar Problem Stalls Minimum Wage Bill (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — When Democrats campaigned last fall to recapture control of Congress, few domestic issues seemed to have as much winning potential as raising the minimum wage.

Democrats ostentatiously signed pledges to block any pay increase for Congress until it raised the minimum wage. They organized ballot initiatives to raise the state minimum wage. And when they did recapture the House and the Senate, Democrats made it a top priority.

Yet after six weeks in power, the Democratic-led House and Senate have yet to agree on a final bill. The obstacle is the same one that stymied Republicans time after time when they had control: paralyzingly thin margins in the Senate.

On Friday, the House voted 360 to 45 to pass a $1.3 billion tax cut for small business, which will be linked to a bill that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15. But the Senate, where Democrats need Republican votes to prevent a filibuster, has coupled the minimum wage bill with $8.3 billion in tax cuts for small business.

Lawmakers are not expected to reconcile the difference until after their “Presidents’ Day District Work Period” next week, and it remains unclear how difficult those negotiations will be. Further muddying the outlook is a split between small-business groups and big-business groups over which bill to support.

“I would not say we’re surprised at the delay,” said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan. “But I would say we are chagrined.”

Few lawmakers doubt that Congress will eventually approve the higher minimum wage, which was last raised 10 years ago. The battle is over how much business groups and Republicans can demand in return.

Republican lawmakers have demanded that Congress link an increase in the minimum wage, which business groups have long opposed, to tax cuts that they say would ease the burden for small businesses. House Democrats initially ignored those demands, passing a “clean” minimum-wage bill with no tax cuts last month.

But Senate Democrats, who needed Republican votes to attain a 60-vote majority to cut off debate, agreed to include $8.3 billion in tax cuts over the next five years.

The Senate tax cuts included a one-year extension of a tax cut that lets small companies write off up to $100,000 a year in equipment spending as well as extensions of tax breaks that allow restaurants and small shops to write off property improvements more quickly.

Those measures have strong support from small-business groups, led by the National Federation of Independent Business. But the Senate bill provoked strong opposition from the United States Chamber of Commerce, which objected to revenue-raising provisions that would have eliminated tax deductions on certain forms of executive compensation and for the cost of settling lawsuits.

The Chamber, which represents both small and large companies, supported the House bill with its smaller tax cut and provided enough political cover for 141 Republicans to join 219 Democrats in voting for passage.

"Bipartisanship is alive and well in the House of Representatives," Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, declared after the vote on Friday.

Some Republicans were far less enthusiastic than their votes suggested, taking comfort in the fact that they had exacted at least some price for their cooperation.

"The simplest argument in favor of this is that it's got the Chamber's support," said Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California, who voted aye but complained that the bill was not a "real tax cut" at all.

"They're giving a tax cut to small business but raising taxes on the rich," Mr. Issa said.

One provision, for example, would eliminate a tax break that allows wealthy families to reduce capital gains taxes by shifting some of their income to their children.

Mr. Levin, a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee, said he and most other House Democrats would have preferred to avoid the whole issue of tax cuts.

"It's all about getting 60 votes in the Senate," he said wearily.

Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said lawmakers were within weeks of reaching their goal. "I know there are differences between the bills," he said, "but I'm confident they'll be worked out."

Even if the House and the Senate come to agreement, the skirmish over comparatively small tax cuts tied to the minimum-wage bill is likely to be a harbinger of far more vexing battles later this year.

House Passes Minimum Wage Bill With Tax Breaks (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The House overwhelmingly approved business tax breaks worth $1.8 billion over 10 years yesterday, a key step toward forging a congressional compromise on increasing the minimum wage.

The vote on the tax cuts was 360-45.

Passage of a wage increase for the lowest-paid workers now depends on how quickly the House and Senate work out differences between their tax packages. The Senate tax breaks -- worth $8.3 billion -- are more than four times bigger than the ones passed in the House.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, Montana Democrat, said House and Senate negotiators could reconcile differences in the bills within two or three weeks.

"The minimum wage provision is going to trump all of this and is going to drive us to get this thing done pretty quickly," Mr. Baucus said.

Under the House bill, small businesses would see an extension in some tax write-offs that are scheduled to expire and would be able to continue to claim a tax credit for hiring disadvantaged workers. The legislation also would ensure that restaurants, which can deduct Social Security taxes paid on tips above the minimum wage, would not be hurt by the wage rise.

The House bill also would raise revenue by closing a loophole that permits wealthy taxpayers to shift income to their children and avoid higher taxes on capital gains and dividends.

The House vote displayed the influence the Senate's Republican minority can have on congressional legislation. House Democrats had demanded a minimum wage bill without any tax provisions. Senate Democrats insisted that without some tax relief, the minimum wage would lose necessary Republican backing.

Senate Republican officials predicted the final tax package would be closer to the House version than the Senate's. Small-business groups have sided with the Senate, but the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is lobbying for the House version.

The bipartisan agreement behind the House tax package was in stark contrast to the largely partisan debate on Iraq that consumed the House for most of the week. Lawmakers held up the House bill as a model for legislative cooperation. Still, some Republicans complained that Democrats prevented them from offering amendments on the House floor.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the House tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said the legislation "should set the tone for the rest of the Congress as we search for common ground and solutions to tough issues."

The minimum wage bill had become the new Democratic majority's first legislative challenge. The $2.10 an hour increase -- from $5.15 to $7.25 over two years -- was a Democratic campaign issue last year and was at the top of the party's legislative agenda. But the bill faltered when House and Senate Democrats disagreed on the need for tax cuts.

With its $8.3 billion tax package, the Senate would extend tax credits and tax write-offs and provide new tax preferences to certain companies. It also would eliminate some tax shelters and add new taxes on lawsuit settlements and punitive damage payments and on deferred compensation packages for higher-paid executives.

"The House package is puny," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee. He called for a compromise that would close tax loopholes, raise more revenue and "help small businesses that sometimes are hurt by an increase in the minimum wage."

Groups representing small businesses, such as the National Federation of Independent Business, prefer the larger Senate bill. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce supports the House bill because it objects to the Senate's revenue provisions, particularly the plan to eliminate deductions for payments in lawsuits.

President Has 2 Moles Removed From His Face (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

President Bush had two moles removed from his left temple yesterday. His doctors say they expect tests on the skin growths to show that they are noncancerous.

The five-minute procedure, called a shave biopsy, was performed in the White House office of Bush's official physician, Richard J. Tubb.

Stephen Krivda, a dermatologist from Walter Reed Army Medical Center, performed the procedure, for which only a local anesthetic was required.

Bush will have a one-inch scab on his temple, spokesman Scott Stanzel said. Test results will be available by the middle of next week.

"The doctors expect that both moles are benign," Stanzel said.

Bush has had several lesions removed before: a precancerous lesion on his left arm in August, a noncancerous skin growth on his neck in July 2005, small lesions from his left shoulder and face in 2004, and others from his face in December 2001. None has been cancerous, but the president has regular checkups to guard against any lesions advancing to a more dangerous stage.

The procedure came about at the president's initiation. On Monday, he showed one mole he noticed to Tubb, who noticed another and recommended that both be removed, Stanzel said.

Controversy Likely To Follow Cheney To Asia (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, James Gerstenzang

Recent events haven't been kind to the vice president, but ex-aides aren't counting him out.

WASHINGTON — Vice President Dick Cheney is set to depart Monday for a weeklong trip to Asia, and many in Washington are wondering whether he might be grateful for an excuse to high-tail it out of town. The past few weeks have not been kind to the vice president — or at least to his public image.

Last week, a close ally was dressed down by the Pentagon inspector general for skewing intelligence before the Iraq war. The trial of his former chief of staff has depicted the vice president's office as a center of underhanded intrigue. And this week's announcement of a nuclear agreement with North Korea appears to be a repudiation of Cheney's long-term opposition to a deal.

Those events, culminating months of bad news for the conservative wing of the Republican Party, have prompted speculation that the once-formidable vice president — the most powerful in American history — has become a spent force.

But while Cheney's public standing and his approval ratings appear to have suffered, he remains a highly visible presence when it comes to administration policy, both foreign and domestic. And the ultimate source of Cheney's influence, his seemingly unique relationship with President Bush, shows no visible sign of change.

Mary Matalin, the former senior Cheney aide who still serves as an informal advisor, acknowledged that it might look as if he has lost a few battles in the recent past; but, she said, such public perceptions matter little.

"He doesn't operate in the realm of winner-loser. He's got an audience of one," Matalin said. "The notion that he's lost or gained relative to the audience of one is backed up by not one scintilla of evidence."

Former aides and defenders say that Cheney was never as powerful as his critics feared, and that he is not as diminished now as critics might hope.

"Yes, there has been some ebb in his influence, but that's part of the normal life cycle of an administration," said Stephen Yates, a former member of the vice president's national security staff who now works as an international business consultant. "He wasn't 12 feet tall before, and he's not 2 feet tall now."

For a vice president who put a high value in keeping his profile low and his advice to the president private, Cheney has been anything but invisible.

He has long been — and remains still — the keeper of the conservative faith in the White House. He continues to be an outspoken defender of an administration struggling to fix the centerpiece of its foreign policy, the war in Iraq. And he seems undaunted by a public that expresses dissatisfaction with the overall direction of the country.

Several of those roles were on display Wednesday when the vice president delivered an address to the National Assn. of Manufacturers. He told the largely conservative audience that the president would veto a bill that would set rules for how workers vote for union representation — a bill the group opposes.

Cheney also tossed a bit of conservative red meat to the crowd, noting that a snowstorm overnight had shuttered much of the city. "The good news is, the federal government's shut down today. So everybody's safe," the vice president said. Cheney has held positions in the federal government for most of his adult life, but the audience laughed anyway.

To some extent, Cheney suffers from circumstances of the political calendar: He said long ago that he would not run for president, and the president he serves is a lame duck.

"Political history would say that vice presidents who have no [political] ambition become lame ducks even earlier" than their presidents, said Paul C. Light, a New York University professor who has long studied the vice presidency.

Moreover, many of Cheney's administration soul mates are no longer on the job.

Former Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was forced to resign last fall. Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, stepped down after he was indicted on charges of lying to investigators probing a leak of classified information. Former Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton has left the administration after serving as temporary, unconfirmed U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Several former Cheney aides said the vice president's staff had lost influence within the White House. His current chief of staff, David S. Addington, does not have the same status as Libby, who held multiple positions including "assistant to the president," which gave him a seat in more White House meetings.

And on Capitol Hill, congressional Republicans lament the departure of Cheney's former legislative aide, Brenda Becker.

"His personal influence hasn't diminished, but at the staff level, the office of the vice president isn't as influential as it was," said one former aide who was not authorized to speak about the vice president on the record.

Cheney is scheduled to visit U.S. troops stationed on the Pacific island of Guam and to pay a visit to two allies who have contributed to operations in Iraq: Japan and Australia. The White House announcement said that "the president has asked the vice president to thank these two allies for their efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan."

But already there are complications. News reports from Tokyo have said Cheney would not meet with Japan's minister of defense, who has publicly criticized U.S. policy in Iraq. And in Australia, the visit may turn out to be a liability for Prime Minister John Howard, who is running for reelection. Australian polls show a strong majority disapproves of the war and Australia's contribution to it.

DOJ_NMG_0134125

In short, Cheney is unlikely to flee controversy just by leaving Washington. "He's going to Australia. He's going to Japan. He's the go-to guy on the Hill," said Matalin. "And he's taking a lot of incoming."

Cheney Tours With Bush's Confidence (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney has lost his chief of staff and confidant, who now faces an imminent verdict in a federal courtroom for alleged perjury. And Cheney's party has lost control of Congress, with midterm elections widely viewed as a repudiation of the Bush administration's Iraq war policy.

Yet Cheney has not lost his influence with President Bush, who often has counted on his sharp-tongued No. 2 to launch the most searing offensives against political and administration critics. And, since the retirement of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and a recasting of the administration, Bush has counted even more on the hardest of his hard-liners to hold the White House line.

Now, with the administration besieged by congressional critics of the war in Iraq yet boasting of sudden progress in a nuclear standoff with North Korea, Cheney will make a weeklong tour of the Pacific. He will offer a nod of thanks to Bush's supporters in the "war on terror," but also pointed reminders of the risks still posed by powers intent on undermining Western democracy.

Delivering speeches throughout the region, Cheney will arrive Tuesday in Japan, which has supported the U.S. effort in Iraq but whose defense minister recently criticized the invasion of Iraq as "wrong." He will close the trip Sunday in Australia, whose prime minister is one of Bush's staunchest allies in the war.

The vice president plans a rally for U.S. troops and a speech aboard the USS Kitty Hawk based at Yokosuka, Japan, the only American aircraft carrier "permanently forward-deployed" and the oldest U.S. Navy ship still in service. He will have another rally for troops at Andersen Air Force Base in Guam en route to Australia.

Japan and Australia "are probably two of the best allies we have anywhere in the world," said one senior administration official, calling Cheney's diplomatic mission a cementing of cherished friendships. Despite some of Cheney's predictions about the American mission in Iraq proving wrong—most notably his assertion in May 2005 that the insurgency was in its "last throes"—he has retained his stature in an administration whose most powerful players have moved, moved on or lost stature. With the movement of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice from the White House to Foggy Bottom, the demotion of political adviser Karl Rove from his policy role at the White House and the replacement of Rumsfeld after the midterm elections, Cheney has held on to a powerful role.

He has have served four presidents—Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, and the two George Bushes. But his influence with the current president may be unmatched historically.

"The vice president has always had easy access to the Oval Office in a way that no other vice president ever had," said Mike Green, former director of Asian affairs for the president's National Security Council. And, Green said, Cheney holds a singular role since Rumsfeld's departure.

"He is the president's close confidant and has an opportunity to weigh in on all sorts of issues on ways that the rest of the government never sees… and that hasn't changed," Green said.

When the campaigning president has required attack tactics, Cheney has stepped to the plate. When the wartime president has required someone to confront his critics, Cheney has stood ready with bruising words for the "defeatism" of Democrats willing to retreat in the face of terrorism. "The president and I cannot prevent certain politicians from losing their memory, or their backbone," Cheney said during the 2006 campaign, but "we're going to continue throwing their own words back at them."

Asked in a recent interview with Newsweek magazine if he takes personally the criticism that some have leveled at him, Cheney said, "Well, I'm vice president, and they're not."

In the midst of casual speculation around Washington that Cheney, 66, might not serve out his term, Bush made a point of laying that to rest during an address to the American Enterprise Institute last week. Noting that more than 20 scholars of the conservative think tank have served in his administration, including Cheney, he also noted that "a few have returned to the fold." But, Bush said, "You'll have to wait two more years to get another one to return to the fold. Dick Cheney is occupied."

The vice president has not only enjoyed unprecedented influence with this president, but also has asserted in new and broadening ways the powers of his own office.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale has complained: "One of the problems now is that this vice president… seems to have stepped across a line that we thought was important at the time…. This vice presidency is troubling to me because time and time again we have seen the establishment of almost a parallel national security council" with Cheney filtering information flowing to the president.

Cheney has operated his own national security team, which retired Army Col. Larry Wilkerson, chief of staff to former Secretary of State Colin Powell, has accused of spying on the president's own National Security Council. And Cheney has not only exercised his authority to classify secret information, but also has refused to account for how much information he is classifying. He has asserted an exemption from the annual reporting that the president has demanded all executive agencies make to the National Archives because his role is not merely as an executive officer, but a legislative one as well, serving as president of the Senate.

If predecessors tended to focus on narrow missions, Wilkerson said in an interview with the Tribune, "Along came Dick Cheney, and it's everything. He's got a staff that can stick its nose in anything."

Still, Cheney has lost the trusted aide who once oversaw his national security operation, former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby. He is standing trial on charges of lying to federal authorities investigating the leak of a CIA agent's identity—the wife of a former ambassador who challenged some of the White House's rationale for the run-up to the war and accused the White House of manipulating intelligence.

Libby, who initially had said he learned of the relationship from news reporters in the summer of 2003, later testified that the first to tell him of the connection was his boss: Cheney. The trial has shown that others in the administration leaked the information to reporters.

Even with loss of Libby from his office, one knowledgeable insider requesting anonymity said Cheney is his own staff and counsel where it counts most, inside the Oval Office of the Bush White House.

"Yes, there was a separate [national security] staff set up by the vice president, and yes they created a certain mystique," the source said. "But the real power of the vice president was that he could go in and talk to the president about whatever he wanted, and staff didn't always know what he was saying."

An Awkward Plea (NYT)

By Ann Althouse

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

It's hard to ask for a raise, especially when you're a judge. Look at poor Justice Anthony Kennedy supplicating before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Valentine's Day. With stilted locutions — "it's frankly most awkward for me" — he staked out pedantic points about the constitutional scheme of separation of powers, and lumbered toward a conclusion that federal judges need to make more money.

His theory worked the theme of "excellence": unless the pay is good, excellent judges will leave the bench, excellent lawyers and law professors will not accept appointments, and if the judges aren't excellent, they won't be independent, as the Constitution contemplates. (Unfortunately, the Constitution also contemplates the justices' having to beg Congress for a raise, or Justice Kennedy wouldn't have found himself straining through that theory.)

Senator Arlen Specter acted as though he found this all very enlightening. When you come before us, you appear on television, and you're educating the public, he said. But I don't think Kennedy's excellence theory had actually impressed him. It was more that he perceived a segue to the subject he wanted to drag onto center stage.

He had just reintroduced his bill to require the Supreme Court to televise its oral arguments, and he wanted to talk about cameras in the courtroom: think of the profound educational effect of showing the oral arguments; you justices are already going on TV all the time to explain your notions; people get their information through TV, so you ought to let them see the room, see how you operate.

Earlier, Justice Kennedy had brushed off Senator Patrick Leahy, who had convened the hearing by going on about those terrible hotheads who denounce the judiciary, call for impeachment and even threaten violence against judges. Justice Kennedy sounded unperturbed: there should be a public debate about what the Constitution means — it's the people's Constitution — and it might be nice if everyone were rational and respectful, but we're used to the "hurly-burly, rough and tumble" of democracy.

For Justice Kennedy, the real threat to the judiciary is the low pay.

But Senator Specter's Congressionally imposed cameras stirred up the justice. It would change the "collegial dynamic." Justice Kennedy portrayed the justices' interaction with the attorney at oral argument as almost a private undertaking. The justices, who haven't yet talked with each other about the case, "are using the attorney to have a conversation with ourselves," he said. He quickly added: "And with the attorney."

He took a stern tone: "This is a dynamic that works." He pinched his fingers together as if he could forcibly squeeze the Congress out of the Supreme Court's domain. He paused a long time, trying, it seemed, to contain his emotion and find the proper attitude.

He went with abject pleading: "Please, Senator, don't introduce into the dynamics that I have with my colleagues the temptation — the insidious temptation — to think that one of my colleagues is trying to get a sound bite for the television. We don't want that." He had come to beg for more money to reach some idealized form of independence understood as a matter of excellence. And now, here he was fending off the intrusion of the dreaded cameras into his precious collegial conversation. Isn't part of this independence deciding when to let everyone watch them?

Needing to present himself as an excellent judge, Justice Kennedy couldn't say anything intemperate. Think of what he didn't say.

If the pay is low, the judges will be the kind of people who don't care that much about money. They might be monkish scholars, or they might be ideologues who see in the law whatever it is they think is good for us. Justice Kennedy could say that judicial work is satisfying in ways that have nothing to do with money. He couldn't say that we can't trust people who don't care enough about money.

We need judges who are the kind of solid, common-sense lawyers who factor money into their decisions. These are the same people who take the kind of conventional law-firm jobs that pay a good salary and require the greatest sacrifice to leave.

Low judicial pay should trouble us not because the judges will somehow lack "excellence." It should trouble us because the law will be articulated by ideologues and recluses.

Rep. Jefferson To Get Homeland Security Seat (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who yanked embattled Rep. William J. Jefferson off a powerful tax committee last year, has decided to put him on the Homeland Security panel, aides to the Louisiana Democrat confirmed yesterday.

The move infuriated some Republicans, who accuse him of being a potential security risk.

Jefferson has been the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation related to a telecommunications deal in Africa. His Capitol Hill office and his homes in Washington and New Orleans have been raided by the FBI, and he was kicked off the Ways and Means Committee last June after affidavits and evidence seized in the raids became public.

Nevertheless, Jefferson won reelection in December to a ninth term, and he has been an outspoken critic of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina. Pelosi's decision to appoint Jefferson to the committee must still be formally approved by House Democrats.

"It sends a terrible message," said Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the committee's ranking Republican. "They couldn't trust him to write tax policy, so why should he be given access to our nation's top secrets or making policy for national defense?

"Members of the committee have access to intelligence secrets, plots here in the country, overseas, and people under suspicion. This shows how unimportant the Democrats think homeland security is," King said.

Jefferson's chief of staff, Eugene Green, called King's criticism "ridiculous and just politics."

DOJ_NMG_0134128

"Representing New Orleans as he does, we're very concerned as to what happened in the wake of Hurricane Katrina," Green said. "It's just natural for the congressman to serve his constituents on a committee of this nature."

New Push Grows For FDA Regulation Of Tobacco (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

After years of falling short, advocates of requiring the Food and Drug Administration to regulate tobacco are again waging that fight in Congress -- and this time, they say, the odds are in their favor. Really.

A bipartisan group of lawmakers introduced legislation last week to grant the FDA authority over the manufacturing, marketing and sale of tobacco products, including the power to restrict advertising, require stronger warning labels, and regulate the amount of nicotine and other ingredients. The agency would not be able to ban tobacco.

"Congress cannot in good conscience allow the federal agency most responsible for protecting the public health to remain powerless to deal with the enormous risks of tobacco, the most deadly of all consumer products," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the lead sponsor and chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

"This bill is long overdue," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee and the lead sponsor in the House. "Despite the fact that cigarettes kill over 400,000 Americans each year, and despite the fact this is the most toxic substance that is sold legally and when used as intended has the potential to kill, there is virtually no regulation of tobacco by the federal government."

Rhetoric like this has been flying around Capitol Hill for years. The FDA claimed the authority to regulate tobacco in the mid-1990s during the Clinton administration, but the effort was challenged by tobacco companies and overturned by the Supreme Court in 2000. What followed were several attempts to pass legislation in Congress, many of which attracted broad-based support -- including from cigarette maker Philip Morris USA. But invariably the bills hit an impasse and died. Legislation to regulate tobacco won approval in the Senate in 2004, but GOP leaders never allowed a vote on it in the House, the bill's supporters say.

Now, with Democrats in control of Congress for the first time since 1994, proponents say the legislation has a far better chance.

"This is the year when we can pass meaningful legislation," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, the lead GOP sponsor in the House, whose father died of emphysema.

Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the top Republican sponsor in the Senate, said 54 percent of smokers take up the habit before age 18. The legislation "is the best way to address the public health concerns and the marketing concerns we have about children being targeted and addicted to a drug like nicotine," he said.

The FDA would have the power to end vending-machine and self-service sales, prohibit tobacco advertising near schools and playgrounds, ban fruit- or candy-flavored cigarettes and stop cigarette makers from using claims such as "light" or "low-tar" unless they are scientifically proven.

The White House, generally no fan of expanding government regulation, referred calls to the Department of Health and Human Services, where a spokeswoman said officials were still reviewing the legislation. It is supported by groups such as the American Heart Association and the Campaign for Tobacco Free Kids, and it once again has the backing of market leader Philip Morris USA, maker of Marlboro cigarettes.

"In the long term, it's good for our business if fewer people get sick and die from smoking," said Steven C. Parrish, a senior vice president of Altria Group Inc., Philip Morris's parent company.

But R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. plans to fight the legislation, saying it would help entrench Philip Morris's dominant position by limiting advertising opportunities, something Philip Morris denies.

"If you eliminate ways for competition to communicate with an audience, common sense and logic tells you that the primary beneficiary of that is the marketplace leader," said Reynolds spokesman David Howard, who added that the company was open to discussing "reasonable" regulation.

Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) has said he opposes the bill. Another potential roadblock is Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), whose state is also home to many tobacco growers.

"I am concerned that giving the FDA the authority to regulate tobacco will have a major impact our farmers, therefore, I will closely review the legislation . . . to ensure that it not only protects our children but also the farmers, their families and the communities they support," McConnell said in a statement.

Daniel E. Smith, president of the American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network, a lobbying group, predicted "a heck of a fight with Senator McConnell." But Smith said Cornyn's support should help garner the 60 votes needed to avoid a filibuster in the Senate.

Matthew L. Myers, president of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, said, "This will be a dogfight because the opposition is well funded and will stop at no end, but it appears there is now a broad bipartisan consensus to push it over the top."

GSA Defends Administrator In Hill Inquiry (WP)

By Scott Higham, Robert O'Harrow, Washington Post Staff Writers

Agency Says Chief Takes Responsibility For No-Bid Order

The U.S. General Services Administration has responded to a congressional inquiry by saying its chief, Lurita Alexis Doan, did nothing improper last summer when she tried to arrange for a study by a company run by a woman with whom she had a "close professional relationship."

In a Feb. 2 response to Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the agency said Doan was trying to promote diversity when she signed a "service order" for the $20,000 project. That July 25 document was intended to authorize a company, Diversity Best Practices, run by Edie Fraser, to write a 24-page report and analysis concerning the GSA's use of businesses owned by minorities or women.

At the time, GSA contracts worth more than $2,500 had to be competitively bid. The proposed project was terminated in August because it "did not meet government contract requirements," the agency said in its six-page response.

In the response, GSA Associate Administrator Kevin Messner rejected "the implication that her intentions were improper" and said the project was stopped before any money changed hands.

"A procedural mistake was made, discovered and corrected," Messner wrote. "In an initial attempt as new Administrator to champion the cause of small minority, women, and disabled veteran-owned businesses, the Administrator recognized and took responsibility for the mistake."

Waxman, chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, which oversees the GSA, sent a letter to the agency raising questions about the events following a Jan. 19 story in The Washington Post. Waxman asked the agency to produce e-mails and other documents relating to the no-bid order and disputes between Doan and her inspector general's office.

A spokeswoman for Waxman said the committee is reviewing the GSA's response and declined to comment further.

Shortly after she became GSA administrator in May, Doan clashed with the agency's inspector general over budget matters. Last year, the inspector general's office launched its own investigation of the attempted project with Diversity Best Practices.

Doan told The Post in a taped interview last month that she took over the agency in a time of falling revenue and morale. In its response to Waxman, the GSA noted that Doan wanted the inspector general's office to rely on its $43 million budget appropriated by Congress and no longer depend on an extra $5 million that came from other GSA divisions. That additional money had been mandated by the White House Office of Management and Budget to help bolster contract audits in 2003.

"What started out as yesterday's benefit to help them out with their budget has turned into today's entitlement," Doan said in the interview.

The GSA's response said that the inspector general refused to identify any areas for possible cuts in its budget, despite an agency-wide push by Doan to reduce spending. Instead, the inspector general's office "demanded a substantial increase in spending" in its budget, according to the response. The $5 million in extra funding is included in the 2008 budget submitted by President Bush, along with an increase of about $4 million for the inspector general's overall budget.

In September, the inspector general's office notified Doan and Fraser of its investigation into the circumstances surrounding the $20,000 no-bid project, issuing subpoenas for e-mails and other documents.

The budget dispute drew a questioning letter on Oct. 20 from Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. He urged Doan to maintain the inspector general's independence. He said money used to fund contract audits had "saved the taxpayers more than $1 billion over the past two years." Grassley sent a letter yesterday to the Senate Appropriations Committee requesting that money to fund contract audits become a permanent part of the inspector general's budget.

The GSA released a statement yesterday: "The Administrator has only opposed unaccountable and undisciplined spending, not increased oversight. Any characterization of pre-decisional budget discussions that suggests otherwise is simply inaccurate."

After the Post story about the diversity study, Waxman sent Doan a letter requesting further information about possible "procurement irregularities." In its response to Waxman, the GSA said The Post's article was "characterized by inaccuracy and prejudice" and a "mischaracterization of the facts."

A lawyer hired by Doan, John J. Walsh, said in a Feb. 5 letter to The Post that Doan has been a victim of a "push back" by the inspector general's office against her attempt to "reduce wasteful spending throughout the agency, including the OIG."

The GSA called Fraser "the recognized leader" in the diversity field and said Doan reached out to Fraser about the "need for a very short and inexpensive report." Doan said in the interview that she authorized the report to promote GSA's diversity initiatives at the request of Felipe Mendoza, who runs the agency's Office of Small Business Utilization.

The GSA's response said that Doan signed a service order to authorize the work but that no contract was "ever executed."

Walsh said Doan was not "sidestepping" procurement rules but instead had submitted the no-bid order "into the contracting process."

Doan told The Post: "I handed this off, and then that was the last that I worried about it."

GSA staff, including legal counsel, determined that the arrangement did not comply with federal contracting rules.

On Aug. 4, GSA contracting officer Donna C. Hughes wrote to Fraser: "The U.S. General Services Administration (GSA) hereby notifies you that the contract, evidenced by the enclosed Confirmation of Service Order Prepared for GSA, signed and dated July 25, 2006, is terminated in its entirety."

Fraser is president and chief executive of Public Affairs Group Inc., the umbrella company of Business Women's Network and Diversity Best Practices, the division that was to have written the report. At the time of the proposal, Public Affairs Group was owned by iVillage Inc., a subsidiary of NBC Universal Inc.

The GSA response said Doan has a "close professional relationship" but "no personal contractual arrangement with Edie Fraser or Diversity Best Practices of any kind."

The GSA also responded to a question about whether Doan had intervened in the suspension process involving five large government contractors who had paid $66 million to settle fraud allegations that they kept travel rebates that should have gone back to the GSA.

The Post reported that a GSA official had issued letters to the five firms asking them to explain why they should not be suspended or debarred. Under the process, companies can avoid being suspended from government work by accepting responsibility, paying restitution and putting in place remediation plans.

Doan said in the interview that she had not been briefed on what she viewed as an important issue. Doan wrote in a Nov. 10 e-mail to top GSA officials: "If these letters can be stopped until cooler heads can prevail and discuss what the appropriate mechanism is to obtain the information that CAO [chief acquisition officer] requires, that would be best."

The GSA said that Doan was told that a decision had already been made to debar the firms. The GSA said Doan requested a briefing and took no further action.

"It is a distortion to equate a desire to be informed promptly when such decisions are pending with interference in this process," the GSA said in its response to Waxman.

The companies eventually avoided suspension or debarment by agreeing to return travel rebates in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0134131

In addition to Walsh, Doan has personally retained Washington lawyer Reginald J. Brown and media consultant Mark Corallo. A third lawyer for Doan, retired Maj. Gen. Michael J. Nardotti Jr., has requested that the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency open an investigation into whether the GSA inspector general's office leaked confidential information and documents.

A spokesman for the GSA's inspector general's office declined to comment yesterday.

VA Suspends Some Medical Research (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson has suspended activities at seven specialized research centers across the country after an unprotected computer hard drive disappeared from one of the facilities in Alabama last month.

In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, Nicholson called the department's latest data breach "tragic" and ordered the VA's Research Enhancement Award Programs to shut down until they are certified as meeting security standards.

The research centers focus on studies involving large amounts of data. The center in Birmingham, called the Deep South Center on Effectiveness, collects data for improving quality of care.

Writing to VA's top management on Thursday, Nicholson also said the department would begin unannounced inspections at VA sites nationwide.

"It is now clear to me that there are still too many VA employees, both in senior positions and elsewhere, who either still do not comprehend the seriousness of this issue, or who consciously disregard its seriousness," he wrote.

Nicholson has come under sharp criticism on Capitol Hill in the past year over a series of computer security failures that put sensitive personal information for millions of veterans at risk.

In the latest incident, a backup hard drive containing data such as Social Security numbers for up to 1.8 million veterans and physicians was reported missing Jan. 22 from a research site in Birmingham, Ala.

As a federal investigation proceeds, officials have remained tightlipped about the case. But in the letter, Nicholson wrote that the employee was a research assistant and the hard drive may have been stolen. The VA acknowledged earlier this week that the hard drive was not encrypted, a violation of the department's policy.

"This represents a failure of leadership in overseeing data security at Birmingham _ a failure that may be widespread throughout our Department," Nicholson wrote.

VA officials have said the data on the missing hard drive, including for some 1.3 million non-VA physicians across the country, was being used for a study.

Similar sites are in Portland, Ore.; Denver, Colo.; East Orange, N.J.; San Francisco, Calif.; White River Junction, Vt.; and San Antonio, Texas.

VA spokesman Matt Burns confirmed the letter Friday. He said the security reviews would be expedited but that it is unclear how long the research would be interrupted.

"The benefits of any research must be weighed against the importance of protecting the information that's being used," he said.

The Birmingham disclosure comes after a string of similar incidents recently, including the theft last spring of data on 26.5 million veterans from a VA employee's home in Maryland.

In auditing the department's security procedures last year, federal investigators found weak management and lax rules.

Nicholson said in August the agency would upgrade its computers with encryption technology, making data unreadable for unauthorized users. The department also recently hired an outside firm to improve employee practices.

House Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Bob Filner, D-Calif., said this week he plans to hold a hearing on the Birmingham incident later this month.

Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., called Nicholson's actions "good steps" but said the memo underscores the need for legislation strengthening data requirements at government agencies.

Work Suspended At Veterans Research Centers (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson has suspended activities at seven specialized research centers across the country after an unprotected computer hard drive disappeared last month from one of the facilities in Birmingham, Ala. In an internal memorandum, Mr. Nicholson called the department's latest data breach "tragic" and ordered its Research Enhancement Award Programs centers shut down until they were certified as meeting security standards. The Alabama center, called the Deep South Center on Effectiveness, collects data for improving care. Writing to the department's top management on Thursday, Mr. Nicholson also said unannounced inspections would begin at V.A. sites nationwide.

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

You know the culture of spending on Capitol Hill is in bad repute when even legendary appropriator Robert Byrd of West Virginia is condemning earmarks. This week Mr. Byrd proclaimed on the Senate floor that the just-completed 2007 budget "does not, does not, N-O-T, include earmarks. We eliminate over 9,300 earmarks."

We're about to find out if he and his comrades really mean it. On Thursday, White House budget director Rob Portman issued little-noticed guidance to all federal departments and agencies that no Congressional requests for spending should be accommodated unless they are "specifically identified in statutory text" -- which is to say, the law.

This may sound like it ought to be regular practice, but it's a revolution in the Beltway. That's because, in order to dodge the legislative earmark limits that Mr. Byrd has been bragging about, Members have been speed-dialing executive branch officials and asking them to fund their specific earmark requests out of agency budgets even though they were purged from the larger budget bill. This Congressional lobbying can be hard for the average federal bureaucrat to refuse, since he doesn't want to offend those on Capitol Hill who control his budget. Mr. Portman's directive is intended to stiffen these backbones against such Congressional extortion.

If the attempt succeeds in reducing earmarks, this means the Fiscal 2007 federal budget could have the fewest number of these pork-barrel projects in many a year. By the way, thanks to efforts late last year by GOP Senators Jim DeMint of South Carolina and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma to block a last-minute bipartisan spending splurge, the 2007 budget holds overall federal appropriated spending to the rate of inflation; recent years have often seen three times that.

The budget does still contain a few spending tricks. For example, it moves $3.1 billion to finance obsolete military base closings in order to pay for such Democratic priorities as Pell grants and global AIDS funding. Closing bases would save money in the long run and the money is supposed to finance the Base Realignment and Closure process that Congress approved.

But all told, the Fiscal 2007 is a change for the better. If the executive branch follows the new White House guidance, we could come remarkably close to the miracle of an "earmark-free" year. We assume Senator Byrd will applaud.

Sharp Drop In Housing Starts Adds To Fear Of Wider Economic Impact (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater, Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

A sharp drop-off in new-home construction is adding to concerns that the housing downturn's impact could linger well into this year and eventually seep into the wider economy.

Builders slashed construction of new homes last month to the lowest level in nearly a decade, a move that underscores the severity of the sector's slump and signals it will likely continue to be a drag on the economy at least through midyear. The slip in homebuilding last year subtracted more than 1 percentage point from inflation-adjusted economic growth over the second half of 2006.

Monthly home-construction readings are volatile and prone to weather-induced fluctuations, and last month's plunge may somewhat overstate the market weakness. But signs of deterioration in riskier segments of the home-mortgage market, along with stagnant or declining home prices in many parts of the country, provide additional reason for concern.

The plunge in new homebuilding activity in January -- down 14.3% from December and 37.8% from January 2006 levels -- could eventually hasten a recovery by reducing the overhang of unsold homes, however.

So far, the weakness in housing has yet to spill over significantly to consumer spending, the dominant driver of U.S. economic growth. Instead, it has slowed the pace of expansion just enough to reverse last year's inflation surge. Still, the possibility of further deterioration in the sector this year remains a primary risk to economic growth -- particularly if it is accompanied by rising loan defaults or a broad tightening of credit standards.

So far, defaults and late payments have remained very low on prime mortgages, which are made to lower-risk borrowers and account for the bulk of home loans. But late payments have risen swiftly over the past year on subprime mortgages -- those made to risky borrowers with spotty credit histories -- and on "Alt-A" mortgages, a category between prime and subprime which includes many loans for which borrowers haven't documented their income. According to trade publication Inside Mortgage Finance, 13% of mortgages outstanding are subprime.

In November, payments were at least 60 days overdue on 12.9% of subprime loans packaged into mortgage securities, up from 8.1% a year earlier, according to First American LoanPerformance, a research firm in San Francisco. For Alt-A loans, the delinquency rate jumped to 2.1% in November from 1.1% a year earlier.

The upsurge in late payments and delinquencies has created turbulence among subprime lenders, and some large banks that bought subprime loans a couple of years ago have been pressuring subprime-mortgage lenders to buy them back. In its most recent survey of senior loan officers, released last week, the U.S. Federal Reserve found that some banks are getting more stringent to guard against this threat of defaults. About 18% of domestic banks reported that they had tightened credit standards on residential-mortgage loans over the past three months, the Fed said, adding that this was "the highest net fraction posted since the early 1990s."

But Fed officials and many other economists say the problems in subprime lending aren't severe enough at this point to significantly hamper economic growth. Doug Duncan, chief economist of the Mortgage Bankers Association, a Washington-based trade group, said only 6% of homeowners have subprime, adjustable-rate mortgages. Even if one-tenth of these end up in foreclosure -- the peak hit after the 2001 recession -- Mr. Duncan said that "it's hard to see how that can be a macroeconomic event."

Concern would rise if troubles spread further among lower-risk borrowers and lead to more defaults of Alt-A mortgages.

Another risk is that many subprime loans were made to buy houses in high-priced areas, which may be more vulnerable to price declines. Any widespread delinquencies on these loans could result in lenders seizing the underlying homes and dumping them on the market. That could exacerbate the industry's inventory problem, which has already put downward pressure on prices and forced builders to increase discounts and incentives.

Torn between yesterday's housing report's implications of slower growth and diminished inflationary pressure -- which makes additional interest-rate increases less likely -- stocks were virtually unchanged yesterday. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose three points to close at 12768.

Pat Moroney, who heads the Phoenix division of Standard Pacific Homes, a California-based home builder, said sales-cancellation rates in Phoenix soared as high as 70% at times last year, and averaged 50% for the year as a whole. The company has been offering incentives to potential buyers between $15,000 and $100,000 to help move unsold homes in some markets, up from $5,000 to $10,000 in 2005.

"We worked pretty hard to get through our backlog" of unsold homes, Mr. Moroney said. "We've pushed a lot of cancellations through." In January, the cancellation rate fell to 32%, he said.

Given the stockpile of unsold homes, many industry officials and economists greeted the sharp drop in new-home construction last month as welcome news. "I think it's a positive indicator," said Ara K. Hovnanian, chief executive officer of Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., a large home builder based in Red Bank, N.J. He said the figures reflect a decrease in new-home orders over the past year and will help builders clear their inventories, paving the way for a gradual recovery to begin later this year.

Economists say the sooner builders cut back, the sooner a rebound can occur. "We look at this number, and it makes us a bit more optimistic about when we're going to see a recovery," said Todd Vencil, a housing analyst at BB&T Capital Markets in Richmond, Va.

Meanwhile, the industry's continuing supply adjustment is likely to continue to affect the broader economy. Dave Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, predicts that the cut in residential investment will shave one percentage point from the economy's inflation-adjusted growth rate in the first quarter, more than he was anticipating late last year.

"Now we're talking about a heavier hit," he said.

Job losses in the sector are also likely to mount. Zoltan Pozsar, an economist at Moody's Economy.com, said 170,000 housing-related jobs have been cut since April 2006. Luckily, the rest of the economy has added nearly 1.78 million jobs over that span, and the labor market continues to boost wages and provide support for increased consumer spending.

Separately, the Labor Department said wholesale prices fell 0.6% last month and was only 0.2% higher than a year ago, another indication of ebbing inflation concerns. And the University of Michigan said consumer sentiment slid to 93.3 in early February from 96.9 at the end of January.

January Housing Starts Dive (WP)

By Howard Schneider, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Lowest Figure in a Decade Sparks Concern Over Overall Growth

Housing starts dropped to their lowest level in nearly a decade last month, and permits for new construction also declined, pointing to continued weakness in a sector of the economy that can drag down growth overall.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that the pace of home building dropped more than 14 percent in January compared with the month before, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.4 million houses. That's the slowest annual rate since the late 1990s. Permits for new construction fell to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1,568,000 -- a drop of 3 percent from the prior month and more than 28 percent from the year before.

The release of the government statistics followed a study by the National Association of Realtors showing that home prices in about half of the country's metropolitan areas fell in the last three months of 2006 compared with the year before -- the first time the group documented such a decline in the 28 years it has collected data.

The Washington area was among the losers: The average price of homes sold in the last three months of 2006 fell 2.6 percent, to $421,600, compared with the year before.

Collectively, the statistics undermined gains posted at the end of last year, when an increase in permits and housing starts and rising demand for homes led some to conclude that the housing slump was beginning to abate. With a large inventory of unsold homes on the market, however, the latest reports will likely renew concern that weakness in the housing market could cause broader problems.

While housing starts alone aren't necessarily a good predictor -- weather can drive the number up or down in deceptive ways -- a renewed decline in housing permit applications supported a "bearish" outlook for growth in coming months, said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for the High Frequency Economics consulting firm.

The housing data are positive in one sense: They are likely to reinforce the view that the risk of inflation will remain moderate in coming months, a conclusion supported by another new report showing that the wholesale prices paid to producers fell in January. Lower energy prices and a decline in auto and truck prices led that 0.6 percent decrease.

The deepening slump in housing could have broad implications for the economy. Rising home values have been an important component of economic growth in recent years, giving homeowners a sense of increased wealth and emboldening them to tap the equity in their homes to pay for improvements and renovations, and other major expenses such as college tuition.

Historically low interest rates provided an added incentive to spend.

With interest rates now higher and the real estate market stagnant, some analysts expect consumers to reverse course and clamp down.

However, David Lereah, the chief economist for the Realtors' association, said he felt the group's recent price study caught the housing market at its low point.

"This information confirms 2006 was the year of contraction, and hopefully the fourth quarter was the bottom of this current business cycle," Lereah said in a written release accompanying the report.

Housing Starts Fell Sharply In January (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The predicted bottoming-out of the housing market appears, for now, to still be just a prediction.

The Commerce Department said yesterday that construction of new homes in January slowed to the lowest rate in almost a decade. And in a sign that the months ahead could hold further gloom for the residential real estate market, the number of building permits issued last month also declined.

The seasonally adjusted annual rate of home starts dropped 38 percent compared with a year earlier, to 1.4 million in January, meaning that builders would start construction on only 1.4 million new homes this year if that rate continued. That compares with a rate of 2.3 million in January 2006. The number of building permits authorized fell to a rate of 1.6 million, from 2.2 million a year earlier — a 29 percent decline.

Economists said that some of the decline could be attributed to the weather — January was the first month this winter that was cold enough in many regions of the country to disrupt construction. But economists seemed to agree that most of the drop-off in residential construction indicated that builders were pulling back from a market that was oversaturated with unsold homes and short on buyers.

“I don’t think this is a weather story,” said David Seiders, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders. “I think this is real stuff. The question is, Where is the real bottom for starts and permits?”

The Northeast was the only region where construction did not decline. Builders there increased construction by 9 percent, compared with December.

The sharpest drop was in the West, where construction declined 29 percent. In the Midwest, construction fell 15 percent; in the South, it dropped 12 percent.

The sharp decline in January followed two month-to-month increases in new-home construction. Those numbers, combined with some encouraging mortgage application data and other signs of tentative improvement in housing, led some economists to conclude that the worst of the slump had passed. But the new statistics contradicted that notion.

“People started getting a little too excited,” said Richard F. Moody, chief economist of Mission Residential, a real estate investment firm. “Over the longer term, the outlook for housing is fairly positive. But it’s going to take us some time to unwind the excess buildup.”

To help shrink the growing backlog of unsold homes, builders are increasingly paying closing costs and offering other incentives like free vacations. In January, 52 percent of builders surveyed by the home builders’ association said they were paying closing costs. When the housing market was at its peak in 2003, as few as 10 percent of builders said they were doing so.

Because new homes account for only about 15 percent of all homes sold in the United States each year, some economists have pointed to signs of improvement in the market for previously owned homes as evidence that the housing downturn is stabilizing. The sales rate for existing homes rose in October and November, and was down less than 1 percent in December.

This week, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, told Congress that “some tentative signs of stabilization have recently appeared in the housing market.” He also noted the rather limited impact the slump had had on the rest of the economy.

Boom In The Mountains Creates A Housing Shortage (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

DOJ_NMG_0134136

BIG SKY, Mont. — The Big Sky region, just north of an entrance to Yellowstone National Park, has boomed in recent years, attracting skiers and other outdoor enthusiasts and fueling a construction and employment boom.

But soaring land prices and building costs have put the price of housing far beyond the reach of many new resort and construction workers.

Faced with a severe housing shortage for its workers, at least two resorts, the Yellowstone Club and Big Sky Resorts, picked an unusual solution. Each bought a motel it intended to continue operating for travelers, as well as for housing workers and contractors.

With its purchase of the Whitewater Inn, formerly a Comfort Inn, Big Sky Resorts picked up 56 rooms.

"We're a growing resort with 900 staff, and we want to attract the best staff," said Dax Schieffer, public relations manager for Big Sky Resorts, which is owned by Boyne U.S.A. "The plan is to have the employees stay here during peak season."

The Yellowstone Club is the new owner of Buck's T-4 Lodge, a 72-room motel just up the road from the Whitewater Inn.

The owner of the Yellowstone Club, Tim Blixseth, said his company had 500 employees and 1,000 subcontractors. Using Buck's to help house them will help reduce the "couple of million" dollars a year that the company spends for buses and mileage.

"It was a good strategic buy for us," Bob Sumpter, vice president for real estate development for the company, said. "We do not plan to change the operation one iota."

Both companies said workers would receive discounts on rooms, which rent for $100 to $150 a night depending on the season. Who gets those discounts and how much they amount to depend on what a worker's "job is and how much we need them," Mr. Schieffer said.

Many workers are choosing to double or triple up to save money, which can make for lively, if cramped, quarters.

Isabella Silva of Belo Horizonte, Brazil, lives in a Whitewater Inn room with three young male co-workers from Brazil. Each pays $230 a month for the crowded living space that is mostly taken up by three beds and a mattress on the floor. Ms. Silva and her roommates do most of their cooking in microwave ovens; they have wireless Internet and access to the motel pool and waterslide.

"These boys, oh my," Ms. Silva, 21, said shaking her head and smiling. "But it's O.K. We work most of the time. So we don't spend much time in the room."

Mr. Schieffer said he did not think that guests would mind sharing space with employees.

"I'd like to think everyone can get along," he said. "You don't say, 'Employees, don't go here,' or, 'Don't go there.' "

Instead, he said: "It's self-segregating. It works itself out."

Lots that sell for more than $200,000 today were going for a fifth of that three years ago, and construction costs run $700 or more a square foot, compared with $100 to $200 in most Montana cities.

Compounding the problem is the region's location, which is awkward to accommodate the boom. Big Sky is 32 miles southwest of Bozeman.

But the two-lane road between the two runs through a narrow canyon that is ice covered and treacherous in winter.

An estimated 1,500 cars commute back and forth each day.

"They all have to drive from Bozeman every morning and back," Cathy Gorman, a real estate broker here, said. "It's bizarre, and it's dangerous. We've had a lot of deaths on that road."

Public transportation is infrequent. The Yellowstone Club runs four or five buses a day between here and Bozeman.

Ms. Silva said she and many other workers took the ski bus to Bozeman at the end of a day and shopped all night at the Wal-Mart store there because there was no bus back until morning.

As a result, housing at the mountain resorts is the best option for many.

Kyle Zimmerman, born in Chicago, just moved from a two-bedroom condo crammed with skis, clothes and furniture that he shared with four other people.

The monthly rent was $1,300 plus utilities, and Mr. Zimmerman, who has two jobs, including one at a pizzeria, paid $200 for the right to sleep in a closet.

"To make it affordable, you have to cram people in," Mr. Zimmerman, 22, said. "It was all right for a year."

His replacement in the closet? "The guy that had the couch."

Not surprisingly, Mr. Zimmerman applauded the resorts' buying the motels.

"Every year, I hear there's going to be new employee housing, but it never happens," he said. "You've got to put them somewhere."

Humpty-Dumpty Housing (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

There is no sugarcoating the latest news on the United States housing market. The slump in home prices from the end of 2005 to the end of 2006 was the biggest year-over-year drop since the National Association of Realtors started keeping track in 1982. There are no reasons to believe that's the worst of it.

Prices fell in 73 of the nation's 149 major markets in the last quarter of 2006, compared with 45 declining markets in the third quarter, revealing a downturn that is not only deep but wide.

At the same time, the number of existing-home sales declined in 40 states, with precipitous drops in previously red-hot markets like Arizona, Florida, Nevada, California and Virginia.

On top of that, a glut of unsold homes virtually ensures that prices will fall further before sales pick up. At the end of 2006, the vacancy rate for family homes was the highest it has been since the Commerce Department started keeping records in 1956.

Yet it came as a shock to many economists yesterday when the government reported that construction of new homes fell in January by 14.3 percent. The consensus forecast had been for a drop of less than 3 percent.

The bust will slow job growth this year in construction and related industries and with it, consumer spending. The severity of these economic side effects will depend on the strength of the overall job market and the stability of interest rates — both of which are anybody's guess.

Squarely in harm's way, however, are low- and middle-income homeowners, many of whom have mortgages with rates that are due to adjust upward this year and next. With delinquencies already surging, it is inevitable that a combination of higher mortgage payments and weakening home prices will cause many homeowners to default.

Lenders and regulators should prepare to do all they can to help. During the housing bubble, regulators stood by as mortgages were extended to borrowers with poor or no credit and little or no money for a down payment. Now that delinquencies and defaults are rising, lending standards are being tightened dramatically. That will make it harder for many existing homeowners to refinance their loans, thus hastening defaults. Lenders and regulators must use the utmost flexibility in applying the new standards. They got marginal buyers into the homes in the first place. They should now make every effort to keep them there.

Stocks End Week Mixed On Weak Economic Data (WSJ)

By Joanna L. Ossinger

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Stocks took a breather after three straight days of gains, lagging most of the day, but pulled a quick move higher in the last hour to virtually break even.

Weaker-than-expected economic data and comments from Microsoft's chief executive indicating some revenue expectations were too high hurt the major indexes.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 2.56 to 12767.57, hitting a record for a third straight day with its late move into the black. The S&P 500 lost 1.27 to 1455.54, and the Nasdaq Composite Index was off 0.79 to 2496.31.

Small stocks and the broader market showed their strength. The Russell 2000 added 2.72 points to close at a record 818.15, and the DJ Wilshire 5000 ended at 14733.61, up 1.71 to a fresh seven-year closing high.

The major indexes all finished the week with gains of more than 1%. The Dow's weekly advance was its biggest in three months, and the index is up 2.4% year-to-date. The Nasdaq is up 3.4% on the year, and is 6.51 points off its six-year high, which was clocked on Jan. 12. The S&P 500 has advanced 2.6% so far this year.

Markets were rattled early Friday, after the Commerce Department said January housing starts plunged by 14.3% to a seasonally adjusted 1.408 million annual rate, the lowest point in nearly 10 years. Wall Street expected a 2.6% decline.

Timothy Rogers, chief economist at Briefing.com, said investors shouldn't make too much of the decline. "The volatility is expected," he said, particularly with weather turning worse in January after a mild start to the winter. Mr. Rogers said he was "looking for a stronger pace come the spring buying season."

The preliminary University of Michigan consumer-sentiment index declined to 93.3 in mid-February, from 96.9 in January. Economists had expected a smaller drop.

Also, Chicago Federal Reserve President Michael Moskow said in a speech that he thinks "the risk of inflation remaining too high is greater than the risk of growth falling too low," but his words seemed to have little effect on markets that just spent two days hanging on Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's words.

"It's likely almost an overt effort by Fed members" to do a balancing act on the signals they send, said Delta Global Advisors Chief Technical Strategist Bruce Zaro.

The Labor Department said the producer price index for finished goods fell 0.6% in January, after rising 0.9% in December and 1.8% in November. The core PPI, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, increased 0.2%. The numbers matched economist forecasts.

"The pressure on prices is somewhat muted now," Mr. Rogers said. He expects to see a gradual slowing of "contained growth." He noted that the next major economic release will be the Wednesday announcement by the Department of Labor on the January consumer-price index.

Big movers among Dow components included DuPont and Merck, up 1.4% and 0.9% respectively; Boeing, off 0.8%; and Pfizer, down 0.9%.

Microsoft shares slipped 2.4% to $28.74 after Chief Executive Steve Ballmer said some analyst revenue views for Vista might be too high considering what expectations are for personal-computer sales growth.

Continuing the flurry of merger-and-acquisition activity, Spain's Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria agreed to purchase Compass Bancshares for about $9.6 billion. The deal would give13 the Spanish bank substantial new heft in Texas, a market it has identified as a place for major expansion because of the flow of money between the U.S. and Mexico. Compass shares rose 6.5% to $70.70, while BBVA lost 2.5% to $25.57.

"There's a lot of cash out there, and I think investors are being relatively rational" with the premiums they expect from takeouts, said Jason Goepfert, chief executive of Sundial Capital Research. "I don't think there's speculative fervor" at this point.

Notable movers among other stocks included Sprint Nextel, which rose 2.1%, and Qualcomm, which sprang 2.9% higher. Qualcomm's MediaFlo system for broadcast mobile TV has been winning customers, and this week Oppenheimer upgraded the company to "buy" from "neutral."

A report in industry publication Automotive News suggested General Motors was in talks to purchase Chrysler Group. Chrysler parent DaimlerChrysler was up 4.4% to $73.33; GM slipped on the news, but recovered, ending 0.3% lower. Ford Motor, one of the most actively traded stocks on the NYSE, tumbled 0.8%.

Mills Corp. declined 4.6% to $25.48 after the real-estate investment company agreed to be bought by Simon Property Group and Farallon Capital Management for $25.25 a share.

Crude-oil prices added $1.30 to $59.29 a barrel as the U.S. government warned about an escalation of militant attacks in key producer Nigeria. OPEC's new secretary general said he feels the market is "stable."

In major market action:

Stocks broke even.14 On the New York Stock Exchange Thursday, 1,664 stocks advanced and 1,648 declined on volume of 1.36 billion shares.

Bonds gained.15 The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for every $1,000 invested, yielding 4.69%. The 30-year bond was up 9/32, yielding 4.788%.

The dollar strengthened slightly.16 The euro was at $1.3139 from $1.3145 at Thursday's close. The dollar was at 119.35 yen from 119.22 yen late Thursday.

Treasury Prices Climb On "Comforting" Data (WSJ)

By Laurence Norman

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Treasury-bond markets chalked up gains Friday, with prices rising modestly on weaker-than-expected housing and consumer-confidence data.

The benchmark 10-year note was up 4/32, or $1.25 per $1,000 face value, at 99 16/32. Its yield fell to 4.69% from 4.706% Thursday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 9/32 to 99 13/32 to yield 4.788%.

Morning gains briefly took the 10-year note's yield down to 4.66%, its lowest level since Jan. 10, before it reversed course in a short session. U.S. bond markets closed early Friday ahead of the Presidents Day weekend.

The data, including weak housing starts and soft consumer-confidence numbers, were "comforting" for bond markets, said John Spinello, Treasurys strategist at Jefferies & Co., indicating that housing "will continue to be a drag on the economy."

Mr. Spinello said there has been a string of weaker economic data in recent days which, alongside this past week's remarks from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, had helped the 10-year Treasury yield fall some 0.12 percentage point since Wednesday morning.

Investors read Mr. Bernanke's testimony to Congress Wednesday and Thursday as being less aggressive on the possibility of further Fed rate increases than they had feared.

Crude-Oil Prices Near $60 On Concerns About Nigeria (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Oil futures rallied 2.4% and climbed above $59 after the government warned about more militant attacks in Nigeria and the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' secretary-general said producers were showing compliance with the group's new oil-production target.

The rally followed a volatile week in oil markets and came as traders closed bets on lower prices ahead of the long weekend. Floor trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange is closed Monday for Presidents Day, but electronic trading on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange's Globex platform will be available.

The front-month March crude-futures contract on the Nymex jumped $1.40 to $59.39 a barrel, a sharp recovery from its intraday low of $57.59 a barrel. The contract expires Tuesday.

In other commodity news:

EXCHANGES: A lobby group representing users of the futures markets released a statement Friday expressing concern about the announced merger between the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and CBOT Holdings Inc.'s Chicago Board of Trade.

The two futures exchanges -- the largest providers of exchange-traded financial-derivative contracts -- would combine to create CME Group and have a commanding market share of more than 85% of the market for U.S. futures-exchange trading, said the Futures Industry Association.

The FIA said the announced deal -- while creating possible cost savings -- "would concentrate significant market power...substantially lessen competition...and raise even higher the barriers to entry for new competitors." The FIA said the emergence of new competition may "overcome the anti-competitive effects of the merger."

The CME said in a statement that its merger "increases competition in the global derivatives marketplace and better positions the U.S. to compete."

CORN: Prices on the CBOT climbed as the market reacted to a private weather company's forecast that wet weather in the spring could delay corn plantings and may be followed by dryness during the summer that could impede growth. Nearby March corn rose 9.5 cents to $4.17 a bushel.

COFFEE: Prices on the New York Board of Trade fell because of an increase in U.S. stocks of unroasted coffee beans. The March contract closed down 2.1 cents to $1.1320 a pound.

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is so candid with Congress, he may make members forget his predecessor.

FEDERAL RESERVE Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill this week was so clear and succinct — and bullish — that investors may soon forget about his predecessor, Alan Greenspan. Bernanke's message that the economy is enjoying healthy growth, low unemployment and little inflation soothed financial markets, but it was his forthright, substantive answers that awed members of the Senate and House committees that oversee the nation's central bank.

Indeed, Bernanke, who's been on the job just over a year, performed better than he should have, politely answering too many questions.

The independence of the central bank that oversees the nation's financial system and monetary policy — regulating the supply of money in the economy and interest rates — instills a great deal of confidence in the dollar and in the nation's financial sector. Such independence may seem an abstraction, but it should be a tangible reality to legislators charged with overseeing the bank's work. If they don't get it, who will?

So it was discouraging watching these senators (on Wednesday) and House members (on Thursday) expending so much hot air trying to get the patient Bernanke to agree to any number of their legislative priorities or pet theories.

He endorsed certain approaches to affordable housing development, "good policies" (as opposed to bad policies?) to deal with the nation's aging population, the building of liquefied natural gas terminals, reducing government guarantees for anti-terrorism insurance, moves to force more transparency in CEO compensation packages, health insurance portability, more preschool programs and fewer "Law & Order" spinoffs.

OK, he didn't get into TV programming. But he could have. The point is that the chairman of the Federal Reserve should refuse to wade into any policy debates that exceed his reach. Although Bernanke did say President Bush's tax cuts have been a net positive for the economy, he resisted repeated entreaties from members of both parties to take sides on upcoming battles over tax policy. This is what tarnished Greenspan's independence. In one amusing aside on Wednesday, Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) tried to make a case for why it's appropriate to have the Fed chairman talk about education (something about it being an "input") but not tax policy.

Bernanke probably felt that he was weighing in on what he considered noncontroversial (if also nonrelevant) issues, but he'd be wise to stick to macroeconomic conditions and monetary policy. The Fed's credibility will be enhanced every time he says, "That's none of my business."

Back At Home, McCain Annoys The G.O.P. Right (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

SURPRISE, Ariz., Feb. 13 — The chairman of the local Republican Party here in the most populous county in Arizona has in his possession a bright yellow button with a black line slashed through the name McCain.

“I don’t wear it out very often,” said the chairman, Lyle Tuttle of the Maricopa County Republican Committee, in a slightly sheepish coda to a 20-minute vituperation about the state’s senior senator, served up from his living room chair.

“I think those who do not support Senator McCain,” Mr. Tuttle continued, “if they could just get the word out and help people to understand what has happened with him, we could have an impact.”

No doubt about it, Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who would like to be president, is a popular man in his state, having won re-election in 2004 with about 76 percent of the vote.

But a vocal slice of the state’s most conservative Republicans, reflecting concerns about Mr. McCain held by some conservatives nationwide, are agitating against him in a way that they hope might throw off his incipient presidential campaign.

In a recent telephone poll by Arizona State University, 54 percent of the state’s Republican voters who were queried favored Mr. McCain in a presidential primary next February, a small enough majority to incite his critics and encourage some Republican rivals.

“Arizona is one place where we are very well organized,” said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for the presidential campaign of Mitt Romney, the Republican and former Massachusetts governor.

“We think we can go out there and make the case on pro-family issues, on fiscal issues and on strong borders,” Mr. Madden added.

Meanwhile, disgusted with Mr. McCain's position on proposed changes to immigration laws (he advocates legalization that would not require illegal immigrants to leave the country), with what some see as wavering on the issue of gay marriage (he lent his name to a state ballot initiative to ban it but did not support a constitutional amendment), and with the campaign finance act that bears his name, some Arizona Republicans are making trouble for Mr. McCain.

They have elected local party leaders whom he opposes, criticized his policy positions and thrown early support to other potential primary candidates — all in the hope of tripping up Mr. McCain on his own doorstep.

"They can make trouble for him," said Bruce D. Merrill, an Arizona State University political scientist and polling expert. "It is too early in terms of voting to tell, but it certainly could potentially affect people's decision to give him money."

The senator's supporters are quick to write off the detractors as a fringe of the raucous state party that will be flattened like pita bread once primary day arrives next year. As a practical matter, Mr. McCain's supporters point out, Arizona's large swaths of independent voters can vote in the Republican primary, which will be a boon to Mr. McCain even if he loses some votes within his own party.

"When I was a little kid, I was really into western movies," said Matt Salmon, former chairman of the Arizona Republican Party, who resigned with the intention to work for Mr. McCain's presidential campaign. "In one of those, the cavalry was outmanned by attacking Indians, so they put a bunch of branches on the backs of horses, who then kicked up a lot of dust to make it look like there were a lot more people than there were. These guys drag around a lot of branches and kick up a lot of dust."

Outnumbered or not, Mr. McCain's critics now hold leadership positions in Maricopa County, the state's most Republican enclave and biggest media market, which includes Phoenix. Their passion about the immigration issue, their flirtations with other candidates and their persistent harping underscore the skepticism about Mr. McCain that already exists among many hard-line conservatives here and around the nation.

They have been angered by Mr. McCain's opposition to tax cuts backed by the White House; by his immigration position, which places him on a collision course with other Republicans; by his moves to close a loophole on gun purchases; and by his vote for the fetal stem cell research bill.

The Maricopa County Republican Party recently conducted a straw poll that depicted Mr. McCain as losing badly to Representative Duncan Hunter of California, a conservative unknown to the majority of Arizona voters, then touted it with unmasked glee. The poll was derided as a sham by Mr. Merrill, the political scientist, and others who questioned the methodology.

Among some Republicans here, Mr. Romney, a Mormon who may benefit from his faith's strongholds around the state, is also mentioned as a viable alternative to Mr. McCain. Mr. Romney is supported by Joe Arpaio, the Maricopa County sheriff, among others.

Mr. McCain "can't just take it as a given that he is going to win here," said Randy Pullen, the new chairman of the Arizona Republican Party, who got the post by narrowly defeating a more moderate Republican backed by Mr. McCain. "He is going to have to work."

In some ways, Mr. McCain's troubles here reflect a fracas within the state party that has pit its more centrist members, long the stronghold of its leadership, against its most hard-line factions who call Mr. McCain "elitist."

For several years, various critics have complained that he has been aloof, that he has a brittle temper and that he has made missteps on key conservative issues.

Although Mr. McCain was ultimately victorious in the 2000 presidential primary, Gov. Jane Dee Hull of Arizona, a fellow Republican, took the unusual step of endorsing his opponent, George W. Bush, who was then Texas governor.

In 2001, two unsuccessful recall movements arose against the senator. In 2005, some groups around the state that advocate a strict deportation policy for illegal immigrants wrote letters of censure or displeasure attacking Mr. McCain for his stance. "The grass roots are burning mad," said Gary Watson, former chairman of the Mohave County Republican Central Committee. "We want to defend our borders. We don't want them to have citizenship."

So who would be better for Arizona?

“I am real excited about Rudy Giuliani,” said Mr. Watson, even though the former New York mayor has a more liberal record on abortion rights, gun control and gay rights than Mr. McCain. “The social issues are a little bit looser than what I appreciate,” Mr. Watson said. “But he is stronger than McCain on the border issue, and the border issue is so immense to deal with.”

While much of the rumbling against Mr. McCain is among party leaders, they have managed to leave an impression among some voters.

“I could be persuaded to vote for someone else,” Kathleen Hall, 60, a Republican who supported Mr. Bush in 2000, said as she sipped coffee in a Scottsdale outdoor mall this week. “McCain is not my favorite candidate. He would just as easily tomorrow turn into a Democrat.”

Mr. McCain, who was elected to Congress from Arizona in 1982 and who succeeded Barry Goldwater in the Senate in 1986, does not appear to be shivering.

“Folks recognize that he is a principled and committed conservative who has delivered for his constituents,” said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for Mr. McCain’s presidential exploratory committee.

And plenty of people think it is a fool’s errand to try to prove otherwise.

“Anybody who thinks John McCain wouldn’t win a Republican primary in Arizona is not living in the real world,” said Mr. Merrill, the Arizona State University political scientist.

That does not mean they won’t try.

“He would do a lot better in the general here than he would do in the primary,” said Jack Hustead, who chairs the Apache County Republican Committee, “because in a primary, there are other options.”

McCain To Preach Abstinence In S.C. (AP)

By Jim Davenport

Most presidential candidates are trying to get people to say "yes." Republican Sen. John McCain will be encouraging South Carolina students to say "no."

The Arizona lawmaker is scheduled to speak Sunday night to about 1,500 middle and high school students about abstaining from premarital sex. Abstinence and abortion loom large as issues in this first-in-the-South primary state in the heart of the Bible Belt.

"Senator McCain has a long legislative record of supporting abstinence-based initiatives in his record in the U.S. Senate," said Trey Walker, McCain's South Carolina campaign director. "He thinks that abstinence is healthier and should be promoted in our society for young people."

The event is to follow McCain's appearance at a hot dog and ice cream social.

McCain is courting Christian conservatives in his bid for the GOP nomination. Recently, Christian leader James Dobson said he wouldn't support McCain because of his opposition to a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. McCain opposes gay marriage but says it should be regulated by the states.

Alexia Newman, who runs the Carolina Pregnancy Center, said her student rally is costing about $22,000. McCain isn't putting money into the event, but "if he wants to support this rally, that'd be great," Newman said.

"We're excited he would want to come and endorse what we're doing," she said. "It's going to be a high-energy night."

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — While Democratic Sen. Barack Obama has the backing of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, rival John Edwards is getting the endorsement of the state's Democratic Party chairman.

Former state legislator C. Richard Cranwell announced his support for the former North Carolina senator two days after officials with close ties to Kaine said the governor will back Obama.

"This indicates that Virginia is in play for the presidential sweepstakes for the first time in a long time," Cranwell said in an Associated Press interview Friday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Republican Newt Gingrich has a message for all the presidential candidates: it's just plain stupid to start running this early.

The former House Speaker who might end up being a candidate derided the early entry into the presidential race by so many candidates.

"I think the current process of spending an entire year running in order to spend an entire year running in order to get sworn in January 2009 is stupid," Gingrich said at a National Press Club event with Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer of New York.

"I wouldn't consider thinking about running for president prior to late September," said Gingrich.

The only reason to start this early, he said, was to line the pockets of the high-paid political consultants.

The man behind the 1994 "Contract with America" that won control of the House for the GOP said a big part of the problem was current finance laws that force candidates to spend so much of their time fundraising.

Gingrich and Schumer appeared together to promote books they had written.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) — Arkansas' ethics panel dismissed a complaint Friday against former Gov. Mike Huckabee over the presidential candidate's destruction of computer hard drives from his office.

By a 3-0 vote, the commission voted to dismiss the complaint filed last month against Huckabee. Jim Parsons of Bella Vista, Ark., accused Huckabee of violating the state's Freedom of Information Act by crushing the computer hard drives before he left office last month.

Graham Sloan, director of the commission, said the panel ruled that it did not have jurisdiction in the case.

"We're just not the enforcement agency with regard to the FOI," Sloan said.

Huckabee has defended the destruction of the drives, saying it was done to protect sensitive information such as employees' or constituents' Social Security numbers and credit card information.

Huckabee spent the remaining $13,000 in the governor's emergency fund to destroy the computer equipment before he left office Jan. 9.

Hard drives for 83 computers and four servers were destroyed, or crushed, after some information was downloaded onto backup tapes, the Department of Information Systems said.

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Tom Vilsack says being a punch line to Jay Leno's jokes is a plus.

"When you are just below the margin of error in polls, anything anybody says about you is important," Vilsack said Thursday on NBC's "Tonight Show."

In the show's opening skit, a security guard would not allow Vilsack on the set because he did not recognize him. Leno came to Vilsack's rescue and verified that he was a presidential candidate and the show's guest.

Though Leno often poked fun at Vilsack's relative obscurity in the presidential race, the former Iowa governor argued that his appearance with Leno will help his candidacy and distinguish him from the better-known candidates.

"I think any time you get an opportunity to be in front of a national audience, especially an opportunity to show an interesting life story, it's going to help," Vilsack told reporters during a conference call after the show's taping.

Leno ribbed Vilsack about having a small campaign staff and asked him how he would compete with candidates such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

"I saw your skeleton crew out there — two guys and a Hertz rent a car. How's that work?" Leno asked.

"Well, I'm not a rock star," Vilsack replied, "I'm rock solid."

Rudy Giuliani Visits Richmond (WDBJ)

WDBJ7.com, February 16, 2007

Rudy Giuliani met with some of Virginia's Republican Party before heading to a Richmond dinner designed to fatten his war chest.

The Republican is changing his focus from motivational speaking to running full-time for President. As someone who's seen first hand what terrorist are capable of on American soil, Giuliani says now is no time for the U.S. to show weakness in the Middle East.

The former mayor lived in the Commonwealth while working in the Ford administration. He is expected to be back a lot this year.

Giuliani would like to see the nation devote more resources to developing alternative energies. He campaigned for Jerry Kilgore when he ran for governor several years ago. Now Kilgore is returning the favor. He's organizing Republican support for Giuliani in the Old Dominion.

Another presidential hopeful hoping Virginia will play to his favor is Senator Barrack Obama. The Democrat will be in Richmond tomorrow for his own fundraiser. He's also expected to pick up an endorsement from Governor Tim Kaine.

Romney Explains '92 Vote For Tsongas (ABC)

By Jonathan Greenberger

ABCNews.com, February 16, 2007

Republican presidential candididate Mitt Romney offered a new explanation today for why he supported a Democrat in 1992.

That year, Romney, then a registered independent, voted for former Sen. Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Democratic presidential primary. He told ABC's George Stephanopoulos, in an interview that will air Sunday on "This Week," that his vote was meant as a tactical maneuver aimed at finding the weakest opponent for incumbent President George H.W. Bush.

"In Massachusetts, if you register as an independent, you can vote in either the Republican or Democratic primary," said Romney, who until he made an unsuccessful run for Senate in 1994 had spent his adult life as a registered independent. "When there was no real contest in the Republican primary, I'd vote in the Democrat primary, vote for the person who I thought would be the weakest opponent for the Republican."

But 12 years ago, the Boston Globe reported that Romney was giving a different explanation for his vote for Tsongas.

"Romney confirmed he voted for former U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas in the state's 1992 Democratic presidential primary, saying he did so both because Tsongas was from Massachusetts and because he favored his ideas over those of Bill Clinton," the Boston Globe's Scot Lehigh and Frank Phillips wrote on Feb. 3, 1994. "He added he had been sure the G.O.P. would renominate George Bush, for whom he voted in the fall election."

Romney's contention that his vote for Tsongas was a vote for the weakest opponent for Bush - a phenomenon that political scientists refer to as "raiding" - surprised Professor William Mayer of Northeastern University in Boston.

"That would have been a strange election to have done that in, in the sense that Paul Tsongas was obviously going to carry his home state" of Massachusetts, said Mayer. Tsongas won the Massachusetts primary with 66 percent of the vote.

While statistical evidence of "raiding" is hard to come by, Mayer said most political scientists believe it is rare, since typically only 3 to 4 percent of voters in a Republican primary are actually Democrats, and vice versa. It is rarer still, he said, for an independent, as Romney was, to "raid": "If you're so determined to help George Bush in 92 that you're willing to vote for Paul Tsongas, it probably means you weren't an independent."

Romney has previously come under fire for donating to a series of Democratic candidates in the 1992 election, including then-Congressmen Dick Swett, D-N.H., and John LaFalce, D-N.Y.

What Matters About Mitt Romney (WP)

By Stephen Stromberg

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

In 1967, a moderate governor of Michigan ran for the Republican presidential nomination and, for a time, was a favorite among many in the party. His support for the civil rights movement also gave him valuable crossover appeal. But after reversing course on the Vietnam War, his campaign fizzled.

What did not ruin George Romney's aspirations was his faith.

Like his son Mitt, George Romney was a devout Mormon. Religion, as the truism goes, is far more influential in American politics today than it was in the 1960s. Forty years after his father ran, Mitt Romney's faith has elicited a cover story in the New Republic, a front-page feature in the New York Times and obligatory mentions in otherwise standard coverage of the formal kickoff of his campaign this week. Romney, it seems, might be the first presidential candidate since Al Smith whose campaign suffers seriously because of his regular attendance at Sunday services.

Writers often note that evangelical voters, now considered consequential in Southern Republican primaries, distrust Mormons. It is too easy, however, to claim that the two Romney candidacies' differing challenges simply reflect the altered composition of Republican primary voters since 1968. In a recent Post-ABC News poll, 35 percent of respondents said they would be less likely to vote for a candidate who is Mormon.

Regular cover stories in news magazines, such as Time's "Mormons, Inc." in 1997, highlight the role Mormonism now plays in the popular imagination and reflect a widespread fascination with the church. Having grown up Mormon in West Los Angeles, I know that many Americans outside of evangelical communities are uncomfortable with Mormonism. Somehow, my particular religious identification, hardly my defining characteristic, was adequate grounds for my high school nickname -- Stormin' Mormon -- and the basis for seemingly endless grilling on the faith's eccentricities. The church's history of polygamy, for example, is off-putting to many. But Mormonism can provoke extreme reactions for deeper reasons.

After decades of explosive growth, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is no longer a relatively small, quirky, American-bred offshoot of Protestant Christianity but an increasingly influential institution that erects large temples in major cities, sends most of its young men on two-year proselytizing missions and operates big businesses across the country. The Mormons, critics say, are secretive and strange, and they are controlling more and more of your world.

The church's growth in power and prominence reflects its highly organized structure -- headed by a prophet who Mormons believe speaks for God -- that not only encourages but demands unusually active participation from congregants. To some outsiders, this can make it seem conspiratorial. On the lower- and middle-management levels, the church does not employ a professional clergy. Instead, everyday members are integrated into the institutional hierarchy and balance this responsibility with their professional lives. Romney himself has served as a stake president, an office loosely akin to that of a Catholic bishop. This fusion of laity and clergy means that rank-and-file Mormons are bound to the pronouncements of church leaders in a way that Catholic parishioners are not -- indeed, rank-and-file Mormons often are the ones implementing church policy.

Mormon culture also precludes the sort of passive association with the church that many Christian denominations in the United States tacitly allow. Members are either "active" or "inactive," and to remain in the former category, one must regularly attend Sunday services -- which run for three hours -- and accept a role such as choral director or Sunday school teacher or stake president. To be Mormon is to be an exceptionally committed participant in the community. This demanding communitarian streak strikes some as cultish, leading to the fear that Romney would be a tool of the church's First Presidency.

But regardless of how uncomfortable some of these characteristics make some feel, it is unproductive to focus on Romney's Mormonism. A candidate's faith, like that of an L.A. high school student or anyone else is ultimately a complex and personal phenomenon, even in the context of a highly centralized religious organization. My experience in Mormon congregations across the country has taught me that it is impossible to tell precisely how individual Mormons will apply their religious principles to their professional lives. And beyond encouraging hard work and honesty, the church itself is hardly definitive on the subject. Consider the divergent examples of other well-known Mormons -- those of Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), say.

No one but Romney can know how his beliefs might affect his judgment. Instead of focusing on his faith, it would be much more worthwhile for voters to judge Mitt Romney on his evolving political agenda -- as Republicans did when George Romney ran in 1967.

Washington Goes Hollywood: Democratic Hopefuls Seek Cash (WSJ)

By John Harwood

DOJ_NMG_0134146

Campaign debates often turn on values. Next week, some important political players in Hollywood and Silicon Valley will demonstrate theirs: they like what's hip, new, attractive and future-oriented.

In the 1990s, that was Bill Clinton's breakthrough baby boomer presidency. In 2007, it's Barack Obama's multiracial, post-boomer candidacy.

That is why three luminous Hollywood names -- the Dreamworks trio of Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen -- are hosting an Obama fund-raiser in Los Angeles Tuesday. And it's why one of Mr. Obama's guides through Silicon Valley is Wade Randlett, an early Democratic force there through the TechNet advocacy group.

The two power centers represent increasingly important sources of Democratic campaign cash. The entertainment industry gave federal candidates $22 million in 2006 donations, according to the Web site opensecrets.org. That's more than either drug companies or the oil and gas industry. The $17 million from the high-tech industry lagged just behind those traditional powers. Nearly two-thirds of those entertainment checks went to Democrats, as did slightly more than half the high-tech money.

Hollywood will prove more hospitable. Antiwar sentiment is fiercer there, and Mr. Obama benefits from his early opposition to President Bush's Iraq policy in contrast to Hillary Clinton's 2002 vote to authorize the war. Silicon Valley keeps a closer eye on tax and regulatory policy, where Mr. Obama's views are less defined.

Mrs. Clinton -- soon to make her own northern California swing, including a visit to Google executives -- can boast of the shimmering New Economy boom on her husband's watch. And she will inherit important pieces of the financial machine that her campaign chairman, Terry McAuliffe, put together for Bill Clinton then. Media mogul Haim Saban, for instance, has signed up for Team Clinton once again.

The first woman with a prime shot at the presidency has some new backers, too. Legendary music producer Quincy Jones and executive Clarence Avant have agreed to help her -- especially valuable recruits this year because they, like Mr. Obama, are African-American.

"If those two put their shoulders to the wheel, that's a huge deal," says one of Mrs. Clinton's financial "Hill-raisers." That's a critical "if," because even the richest American can't contribute more than $2,300 to any candidate's primary campaign. In presidential fund raising, it takes a networker. Of course, the senator from New York has a potent financial network on Wall Street. The 2006 campaign donations from the securities and investment industries exceed those of Hollywood and Silicon Valley put together, opensecrets.org figures show.

The third top-tier Democrat, John Edwards, enjoys backing from fellow trial lawyers and lucrative ties to labor unions -- an even greater source of 2006 donations than securities and investment firms. But Mr. Obama's Left Coast trip next week makes clear he will prove a handful for both rivals in the early primary contest over money.

Young Voters Find Voice On Facebook (WP)

By Jose Antonio Vargas, Washington Post Staff Writer

Site's Candidate Groups Are Grass-Roots Politics for the Web Generation

Late on the day that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) announced he was forming a presidential exploratory committee, Farouk Olu Aregbe logged on to Facebook.com, the popular online community where college students post profiles, share photos and blog. On a whim he created a group called "One Million Strong for Barack."

"I remember thinking, there's got to be more supporters out there," said Farouk, 26, who advises student government at the University at Missouri at Columbia.

Farouk's group had 100 members in the first hour. In less than five days, 10,000. By the third week, nearly 200,000. Yesterday, a month after he created the group, it had 278,100 members.

There are more than 500 Obama groups on Facebook. One of the first, "Students for Barack Obama," was created on July 7 by Meredith Segal, a junior at Bowdoin College who first heard of Obama when he gave the keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention in 2004. Instead of starting "a petition or something" to encourage the freshman senator to run for president, she turned to her Facebook page, created a group and invited people (first her friends, later strangers) to join.

Now it's a political action committee with nearly 62,000 members and chapters at 80 colleges, the most structured grass-roots student movement -- there's a director of field operations, an Internet director, a finance director and a blog team director -- in the presidential campaign so far. "Young people are on the Web," said Segal, 21. "That's how we're organizing."

Obama's Facebook supporters post photos of Obama on their pages alongside snapshots of birthday parties, nephews and girlfriends. They link to the latest Obama news ("Gov. Kaine of Va. to endorse Obama"), talk about their favorite Obama quotes ("I think mine is, 'I'm so overexposed, I'm making Paris Hilton look like a recluse' ") and engage in a 24-hour conversation about their candidate ("I told you guys sometime back that once Obama announces his candidacy, the sharks are going to come biting . . ."), linked to one another in the kind of community reserved for longtime players of World of Warcraft or incessant "American Idol" fans.

A few weeks ago, Segal's group staged a rally at George Mason University that drew an estimated 3,000 students -- and an appearance from Obama himself. This past Sunday, her group's Iowa State University chapter helped promote a rally that attracted more than 5,000.

While the Illinois senator's presidential campaign has outpaced his rivals in the enthusiasm it has generated on Facebook and other social-networking sites such as Friendster and MySpace, no one knows whether such online excitement can translate to votes.

Ask Howard Dean, the Web candidate of 2004. The Democratic former Vermont governor raised millions of dollars on the Web, generated huge amounts of buzz and then learned during the Iowa caucuses that online excitement did not guarantee offline foot soldiers -- or the right foot soldiers in a state that likes its volunteers homegrown.

Meetup.com helped energize the Dean campaign, but more sophisticated social-networking sites such as Facebook, Friendster and MySpace were not a factor during the 2004 election. A recent Pew Research Center poll, however, reported that 54 percent of 18-to-25-year-olds have used them. And Joe Trippi, who spearheaded Dean's e-campaign, is among those who believe they will play a significant role in the current race.

"It took our campaign six months to get 139,000 people on an e-mail list," Trippi said. "It took one Facebook group, what, barely a month to get 200,000? That's astronomical."

Peter Levine, deputy director of the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, a nonpartisan research center at the University of Maryland that studies young potential voters, predicts what he calls "the Facebook Effect."

"Everybody -- the pundits, the online strategists -- have been waiting for the first candidate to really hit a home run with the social-networking sites," Levine said. "Obama's message is attractive to a certain type of young person. He's saying: 'You have a role to play. This is about you. About your role.' There's a real hunger for that kind of message."

Added Todd Zeigler of the Bivings Group, a D.C.-based Internet communications firm that works with Republicans: "The key point here is that the support for Obama on these social-networking sites is not being driven by the campaign itself. It is something spontaneous as opposed to something the campaign itself is orchestrating. This shows a real enthusiasm for Obama's candidacy among young people that you aren't seeing for any other candidates at this point."

Obama's main Democratic opponents, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.), have also used the Web to speak directly to voters, sidestepping mainstream media. But the Illinois senator's campaign seems to have taken some of its cues from sites such as Facebook. The campaign Web site, launched last Saturday, allows visitors to blog, keep track of their fundraising contributions, make a list of events and so on. And there is a Facebook link at the bottom of his home page.

K. Daniel Glover, who edits National Journal's Technology Daily, said that for candidates, "it's all about using the Internet to connect to people," the same way candidates connect with the local precinct chairmen and state party officials. But Glover cautioned against expecting too much from the Internet, especially when it comes to younger voters. "I don't think anyone is going to be elected because he/she is all the rage on Facebook," he said.

Clinton has about the same number of Facebook groups as Obama, but the largest has only about 3,000 members, and many of the sites are maintained by opponents. For every group called "African-Americans for Hillary Rodham Clinton" (95 members), there is a group called "A second Bush was bad enough, don't give me a second Clinton" (55 members). Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has some presence on the site; a group called "John McCain in 2008" has 1,617 members. And though Obama himself has a few detractors -- a group that calls itself "Anybody That Would Support Barack Obama for President is a Moronic Liberal" has 424 members -- no one comes close to his overall popularity.

Obama Stirs Columbia Crowd Of 3,000 (GAN)

By Ron Barnett

Gannett, February 17, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Barak Obama made his first campaign stop Friday in South Carolina, delivering a rousing can-do message to an enthusiastic crowd of 3,000 at Columbia's convention center.

"I don't believe in this can't-do, won't-do, won't-even-try style of leadership," the senator from Illinois said, drawing chants of "Yes, we can!" from the sign-waving throng.

Hitting one of the early primary states in the first week since announcing his candidacy for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination, Obama told supporters he doesn't believe those who say a black man can't be elected.

"Twenty years ago, nobody would have believed this crowd in South Carolina," he said of the racially mixed group.

He tried to distance himself from his rivals in the primary about the situation in Iraq, saying, "I'm proud of the fact that I was against this war from the start."

He talked about divisive politics preventing solutions to problems in health care, education and foreign policy.

He didn't mention the state's contentious Confederate flag display. The NAACP has called for a boycott of tourism in South Carolina over the presence of the flag on statehouse grounds, a few blocks from where Obama spoke.

Some who came to see Obama said they hadn't made up their minds about him but liked what they had seen.

"He's a family man, and I love his position on health care," said Kindle Johnson, a 30-year-old lawyer from Rock Hill, S.C., who was trying to decide between Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.

Reg Blair, a 43-year-old music professor at the University of South Carolina, said he is pretty much sold on the first-term senator from Chicago.

"I haven't been so inspired by a presidential candidate in a long time," he said. "I think he's the hope of the Democratic Party."

Obama wooed the crowd with his easy demeanor, joking about his "funny name" and looking even taller than 6-foot-2 on a square boxing-ring-sized stage.

He gave a brief history lesson, with each chapter, from the Revolutionary War to the Civil War to women's suffrage to the Civil Rights movement, illustrating that Americans have always done what conventional wisdom said couldn't be done.

"Each generation said we can do better than we're doing right now," he said. "Sometimes I feel like that spirit has been lost in America."

The crowd grew quiet as he spoke of 9/11 and his view of the mistakes the Bush administration made in its aftermath.

"Four hundred billion dollars, more than 3,000 lives, and we still see no end in sight," he said of the war in Iraq. "We've got to match our military might with the strength of our diplomacy."

He spoke of diverting money from the war to education and trimming inefficiencies out of the health care system if he is elected.

"There is no reason why by the end of the next president's term — by the end of my term — that we can't have affordable health care for every person in this country," he said, drawing cheers from the crowd.

He said South Carolina could benefit from his energy proposals for more home-grown bio-fuel and said America now sends $800 billion a year for oil to "some of the most hostile countries on earth."

"We end up funding both sides of the war on terrorism," he said.

Edwards' Populist Spirit Resonates With Silicon Valley Insiders (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, in an informal living room discussion this week with about 150 Silicon Valley insiders, said the Bush administration has failed America by demonstrating "enormous incompetence" at home in areas such as responding to Hurricane Katrina and abroad in Iraq.

The former North Carolina senator said that in the year and a half since Hurricane Katrina, "billions have been allocated" for rebuilding New Orleans without major relief to the vast numbers of poor residents.

"Is there any change? No, I can't see it," said Edwards, who announced his candidacy from New Orleans. "Where is that money?"

And in Iraq, where the president has called for increasing the number of troops by 21,500, he said, "the incompetence is almost beyond comprehension."

"I voted for this war. And I was wrong," he said. But it is "not enough for us to pass a resolution and give speeches" to condemn the president's troop increase, Edwards said to applause. "It's time for us to stop going along."

Edwards' shirtsleeves appeal during an intimate evening of dinner and conversation was delivered in the Woodside home of influential venture capitalist Andy Rappaport and his wife, Deborah -- both generous philanthropists and major donors to progressive political causes. With his under-the-radar trip to the Bay Area, Edwards, the Democratic Party's vice presidential candidate in 2004, displayed his strengths as a populist candidate who marshals the battle-hardened campaign experience of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the oratory gifts of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama -- the other leading Democratic presidential candidates.

Edwards' visit also dramatized how Silicon Valley has cemented its importance as the Hollywood North of presidential politics -- a required stop where candidates seek campaign cash and support among influence-wielding leaders in the capital of high tech.

Another Democratic presidential contender, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, used the setting of the Commonwealth Club of California in San Francisco this week to unveil a detailed policy to control greenhouse gas emissions, a favorite topic of Silicon Valley, where innovators are rushing to create green technologies. And Republican presidential candidate Rudolph Giuliani, the former New York mayor, addressed the Churchill Club in Santa Clara last week to talk up his leadership experience to tech leaders.

Obama is scheduled to meet Monday with tech gurus -- and has done his own culling of the area. Earlier this month, he addressed a conference call that packed supporters into a Peninsula home and raised $300,000 in about an hour, sources said.

Several of the guests at Edwards' talk this week said they also will attend a San Francisco lunch Friday for Clinton that will be hosted by major Democratic donor Susie Tompkins Buell.

In Woodside, Edwards' audience reflected the diverse profile of many of the valley's leaders: Some were longtime admirers, some were candidate shopping and some were Republicans disenchanted with their own candidates.

David desJardins, one of Google's early engineers and now a venture capitalist and consultant, said he and his wife, author Nancy Blachman, were happy to write checks to Edwards -- in addition to other leading Democrats such as Obama and Clinton -- to ensure that it is "not money, but ideas" that decide the Democratic race.

"We're feeling so positive that we have at least three good candidates," said Emy Thurber, a state Democratic Party official. "Edwards has a powerful message ... Hillary is so capable and skillful ... and Obama is smart, bright and young, with a great resume."

Still undecided, she said she would attend Bay Area fundraisers for Obama on Monday and Clinton on Friday.

Other Democratic presidential hopefuls include longtime Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Edwards, in his talk, addressed a range of issues that clearly resonated with many in the group: the war in Iraq, and matters closer to home such as the need to address what he called the "moral issue" of poverty in America and the opportunity gap.

"If we're not the party that stands up for the little guy, you tell me," he said, "who's going to do it?

"We need a president who actually believes in the capacity of our people ... to rise and create change. The power in America is not just in the Oval Office," he said motioning around the room to a crowd of nodding heads. "It's out here."

The former senator also encouraged debate from the politically attuned audience -- and, even in this wealthy crowd, stood his ground among those who questioned increased taxes on those making more than $200,000 a year to pay for his universal health care plan.

With some presidential hopefuls promising to trim the national deficit without raising taxes and tackle the expensive issue of health care, Edwards responded, "you can't have both. It's a lie to say you can have both."

Richardson Says NH His Early Top Priority (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 17, 2007

MANCHESTER – New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says he will focus more time, staff and resources to New Hampshire than to any other early primary or caucus state.

In an interview yesterday as he began a two-day swing through the first-primary state, the Democratic Presidential candidate said he will participate in a debate scheduled for April 5, to be sponsored by CNN, WMUR and the New Hampshire Union Leader.

He said that as a Westerner, he "must do well" in Nevada, where the Democratic National Committee has scheduled a new caucus after Iowa's traditional lead-off event but before the New Hampshire primary.

But, he said, "for me, New Hampshire is going to be my main state to concentrate on, staff-wise, resources. I consider this a breakthrough state for me."

Richardson said last summer he will campaign in New Hampshire even if Secretary of State William Gardner sets the primary for a date at odds with the DNC's calendar. He would risk losing any delegates won in New Hampshire by doing so.

Richardson said, "New Hampshire is very important because it's the state that everybody considers the state that leads to the Presidency, and I don't mind saying that. We've got to compete in every state, but New Hampshire will be the top priority for me."

Richardson said that while other Democratic candidates running for office may be receiving big endorsements, he has the most experience in the field as a current governor and former congressman, ambassador and energy secretary.

"I've actually done some of the things that need to be done" as President, he said.

Richardson yesterday planned to campaign in downtown Manchester, Concord, Tilton and Holderness and plans to be in Manchester, Concord, Portsmouth and Hampton today.

Richardson Urges Diplomacy In Mideast (AP)

By Beverley Wang

AP, February 16, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Bill Richardson said Friday that President Bush should learn from recent successes with North Korea and engage in intense diplomatic negotiations in the Middle East to end the Iraq war.

"He finally used diplomacy and it works," Richardson said on the first day of a two-day visit to the early voting state of New Hampshire. "My hope is that he uses that lesson ... to talk to Syria about Hezbollah and Iraq, and that he talks to Iran about getting out of Iraq and stop their meddling there.

"I believe that a good concrete dialogue with those two countries — with the U.S. having tough smart positions — could achieve something," the New Mexico governor said during a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

Richardson campaigned in the early voting state after raising $2 million at a fundraiser in New Mexico on Thursday. The total puts him in good standing in the Democratic race although he isn't as well known as some of his rivals.

Richardson, a former U.N. ambassador who has negotiated with North Korea and Saddam Hussein, said his own Iraq plan combines diplomacy with a troop withdrawal by the end of 2007.

Diplomacy could take two paths, he said. The United States should negotiate with Iraq's three main ethnic groups to set territorial boundaries and divide the government and control over oil.

The United States also should lead talks with Iran, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt to get their cooperation in securing and rebuilding Iraq.

"I believe that would at least give Iraq a chance to keep itself together and not be overrun by a sectarian conflict," he said.

On the same day the U.S. House passed a nonbinding resolution rebuking the president's decision to send more troops to Iraq, the former congressman said Congress should have spent time working on a resolution to bring a real end to the war.

"A nonbinding resolution I believe is just being done for cover for members that want to vote a certain way," he said. "They're worried about their re-election prospects."

Richardson: War Vote Should Decide Control (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 17, 2007

MANCHESTER – Congress should stop focusing on nonbinding resolutions and should vote instead on whether to take back from President Bush its 2002 authorization for the U.S. participation in the war in Iraq, Democratic Presidential candidate Bill Richardson said yesterday.

The New Mexico governor and former United Nations ambassador, congressman and Clinton administration energy secretary said he favors a "withdrawal with honor and dignity and efficiency." A "de-authorization" vote "would be based on the War Powers Act, and it would be the first statement on the war," he said.

The House yesterday passed a resolution disapproving of Bush's troop "surge" while pledging that Congress will "support and protect" the troops. The Senate is scheduled to take up the measure today.

But Richardson said lawmakers "should stop voting on resolutions that mean nothing."

In the first of a two-day New Hampshire campaign swing, Richardson said Bush should "use the lesson he just learned in North Korea," where he won a nuclear weapons agreement by having his administration negotiate directly with the North Korean government.

Richardson said a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq should be used as "leverage" for diplomacy. The United States should try to bring Iran, Syria, Egypt and Saudi Arabia into negotiations on "security and reconstruction."

At the same time, he said, the United States should convene a "reconciliation conference" in Iraq to include the Sunnis, the Shiia and the Kurds.

"You force them to have a coalition government, to divide up oil revenues, divide up the territory, not as separate countries, but territorial boundaries," he said.

Negotiating with Iran and Syria "won't be easy, but you can deliver benchmarks and tougher messages by talking directly to them, and you can see if there are areas of common ground."

Voting to de-authorize the war "would mean the President would lose the authority to conduct the war" but not immediately cut funding for the troops, Richardson said. "It would be the clearest legal message the President would get, and he would be forced to find a way to stop the war and engage in diplomacy.

"You withdraw with honor and dignity and efficiency, and you set up this diplomatic structure," he said.

Richardson supported Bush's call for more troops for Afghanistan, but said, "We're overstretched. I don't know where he's going to get them" while still conducting war in Iraq.

Richardson said the United States "is very vulnerable to oil shock, which will affect our national security." He said that as President, he would call for "an Apollo-like, man-on-the-moon effort" to reduce U.S. dependence on oil from 65 percent to 10 percent in 10 years.

"Not a little energy bill here and there," he said. "This will take massive public and private investment, tax incentives to develop renewable technologies." He would set fuel efficiency requirements at 40 miles per gallon and "concentrate on efficient fuels."

He would also promote "green buildings, solar roofs in schools, and retrofit homes for energy efficiency, more efficient air conditioning, more efficient lighting. And we will conserve, and the federal government will do its part."

Nuclear power "has to be on the table," Richardson said, "because it doesn't have greenhouse gas emissions. But what do you do with the waste? That has to be resolved."

He said that as energy secretary from 1998 to 2001, he issued an order that air conditioners had to be 30 percent more energy-efficient.

"The air-conditioning companies got mad," he said. "Bush came in; they reversed my order. But then we went to court and won.

"We tried to be more energy-efficient, but we didn't push as much as we should have," Richardson said. "I'm not blameless. We pushed, but the Congress wouldn't accept it. Big oil is still very strong."

But he said he does not advocate big taxes on oil. "Let's find ways for big oil to invest more in refining capacity and renewable energy and drilling in America," but not in the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR).

Richardson, asked how he differs from the other Democratic candidates, cited his endorsement last October by the National Rifle Association.

"I'm a hunter," he said. "I respect the Second Amendment. I'm not for assault weapons, but I'm a Westerner, and (hunting) is part of the culture."

He supports the death penalty for "the most heinous of crimes," is pro-choice and supports domestic unions, but opposes gay marriage.

On fiscal policies, Richardson said, he supports tax cuts for the middle class, including in capital gains. He said he would also cut taxes "for companies that pay more than the prevailing wage. I've had tax cuts for companies for technology start-ups" in New Mexico.

"The Democratic Party, our first solution is to tax, and I'm not of that school," he said.

Richardson supports universal health care programs similar to those in Massachusetts and California, "where you have mandates and incentives for workers and companies. It's a partnership that has to happen between hospitals, doctors and patients and the state and federal governments."

But, he said, "I believe you finance it through the budget. I would not be for financing it by new taxes."

He proposes ending congressional earmarks and would spend on community colleges some of the money saved by ending the Iraq war.

Sen. Joe Biden Touts His Plan For Iraq (AP)

By Henry C. Jackson, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

Sen. Joe Biden said he is the only Democratic presidential candidate who has a plan for Iraq, dismissing the ideas of other contenders as tactics that would leave the Middle East in peril. "They have tactics, not a plan," Biden told The Associated Press on Friday.

"What are they going to do, stop the civil war? ... There's a lot of people who have ideas about how to get out, but not many ideas about how to leave something more stable behind."

The Delaware senator, opening a three-day swing through Iowa, spoke during an interview at the Ames Municipal Airport before heading to the Story County Democrats Soup Supper for a speech.

Biden expounded on his plans for Iraq during the interview, and touted himself as the Democrat with the best and broadest knowledge of foreign policy.

Biden said violence in Iraq could be alleviated if the country implements what he calls a federal system, in which Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis would be divided into separate regions to avoid conflict.

"The only way you get control is if one of three things happen," he said. "One, one side wins in a bloodbath, ... two, the desire to fight expires, ... or three, you install a federal system."

Biden said his plan for Iraq and years of service on the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee, which he chairs, would allow him to make a compelling case to voters.

"I think the next president will have to show a depth and breadth of knowledge in national security matters," he said. "They'll need to have the right plans and right ideas."

DOJ_NMG_0134153

Biden said he believes his campaign will overcome remarks he made earlier this month about fellow contender Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill. Biden called Obama the "first mainstream" black to run for president, and referred to him as "clean" and "articulate."

Biden reiterated his previous apologies and noted that his campaign had secured the support of prominent black leaders since his comments.

"I think we're beyond that," he said. "And the good news is that I have a 35-year record on civil rights.

"But I'm not going to compliment anyone anymore. I should have been more sensible."

Biden's trip to Iowa is his first since formally announcing a presidential bid. The trip got off to a bumpy start Friday: An event at a veterans home in Marshalltown was canceled after bad weather forced Biden's airplane to land in Indiana.

Biden was also scheduled to depart Iowa early Saturday morning to return to Washington for a rare Saturday session of the Senate. Democrats need 60 votes to advance a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to boost the number of U.S. forces in Iraq.

"It's just too important," Biden said of the Iraq vote.

The vote meant Biden had to cancel several events he had been scheduled to attend on Saturday, though he planned to fly back to Davenport for a Democratic Party event. He also had a handful of events scheduled on Sunday in Iowa, which will open the presidential nominating season in January with its precinct caucuses.

Texas Senator Bucks Trend, Stands Solidly By Bush (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

In a sea of Republican doubt, Sen. John Cornyn of Texas is all about certainty.

He is certain that President Bush's decision to send more troops into battle is the right move. He is certain that Democratic war thinking is wrong. Despite the growing misgivings of so many GOP lawmakers, Cornyn is certain that the United States should stay in Iraq until the job is done.

The freshman senator is such a throwback to the early days of GOP fealty to Bush that his Senate Web site includes a "compassionate conservatism" link. Choosing survival over solidarity, other Republicans are seeking political cover. Cornyn, 55, is one of 20 GOP senators up for reelection in 2008, but he is trying a different strategy from most of the others: unwavering loyalty.

He not only supports Bush's troop-increase plan, but he describes any alternative in the starkest possible terms. "Are we going to allow Iraq to become another failed state which will then serve as a launching pad for future terrorist attacks, perhaps including against the United States?" Cornyn asked during a recent Senate floor speech.

"Now is not the time to choose a path of retreat and defeat -- as many of the [Howard] Dean Democrats would have us follow," he said in defending Bush's anti-terrorism strategy.

Cornyn opposes a nonbinding resolution approved by the House yesterday that criticizes Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq. The Senate is scheduled to meet in a special weekend session today to decide whether to begin debating that resolution.

Cornyn is a favorite at the White House, but his unalloyed defense of Bush's Iraq policies have some back home wondering whether he has gone too far.

"He's pretty much married himself to the president and to Karl" Rove, Bush's top political adviser, said Harvey Kronberg, editor of the Quorum Report political newsletter. "I'm just speculating, but we like to see a modest amount of independence here in Texas."

With his white hair and tall, regal bearing, Cornyn showed up in Washington in January 2003 as a Bush insider. He had a long friendship with Rove and possessed a nickname bestowed upon him by the president: "Corndog." Speaking at a campaign event before Cornyn's election, Bush called the former Texas attorney general "a man who can help us get some things done to make America a safer and stronger and better place for all of us."

The new senator's White House connections gave him instant clout. Cornyn won a seat on the high-profile, and highly partisan, Judiciary Committee and quickly took a prominent role in several major political battles, including a long-running dispute with Democrats over some of Bush's most conservative judicial nominees.

He gained a reputation as a vocal, if somewhat predictable, advocate for the conservative agenda. The one area where Cornyn has broken with Bush is immigration -- the senator has staked out a more conservative position. Having formerly served on the Texas Supreme Court, Cornyn is particularly bothered by "activist" judges, whom he accuses of promoting liberal causes from the bench.

The Democrats' takeover of Congress last fall was a wake-up call for many Republicans to begin distancing themselves from the White House. Cornyn himself branched out recently by teaming up with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) on a tobacco-regulation bill and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) on a homeland security funding measure.

On the war, however, he has been unwavering in his support of Bush.

Cornyn has sided with Bush on a series of controversial, war-related issues. He endorsed a White House proposal for trying "unlawful enemy combatants" that sought to limit Geneva Conventions protections. When the National Security Agency's secret program to intercept international telephone calls from the United States was revealed, Cornyn called it a "useful tool" to protect Americans from terrorism. He was one of nine senators to oppose an amendment to ban the use of "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" against anyone in U.S. government custody.

Some Republican war supporters, most notably Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), have harshly criticized Bush's handling of the conflict. Cornyn resists any such talk. In a recent CNN interview, Wolf Blitzer put him on the spot with the question, "How much of a credibility problem does the Bush administration have right now?"

Cornyn smoothly deflected. "Well, the problem is, Wolf, we have so many members of the United States Senate who are running for 2008, I think we need to put this in a larger context. But the fact of the matter is that we need to do whatever we can to protect our troops. And the fact is that the Iranians are very much involved in what's happening in Iraq right now."

Pressed on the subject in an interview, Cornyn conceded, "Clearly no war is going to proceed without mistakes, and I think there have been mistakes made."

Cornyn is not surprised that some of his Republican colleagues are turning skittish on Bush. "That's a function of the president's [poor] approval rating. When it's soaring, people are rallying around him. When his numbers are in the tank, that is diminished. But I really do believe that this is more important than the next election and who's up and who's down in Washington," Cornyn said.

The lack of daylight between Bush and Cornyn, particularly over the war, has raised a few eyebrows among Democrats and within Texas political circles.

"He needs to more clearly stand on his own two feet and stop saying, 'I agree with the president,' " said Cal Jillson, a Southern Methodist University political scientist.

"Even in Texas, total fidelity to George Bush is not the wisest move, substantively or politically," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the Senate Democrats' campaign chairman. "The whole world is changing. There's an opening in every part of the country, including in Texas, like there wasn't even five years ago."

Democrats' political prospects in Texas brightened considerably last year, after a Democrat captured the seat of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R) in the general election and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez won a surprisingly convincing victory over Rep. Henry Bonilla (R), in a December runoff election in the massive 23rd Congressional District.

A few weeks later, the Texas Blue, a progressive Web site, raised the question of Cornyn's potential vulnerability. The evidence: two years of monthly tracking polls that showed Cornyn's job approval rating barely breaking 45 percent and a random sample of Texas residents conducted in December that detected a slight shift in favor toward Democrats.

Cornyn questioned the tracking poll's methodology, noting the firm, Survey USA, relies on recorded "robocalls," rather than using live agents to query voters. But his reaction suggested he had seen the numbers. He has raised $3.2 million for his 2008 campaign, more than any other incumbent GOP senator.

"I'm preparing for whatever happens," Cornyn said.

California Gives Stem Cell Research Grants (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

BURLINGAME, Calif., Feb. 16 (AP) — California's stem cell agency gave out nearly $45 million in research grants to about 20 state universities and nonprofit research laboratories on Friday, far exceeding the federal government's annual outlays for stem cell work.

In issuing the first significant research grants in its two-year history, the agency, the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine, became the biggest financial backer of human embryonic stem cell research.

Stanford University researchers were the biggest winners, receiving 12 grants worth a combined $8 million, including the first publicly financed human embryo cloning project.

The Salk Institute in San Diego and the J. David Gladstone Institute in San Francisco were among the 10 nonprofit research centers receiving grants.

Next month, another round of 25 grants worth about $80 million will go to established stem cell scientists.

Loans Launch State's Stem Cell Ambitions (LAT)

By Mary Engel, Times Staff Writer

California draws on public money, awarding about $45 million to 20 research institutions.

SAN FRANCISCO — Public money began flowing to embryonic stem cell research Friday for the first time since Californians voted to make their state a haven for a scientific endeavor that the Bush administration refused to fund on moral grounds.

Drawing on a state loan, the board created to oversee the ambitious enterprise awarded 72 grants to 20 institutions statewide for a total of about $45 million.

The funding is a fraction of the decade-long, $300-million-a-year juggernaut voters approved under 2004's Proposition 71, the Stem Cell Research and Cures Act. But it signaled the determination of the voter-created California Institute for Regenerative Medicine to make the state a player in the nascent field even as the bonds remain frozen by litigation.

"We can't afford to wait when it comes to advancing a life-saving science," Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday at a news conference.

To tide the state over during the lawsuits, Schwarzenegger arranged the $150-million state loan last summer on the day that President Bush vetoed legislation aimed at loosening federal funding restrictions.

Bush has expressed moral concerns about destruction of embryos during such research, as have several plaintiffs in the California lawsuits.

The state money exceeds the $38 million the National Institutes of Health spent on human embryonic stem cell research nationwide in 2006. Federal funding is limited to research on 22 embryonic stem cell lines — each one a group of cells derived from the same embryo — that existed before August 2001, the day President Bush announced his policy.

"We all know every marathon starts with a first step," the governor said. "But let's take that first step. Let's start the marathon. Let's not hold it up."

Schwarzenegger, on crutches because of his December skiing accident and flanked by people in wheelchairs, called the scientists doing stem cell research "our newest action heroes."

The grants were a bonanza for the UC system, with UC San Francisco receiving eight; UCLA seven; UC San Diego and UC Irvine six each; UC Riverside, UC Santa Cruz, UC Davis and UC Berkeley receiving two each. Even the new UC Merced got one. The biggest winner was Stanford University, which took home 12 grants. USC received four. The private nonprofit Burnham Institute for Medical Research in La Jolla received eight.

All 72 grants ranged from $251,000 to $808,000.

Friday's two-year grants, aimed at young scientists and established veterans new to stem cell research, give a hint of the promise and challenges of this field of medical research. The work has generated both hope and hype since scientists at the University of Wisconsin derived the first human embryonic stem cells just eight years ago.

For the grant-awarding process, a group of 15 scientists from outside California and eight patient advocates from the institute's oversight board ranked 231 proposals.

The top-scoring proposal, drawing $612,000, was from UC San Diego. It will look for the signal that triggers a human embryonic stem cell to develop into a particular type of brain neuron. Stem cells are able to form into any kind of cell in the body.

"If successful," the proposal's synopsis reads, "these experiments would provide a therapeutic strategy for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease and other disorders that are characterized by loss of forebrain neurons."

It went without saying that such a result, if it is achieved at all, would involve years of research beyond the two funded by the grant.

"The project may not work but the applicant is the right researcher to try it," wrote the reviewers.

The board originally intended to award 30 grants for a total of about $24 million, but it increased the number of grants after seeing the scope and quality of the proposals, said Robert Klein, an influential backer of Proposition 71 and chairman of the oversight board.

"It's a historic opportunity to make a difference," Klein said.

After more than 12 hours of deliberation Thursday night and Friday morning, the full board made selections from the proposals, which were numbered and had the names of institutions and people removed. The institute staff advised board members, many of whom work for universities or institutions with proposals, on when to recuse themselves because of a possible conflict of interest.

The process drew some complaints from two government watchdog groups, which pointed out that Connecticut, which funds a much smaller stem cell research effort, identified all the institutions and scientists it awarded by name, including those rejected. The groups called on the board to publish the names of the California institutions that applied for grants but were denied.

But even they praised the spirited discussions and lengthy deliberations that went into choosing the grantees.

"Many of us had expressed concern that the board would act as a rubber stamp and not delve into this in a serious way," said John Simpson of Santa Monica-based Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights. "This is a very good process."

The litigation that has held up funding from the bond was brought by taxpayer groups and religious organizations. On Wednesday, a state appellate court heard oral arguments on the plaintiffs' appeal of a decision by the Alameda County Superior Court in April that upheld the constitutionality of the institute and its citizen oversight committee. The plaintiffs have said they will go to the California Supreme Court if necessary.

The state loan is to be repaid by bond money if the stem cell institute wins the lawsuit.

"They're on their own if they lose the litigation," said Ted Costa, who heads People's Advocate, a Sacramento-based taxpayer organization that is one of the plaintiffs.

Friday's awards were the first in a batch of three to be issued this spring, all funded by the state loan. The next will go to experienced stem cell scientists and the third to help fund shared laboratories.

Two Liberals Walk Into A Bar... (LAT)

By Martin Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

To many blue state-types, the Fox News Channel is already funny. But this weekend the media outlet famous for its patriotic fervor and red state champion Bill O'Reilly will try to be intentionally so.

Intended by its conservative creators as a counterbalance to "The Daily Show" and "The Colbert Report" on Comedy Central, "The 1/2 -Hour News Hour" premieres Sunday at 7 p.m. and will satirize current events and pop culture from a distinctly right of center viewpoint. Much like the 24-hour news channel itself, the show is out to fill a void in the marketplace, which the show's creators perceive as decidedly liberal.

"We thought it would be fun to have some unabashedly conservative entertainment," said Manny Coto, one of the show's creators and executive producers. "Our audience will be the millions who tune in to Rush Limbaugh and like-minded people who want that same kind of acerbic commentary and liberal bashing they get on his radio show everyday."

Added Ned Rice, another one of the show's creators and writers: "We're after the half of the country that doesn't think Jon Stewart is the only comedy that is needed."

Their show opens with something unlikely to be seen anytime soon on Stewart's "The Daily Show" or "Saturday Night Live." Limbaugh appears as the president of the United States and acid-tongued author Ann Coulter is his vice president.

The skit takes place in 2009 and is a joke, of course. Limbaugh was corralled into appearing in the skit by Joel Surnow, the show's executive producer and creator. The two struck up a friendship four years ago as a result of Limbaugh's enthusiasm for Surnow's hugely successful action-thriller program, "24."

So far, Fox News Channel has ordered only two episodes of "The 1/2 -Hour News Hour." The first one will receive an "encore" presentation Feb. 25, and a new second show is slated to air March 4.

Surnow is confident that even with minimal ratings, the show will be greenlighted for weekly production. That could happen, he added, as early as next week.

Even with the considerable success of "24," Surnow still had trouble getting the show on the air. The Fox network, which airs "24," turned it down. But thanks to a long-standing friendship with Fox News Chairman Roger Ailes, Surnow was able to convince the executive to give his new show a chance.

"I don't know how many people have been pitching shows like this," said Surnow. "But up to now, the ones that get on seem to be pretty liberal leaning."

Hollywood isn't exactly choking on a conservative talent pool, Surnow said, who nevertheless rejected the idea a liberal agenda has suppressed a program like his in the past.

"I just don't think there are a lot of conservative writers and most of them are probably apolitical or lean some to the left," he said. "There may be a little barrier to entry, but talent will eventually mow those down."

The " 1/2 -Hour News Hour" is structured in a mock news format like "The Daily Show," but instead of a single anchor, there are two. As billed, the first show takes aim at Democratic politicians, environmentalists and the American Civil Liberties Union.

In one bit, an anchor states that, if elected to the White House, Hillary Rodham Clinton has vowed to pick a diverse cabinet — of "angry lesbians."

In another bit, it's reported that Iran, the recent host of an international conference denying the Holocaust, is now denying that the meeting was ever held.

"There are too many liberal sacred cows," said Coto, who is also an executive producer on "24." "Like Hillary Clinton may get an occasional swipe here and there, but they don't go after them the way they go after Bush or Cheney."

The show released a clip earlier this week on the YouTube website mocking the media's hyperventilation over the presidential bid of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

The clip quickly climbed up the viral video charts with hundreds of thousands of hits by midweek. Of course, it's unclear whether viewers found the bit funny or were merely curious about the conservative stab at political humor.

What are liberal critics going to think of the show?

"They're going to love it," joked Surnow. "They're going to have another place to shoot all their arrows."

Fox News Takes On Jon Stewart (POL)

By Helena Andrews

The Politico, February 16, 2007

This Sunday at 10 p.m., Fox News Channel will debut a news/comedy hybrid the network hopes will deflate the crush young Americans have on Jon Stewart.

Produced by Joel Surnow, the brains behind Fox's hit "24," "The Half-Hour News Hour" is a mock news satire (but for conservatives) that will hopefully make everyone forget about Comedy Central's "The Daily Show." Some have dubbed it the "un-Daily Show."

"I thought it was hilarious," said Jason Apuzzo, co-director of the Liberty Film Festival in Los Angeles. The third annual festival showed a pilot of "The Half-Hour News Hour" in November. "I think there's definitely a market for something like this because I think that most of comedy tends to be oriented toward a more liberal sensibility."

Several blogs have had a less than warm and fuzzy reaction to the show. "What a pathetic attempt at comedy. I certainly won't watch it, but then I don't watch the Fox News Channel anyway," wrote one critic on Popwatch, a blog for the magazine Entertainment Weekly.

Ana Marie Cox had this to say on her Time.com blog: "As anyone who has dabbled in comedy can tell you, starting out with a political objective or message is pretty much death for the funny."

Surnow, however, knows his audience. In November he told the Hollywood Reporter that the show "would play more to the Fox News audience than the Michael Moore channel."

The New Yorker recently wrote a 7,000-word piece on the popularity of Surnow's other show, "24," and its conservative implications. The show, according to the magazine, operates off of the nation's paranoia since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Surnow, who sometimes enjoys a cigar in his office with buddy Rush Limbaugh, said that in Hollywood party affiliation doesn't matter when the ratings are up. So the fact that he's a conservative in notoriously liberal La La Land has been a non-issue until now. With the "News Hour" set to debut its first episode, he told the New Yorker he's been "exposed."

Of course, Youtube.com is already in on the action. A two-minute-long snippet of the show has been viewed 327,060 times as of Friday. The opening graphics are reminiscent of that other comedy show, with flying titles and the stock red, white and blue color scheme.

Anchor Kurt Long begins with this joke: "Illinois Senator Barack Obama admits that as a teenager he sometimes used cocaine. This news sent Obama's approval rating among Democrats plummeting to all-time low of 99.9 percent."

The studio then echoes with boisterous laughter.

And the Obama quips don't stop there.

"But in a related story Senator Obama has been endorsed for president by former Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry." And there was more on Obama's middle name, Hussein, and mock features in a fictional Barack Obama magazine, such as: "A Life in Politics: My 18-month Journey."

Whether or not the jokes are about Obama himself or simply the hype surrounding him (which everyone can agree on) is up to the viewer.

Apuzzo, however, remained open as to whether the show audience will wear red or blue. "I don't think that Joel intends this to be exclusively oriented towards a conservative market," he said.

The pseudo public service announcement that Fox ran to promote the show makes the matter somewhat more clear.

Fox News Channel's "1/2 Hour News Hour": Right Funny, In Spots (WP)

By Tom Shales, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Can political conservatives be funny? George F. Will and William F. Buckley Jr., among a few others, are great wits, but that's different from setting out to generate peals of laughter throughout the land, and managing to do it. "The 1/2 Hour News Hour," a new weekly series from Fox News Channel, aims in part to prove that the right is not so full of itself that it can't get off a zinger or two.

Obviously patterned after "The Daily Show" on Comedy Central (which was just as obviously patterned on the "Weekend Update" segment of NBC's "Saturday Night Live"), "The 1/2 Hour News Hour" (premiering tomorrow night) is for the most part a straightforward mock newscast in which lefties are by far the favored targets. Thus the question "Can the right laugh at itself?" is neither addressed nor answered.

Despite constant, unrelenting protestations that "the media" are controlled by liberals, conservatism has hardly been absent from recent popular humor. For years, a major contributor to "Update," and the author of "SNL's" "cold open" sketch, was a conservative Republican, James Downey. The outrageous puppet movie "Team America" used many Hollywood liberals as literal targets, blowing them to proverbial kingdom come.

All that aside, " 1/2 Hour" definitely has its moments. Anchors "Jennifer Lange" and "Kent McNally" (Jenn Robertson and Kurt Long -- why didn't they just use their real names?) sit at a simple desk and deliver the facetious items without any of the dreadful, overboard mugging and mincing of "Daily Show's" obnoxious Jon Stewart.

The show opens with something of a sketch, however: It's 2009 and guess who's president? Rush Limbaugh, whom we discover seated at an Oval Officey desk and reciting his lines mechanically. When he calls for the vice president, in walks that spooky vampire Ann Coulter, too malicious and frightening to ever be funny. Still, the pair do have a certain star power.

On comes the artificial news. Hillary Rodham Clinton has pledged wide-ranging variety in her version of a Clinton administration, it's reported; she vows to appoint "a diverse group . . . of angry lesbians." An overlong segment on politically correct children's books includes such titles as "Harry Potter and the Alternate Lifestyle" and, for the developmentally challenged, "The Little Engine That Couldn't Quite."

There's a running gag about environmental activist Ed Begley Jr. attempting to get to the studio in a car that runs on, among other things, poopy, and mock commercials trashing the American Civil Liberties Union -- "protecting criminals from people like you since 1920." Here, though, the desire to deliver partisan swift kicks tends to override any impulse to amuse.

On the other hand, a segment in which a "game-show host and climatologist" attempts to link all public events, including Britney Spears's lack of underwear, to global warming has its chucklesome side, as does a plea from "Girl No. 13 on 'Deal or No Deal' " to drum up more causes for Hollywood celebrities to support, because the supply is running low. The inevitable Barack Obama jokes include the observation that a minor scandal caused his popularity among Democrats to plummet "to an all-time low of 99.9 percent."

Executive-produced by Joel Surnow, the man behind Fox's sadistic and preposterous (one hopes) "24," and undoubtedly encouraged by enfant terrible and Fox boss Roger Ailes, "The 1/2 Hour News Hour" is on the semi-amateurish side some of the time, and when it picks on dead revolutionaries such as Che Guevara, it seems lazy as well as tacky.

But those on the left anticipating, and probably hoping for, some kind of ghastly disaster will be disappointed -- and may even feel like joining in the (apparently canned) laughter more times than they'd expect. In a nutshell: It isn't terrible.

The 1/2 Hour News Hour (30 minutes) premieres tomorrow night at 10 on Fox News Channel.

It's Reported, They Mock, You Decide (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

Making fun of the president is not ideological. Not making fun of the president, on the other hand, is.

And that's what distinguishes "The ½ Hour News Hour," a Fox News version of "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart," from most other satirical shows. Comedians like Mr. Stewart, Stephen Colbert, Jay Leno and David Letterman ridicule whoever is in power, be it Bill Clinton or President Bush, John McCain or Nancy Pelosi.

The Fox News comedy only leans on the left.

On a mock news program much like "Weekend Update" on "Saturday Night Live," the targets are Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, global warming, Hollywood liberals, politically correct children's books ("Harry Potter and the Alternative Lifestyle") and the American Civil Liberties Union. A few riffs by the fake anchors, Kurt McNally (Kurt Long) and Jennifer Lange (Jennifer Robertson), are funny, yet others fall flat. But strangely, given the current wealth of material, there are no jokes about Mr. Bush, Dick Cheney or I. Lewis Libby Jr.

Sometimes the humor is so heavy-handed that it seems almost like self-parody. The premiere tomorrow opens with Rush Limbaugh and Ann Coulter in a skit set in January 2009. Mr. Limbaugh is the newly elected commander in chief, and he tells his fellow Americans that his Democratic opponent, Howard Dean, is "finally getting the medical attention he has so desperately needed for so long," which is a strange joke for Mr. Limbaugh to make, given his history of pain killers and prescription fraud.

Any notion that Mr. Limbaugh is trying to be slyly self-deprecating is quickly deflated by the earnest indignation fueling this comedy show.

Almost 30 years after the Reagan revolution, conservatives have to tilt pretty far to portray themselves as marginalized and downtrodden. Republicans controlled the House and the Senate until only recently, and they still run the White House, but the impulse to paint themselves as a persecuted minority leading a cultural war against the Hollywood-led liberal media dies hard.

It's a strange new comic order when the actor and environmentalist Ed Begley Jr. and his hybrid cars loom larger than the Iraq war, the deficit or White House leaks.

It's not surprising that a Fox News comedy show would share the same bunker sensibility as the rest of the network. That 24-hour cable news channel was created as a conservative antidote to mainstream news organizations. The us-against-them empire keeps growing. Rupert Murdoch announced that his latest venture, the Fox Business Channel, would be "more business-friendly than CNBC." (If nothing else, that is perhaps a sign that Mr. Murdoch does have a sense of humor.)

"The ½ Hour News Hour" is not even the first comedy show on Fox News. "Red Eye," a loose and slightly naughty late-night talk show, has a conservative but flippant bent. The host, Greg Gutfeld, says his show is "like Anderson Cooper without the poppers." But the panelists are young and try to be hip, so they mostly talk off the cuff about sex, stupid news items and celebrities.

" ½ Hour" is more tightly wound. Some of the writing is clever. "After months of being criticized for hosting a Holocaust denial conference in December," Mr. McNally says, "the Iranian government is now denying that the conference ever took place." He adds, "Or if it did, that attendance figures were greatly exaggerated by a Zionist-controlled media."

But most of the punch lines are silly, and the material too skimpy and narrow in range. It has been a long time since anyone laughed at jokes about Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio.

There is nothing wrong with Fox News adding a comedy show to its roster, and in some ways it's quite fitting. Humor is by definition unfair and unbalanced, but it is most effective when it is more evenly and broadly spread.

Bush Discusses Mideast With Israeli PM, Saudi King (AFP)

AFP, February 17, 2007

US President George W. Bush discussed the situation in the Middle East with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah, the White House said.

The telephone talks came just before US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice headed to the Middle East to host a rare summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders that she hopes will break new ground in reviving peace negotiations frozen for nearly seven years.

Monday's meeting with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and Olmert was the focus of Bush's talks with the Israeli prime minister, the White House said in a statement.

Bush also "discussed the situation in Iraq and developments in Israeli-Palestinian affairs" with the Saudi king, the White House added.

Rice has in recent months heralded the existence of a "new opening" for progress towards Israeli-Arab peace and the creation of an independent state for Palestinians, and has billed Monday's summit in Jerusalem as a high-profile jump through that breach.

Wait-and-see Policy On Hamas Damps Expectations For Jerusalem Summit (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Officials have set the bar so low for a US-Israeli-Palestinian summit in Jerusalem on Monday that even a modest step towards a revival of the moribund peace process is likely to be spun as a giant leap.

DOJ_NMG_0134161

The Bush administration, bogged down in Iraq and assailed in Congress, badly wants to hear some good news from the Middle East. The timing, however, could hardly be worse.

Mahmoud Abbas's em-brace of Hamas, the Islamist group, has raised questions of the Palestinian Authority president's suitability as a peace partner, while a domestic crisis of confidence in Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, has cast doubt on his ability to break the deadlock.

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, who arrives tonight for bilateral talks with the two leaders before Monday's tripartite meeting, said peace efforts were "obviously more complicated because of the uncertainties surrounding the [Palestinian] national unity government".

The Hamas government that ruled the PA since the Islamists' election victory a year ago quit this week to pave the way for formation of a new cabinet in which it will share power with Mr Abbas's Fatah movement and independents.

The move, in the wake of a February 8 accord signed in Mecca by the two rival parties, brought enormous relief to the Gaza Strip, where more than 100 people had died in factional violence.

It left questions unanswered, however, on how far the new government would go to fulfil international principles that it recognise Israel, renounce violence and abide by existing agreements. Unless western donor countries are satisfied, an embargo on direct aid to the Palestinian government will remain in force.

In the hiatus between the Mecca accord and the government being sworn in, the US, its Middle East quartet partners - the European Union, United Nations and Russia - and even Israel have adopted a policy of wait-and-see.

"We don't like what's happened on the Palestinian side but we don't want to shut the door completely," a senior Israeli official told the Financial Times. "We will still try to work something out with Mahmoud Abbas."

The Israeli side, however, has quashed expectations, particularly in Europe, that Monday's summit might focus on skipping some of the more contentious elements of the Quartet's "road map" plan and head to final settlement talks, offering the Palestinians what diplomats call a "political horizon".

Tzipi Livni, the Israeli foreign minister, appeared tempted by the idea but it is not one that Mr Olmert would have much chance of selling to the right wing of his quarrelsome coalition.

Palestinians are now so buoyed by the Fatah-Hamas rapprochement that they see themselves as the most confident player within the trio of Israel, the US and the PA.

"Mecca gives President Abbas the freedom to negotiate. It was clear the US wasn't in favour of a Hamas government," said Ziad Abu Amr, an independent likely to be named as foreign minister in a new unity government. "But if the Americans are realistic, the best thing is to deal with Hamas in a constructive way."

Fatah officials and independents believe that Hamas, eager to rehabilitate itself in the eyes of the international community after a year of failed government, has moved towards the mainstream, despite its reluctance to recognise Israel.

"Fatah didn't embrace the Hamas political programme," said Mr Abu Amr. "I would say it's the other way round."

Israel, for the time being, tends to see the glass as half empty rather than half full. "The fact is Hamas moved a little bit, which is positive," said the Israeli official. "But we don't think it moved far enough. Mahmoud Abbas moved towards Hamas, which we don't like."

Palestinians officials meanwhile hoped their political accord would turn the Bush administration away from a perceived policy of seeking the removal of Hamas, by force if necessary. The White House's attempts to boost Fatah's military strength were set back this week when Congress froze $86m (£41m, €65m) destined to bolster Mr Abbas in his conflict with the Islamists.

"Hamas is now committed to the international rules," said Alaa Yaghi, a Fatah parliamentarian. "What more does the US want? If they don't want Hamas, it means they don't want peace on the ground."

Bush Plans Deep Cuts To Andean Drug War Budget (WT)

By Martin Arostegui, The Washington Times

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia -- President Bush's new budget calls for deep cuts in the leading U.S. program to fight drug trafficking in the Andean region, amid growing clashes over drug policy between Washington and leftist governments in Venezuela and Bolivia.

The cuts to the Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI) affect every country in the region except Colombia. They have been criticized by governments in the area, as well as by U.S. counternarcotics officials and some lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

"It would be the largest across-the-board reduction in aid since the war on drugs began," said one U.S. diplomatic official, who asked not to be named.

The ACI was designed to help local efforts to reduce the flow of illegal drugs, which surged in the late 1980s when cocaine production skyrocketed and powerful drug cartels emerged.

The ACI would receive $442.8 million under the fiscal 2008 budget that Mr. Bush submitted to Congress earlier this month, down 23 percent from the estimated spending for the current fiscal year and off nearly 40 percent from $727.2 million in fiscal 2006. The largest percentage cuts would be in Peru and Bolivia, which remain major producers of coca.

More than $2 million in anti-drug aid budgeted for Venezuela in fiscal 2007 was never spent as American officials feuded with populist anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez over counternarcotics policy. Venezuela would get no ACI money in the new budget.

Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro criticized the cuts, but told reporters in Caracas earlier this month that his country would not bend to U.S. "blackmail."

The Bush budget also proposed a sharp cut in ACI funds to Bolivia, where leftist President Evo Morales, a close Chavez ally, has announced a major increase in the amount of land set aside for legal coca production. Bolivia would receive $30 million in ACI money in fiscal 2008, down from almost $80 million in fiscal 2006.

Hugo Acha, a Bolivian legal consultant on drug policy, said, "There is no point in the U.S. giving aid if the objectives are not being met. The war on drugs appears to have become a mere formality."

But Ecuador's Foreign Minister Maria Fernanda Espinosa warned that the cuts will be seen as a punishment for countries in the region that elect governments that clash with Washington.

Even Peru, which has good relations with the United States, is facing a cutback.

Peruvian Prime Minister Jorge del Castillo said in an interview, "Peru should receive more aid rather than having it cut, in view of the magnitude of the problem we face, which is equal to Colombia."

Romulo Pizarro, Peru's top counternarcotics official, said he planned to lead a delegation to Washington next month to argue against the ACI reductions. He said Lima was meeting its objectives under the program.

"We understand the State Department wants to use the money from South America elsewhere," he said. Asked if he thought the money could go to Iraq, he said, "That's right."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended the cuts on Capitol Hill last week while facing pointed questioning from lawmakers.

Miss Rice said the administration was only shifting money to more effective programs on a country-by-country basis, while keeping overall aid to the region high. Much of the counternarcotics money would move to other development accounts and to the Millennium Challenge Corp., Mr. Bush's signature foreign-aid program.

"It's not just an across-the-board, mindless cut on Latin America," she said.

She acknowledged that some funds had been cut to countries that were less cooperative in U.S. counternarcotics efforts.

"There are some places, for instance, Bolivia, where our opportunities are somewhat more limited than they've been because of the nature of the government there," she said.

Another senior U.S. official earlier this week said the State Department was driving the ACI cuts.

The official, speaking on background, said the shift had wide support, but warned that as countries such as Colombia and Peru focus on development or "soft-side remedies," terrorists and drug cartels in the region could "strike back with a vengeance."

"Why signal to the rest of the Andean nations that those who line up with us will see a cut in funding for their anti-drug efforts?" the official said.

Scandal In Colombia Raises Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

BOGOTA, Colombia, Feb. 16 -- U.S. support for Colombia has been a foregone conclusion under the administration of President Ãlvaro Uribe, who was elected in 2002. But with a widening scandal tying the president's close supporters to paramilitary groups, policymakers on Capitol Hill say skepticism of Uribe's government is mounting, leading to closer scrutiny of a proposed aid package and free-trade agreement with the Andean nation.

On Thursday, Sen. Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Castro, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo AraÃºjo, was arrested along with three other senators and a congressman. Authorities said they are investigating links that those lawmakers -- along with a sixth legislator who remains at large -- may have had ties to a paramilitary organization that has terrorized the country for years while shipping tons of cocaine to U.S. cities.

And Friday, the Supreme Court, which is heading a probe of Congress, announced that it would provide prosecutors with documentation to help determine whether the foreign minister's father, Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Noguera, had ties to paramilitary groups and participated in the kidnapping of a businessman. The foreign minister's cousin, Hernando Molina, governor of the state of Cesar, is also under investigation by authorities for allegedly collaborating with paramilitary groups to carry out killings and finance his campaign.

Uribe said he would stand fast behind his foreign minister in the midst of a scandal that has put eight congressmen behind bars and led to the questioning of dozens of national and local politicians. At a news conference Friday, Foreign Minister AraÃºjo told reporters, "I'm going to keep working with efficiency, honor, results and joy."

Officials in Washington said Uribe's support for the foreign minister would not help the Colombian government in its negotiations with U.S. lawmakers.

"The effects of what we call 'para-gate,' among Colombia followers in Congress, are that more and more folks are starting to get a bit skeptical regarding support, because there's a question of how far-reaching the relationship between the paramilitaries and the government officials is, vis-Ã-vis the president," a senior aide to a Republican senator said on condition of anonymity. "The confidence that we have in Uribe has been what's carried this for so long. That confidence has been brought into question."

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia.

"Colombia F.T.A. cannot pass the Congress, as constructed, and Plan Colombia is in more jeopardy because of these scandals, the infiltration of the paramilitary into the inner workings of the Colombian government," Levin said by telephone from Washington. "I voted for Plan Colombia, at least the first few times, but this is a very worrisome development."

Though lawmakers in Washington remain intensely focused on Iraq, it is not lost on policymakers that Colombia remains the biggest recipient of U.S. assistance outside of the Middle East and Afghanistan. Nearly $4.7 billion has been funneled to Colombia since Plan Colombia, an extensive aid package designed to defoliate coca and erode support for Marxist rebels, was instituted in 2000. The assistance has helped Colombia lower violence and tightened bonds between Bogota and Washington.

But Colombia continues to produce more than enough cocaine to meet world demand. And despite a highly touted demobilization that started in 2003, paramilitary groups still thrive, with shadowy new forces killing rivals, union leaders and peasants while battling guerrillas for control of the country's lucrative drug business. In the midst of this tumult, the Supreme Court and a team of prosecutors have begun to unearth extensive ties between paramilitary commanders and dozens of congressmen, regional politicians from coastal states and mid-level administration officials.

For Uribe, the scandal couldn't have come at a worse moment. He, Vice President Francisco Santos and Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos have made recent trips to the United States to press for approval of a free-trade agreement and more assistance to help the state take control of an unruly countryside. In Colombia's latest proposal, Uribe and his cabinet say they want to spend $44 billion in the coming years -- a program that would rely on a heavy infusion of aid from Washington and European countries.

"The whole scandal and the fact that all of these people are close confidants of the president are really going to muddy the waters as they're looking at a free-trade agreement and a new aid package in a democratically controlled Congress," said Adam Isacson, who closely tracks U.S. aid to Colombia for the Center for International Policy in Washington. "The Colombian government has a rather big sales job ahead of it, and this makes it infinitely harder for them to do that sales job."

Vice President Santos, in an interview, said that the disclosures would never have come out if Uribe's government had not entered into negotiations with the paramilitary organizations, a process that he said not only led to a full-scale disarmament but emboldened institutions such as the Supreme Court to investigate authorities' paramilitary ties.

"We're going to deal with it openly, and confront reality and let the chips fall where they may," Santos said. "The most important thing is that we clearly present what we've done. The United States Congress should be totally calm about there being complete transparency here."

The Bush administration has reiterated its support for Uribe. "We remain committed to the free-trade agreement," Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, told reporters in Washington. He added that the administration would continue to back anti-narcotics operations in Colombia.

But the latest disclosures have drawn heated criticism, from organizations such as Human Rights Watch and from some of Capitol Hill's more influential shapers of U.S. policy in Latin America, including Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee.

"This confirms the concerns that many have had for a long time, that the paramilitaries have infiltrated the economic and political establishment of Colombian society," he said in a statement. "It should give us some pause as to who we are dealing with."

Chávez Threatens To Jail Violators Of Price Controls (NYT)

By Simon Romero

CARACAS, Venezuela, Feb. 16 — Faced with an accelerating inflation rate and shortages of basic foods like beef, chicken and milk, President Hugo Chávez has threatened to jail grocery store owners and nationalize their businesses if they violate the country's expanding price controls.

Food producers and economists say the measures announced late Thursday night, which include removing three zeroes from the denomination of Venezuela's currency, are likely to backfire and generate even more acute shortages and higher prices for consumers. Inflation climbed to an annual rate of 18.4 percent a year in January, the highest in Latin America and far above the official target of 10 to 12 percent.

Mr. Chávez, whose leftist populism remains highly popular among Venezuela's poor and working classes, seemed unfazed by criticism of his policies. Appearing live on national television, he called for the creation of "committees of social control," essentially groups of his political supporters whose purpose would be to report on farmers, ranchers, supermarket owners and street vendors who circumvent the state's effort to control food prices.

"It is surreal that we've arrived at a point where we are in danger of squandering a major oil boom," said José Guerra, a former chief of economic research at Venezuela's central bank, who left Mr. Chavez's government in 2004. "If the government insists on sticking to policies that are clearly failing, we may be headed down the road of Zimbabwe."

For now, Venezuela remains far from any nightmarish economic meltdown. The country, which has the largest conventional oil reserves outside the Middle East, is still enjoying a revenue windfall from historically high oil prices, resulting in a surge in consumer spending and lavish government financing for an array of social welfare and infrastructure programs. Dollar reserves at the central bank total more than $35 billion.

The economy grew by more than 10 percent last year, helping Mr. Chávez glide to a re-election victory in December with 63 percent of the vote. Yet economists who have worked with Mr. Chávez's government say that soaring public spending is overheating Venezuela's economy, generating imbalances in the distribution of products from sugar to basic construction materials like wallboard.

Public spending grew last year by more than 50 percent and has more than doubled since the start of 2004, as Mr. Chávez has channeled oil revenues into social programs and projects like bridges, highways, trains, subways, museums and, in a departure for a country where baseball reigns supreme, soccer stadiums.

In an indicator of concern with Mr. Chávez's economic policies, which included nationalizing companies in the telephone and electricity industries, foreign direct investment was negative in the first nine months of 2006. The last year Venezuela had a net investment outflow was in 1986.

Shortages of basic foods have been sporadic since the government strengthened price controls in 2003 after a debilitating strike by oil workers. But in recent weeks, the scarcity of items like meat and chicken have led to a panicked reaction by federal authorities as they try to understand how such shortages could develop in a seemingly flourishing economy.

Entering a supermarket here is a bizarre experience. Shelves are fully stocked with Scotch whiskey, Argentine wines and imported cheeses like brie and Camembert, but basic staples like black beans and desirable cuts of beef like sirloin are often absent. Customers, even those in the government's own Mercal chain of subsidized grocery stores, are left with choices like pork neck bones, rabbit and unusual cuts of lamb.

With shoppers limited to just two large packages of sugar, a black market in sugar has developed among street vendors in parts of Caracas. "This country is going to turn into Cuba, or Chávez will have to give in," said Cándida de Gómez, 54, a shopper at a private supermarket in Los Palos Grandes, a district in the capital.

José Vielma Mora, the chief of Seniat, the government's tax agency, oversaw a raid this month on a warehouse here where officials seized about 165 tons of sugar. Mr. Vielma said the raid exposed hoarding by vendors who were unwilling to sell the sugar at official prices. He and other officials in Mr. Chávez's government have repeatedly blamed the shortages on producers, intermediaries and grocers.

Those in the food industry argue that the price controls prevented them from making a profit after inflation rose and the value of Venezuela's currency plunged in black market trading in recent weeks. The bolívar, the country's currency, fell more than 30 percent to about 4,400 to the dollar in unofficial trading following Mr. Chávez's nationalization of Venezuela's main telephone company, CANTV, and its largest electric utility, Electricidad de Caracas.

Fears that more private companies could be nationalized have put further pressure on the currency as rich Venezuelans try to take money out of the country. Concern over capital flight has made the government jittery, with vague threats issued to newspapers that publish unofficial currency rates (officially the bolívar is quoted at about 2,150 to the dollar).

Regardless of efforts to stop illicit currency trading, the weaker bolívar has made imported food, fertilizers and agricultural equipment more expensive. Venezuela, despite boasting some of South America's most fertile farmland, still imports more than half its food, largely from Argentina, Brazil, Colombia and the United States.

Supermarket owners expressed relief when the government this week cut value-added taxes on retail food sales and raised the prices on more than 100 staples in an effort to alleviate the shortages. The announcement included an average 32 percent increase in beef prices and a 45 percent increase in chicken prices.

Following Mr. Chávez's nationalization threat, supermarket owners were cautious in their public statements. "As long as we are complying with the regulations, I don't believe there will be any type of reprisal," said Luis Rodríguez, executive director of the National Supermarket Association.

But many were clearly torn, afraid that their stores could be seized if they complained, but at a loss as to how to continue operating. "If I don't sell at the regulated price they'll fine me, and if I don't sell meat I'll be out of business," said a butcher shop owner here.

During his television broadcast, Mr. Chávez said his measures would be laid out in a decree, a power that his rubber-stamp legislature just bestowed upon him. He acknowledged that removing taxes on food sales would deprive the government of more than $3 billion in revenues, higher than the military budget, but he said tax increases on luxuries like beach homes and yachts would make up for part of the shortfall.

Mr. Chávez also said he would raise subsidies for state-owned grocery stores. Economists say such subsidies, together with hefty loans to farmers, have allowed the price controls to function relatively well until recent weeks.

But recent expropriations of farms and ranches, part of Mr. Chávez's effort to empower state-financed cooperatives, have also weighed on domestic food production as the new managers retool operations. So has the flood of petrodollars into the economy, easing food imports and making some domestic producers uncompetitive, an affliction common to oil economies.

"There seems to be a basic misunderstanding in Chávez's government of what is driving scarcity and inflation," said Francisco Rodríguez, a former chief economist at Venezuela's National Assembly who teaches at Wesleyan University.

"There are competent people in the government who know that Chávez needs to lower spending if he wants to defeat these problems," Mr. Rodríguez said. "But there are few people in positions of power who are willing to risk telling him what he needs to hear."

Mexico's Economy Loses Steam (LAT)

By Marla Dickerson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Sluggish manufacturing and falling exports to the U.S. are blamed for the deceleration. Slowing growth could spur emigration.

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's economy slowed in the last three months of 2006, and that could have consequences in the United States: Tough times in Mexico typically fuel immigration north of the border.

Mexico's gross domestic product expanded 4.3% in the October-to-December period from the final quarter of 2005, according to figures released Friday by the finance ministry. It was the third consecutive period of slower growth in the nation's economic output and a sharp decline from the 5.5% expansion registered in the first quarter.

The deceleration was blamed largely on a sluggish factory sector and a slowdown in exports to Mexico's principal customer, the United States.

Some analysts believe it portends a challenging year ahead for new President Felipe Calderon, who campaigned on promises of creating millions of jobs and vibrant economic growth for Mexico.

"When I took a look at some of the numbers I said, 'Uh-oh,' " said Eugenio Aleman, a senior economist for Wells Fargo & Co. in Minnesota. "Things are not looking good."

On the year, Mexico posted GDP growth of 4.8%, the strongest since 2000. High oil prices pumped record tax revenue into government coffers. The nation had a banner year in job creation.

But Aleman and other economists are cautious about the nation's prospects this year. The economy of the United States, Mexico's biggest trading partner, is weakening. Mexico's inflation has been rising, its oil production is slipping, and the nation's bellwether auto sector has hit a speed bump.

The United States has long served as an escape valve for struggling Mexicans, but there are signs that this funnel is tightening. Growth in the sums of money sent home by Mexican workers slowed to a trickle in November and December compared with the final months of 2005. It's an indication that stiffer border enforcement might be making it harder for undocumented Mexicans to reach America.

That will increase pressure on Calderon to reach a migratory accord with the United States. Unemployment in Mexico has soared. Rising prices on basics including tortillas, milk and eggs have sparked street protests. Millions of families rely on the remittances sent home, which have become the nation's second-largest source of foreign exchange behind oil revenue.

Much of the slowdown in economic growth is attributed to manufacturing. Mexico's factory sector expanded 3.1% in the final quarter of the year. In the first three months of the year it grew a sizzling 7.1%, driven by rebounding auto production.

But the Big Three's woes are being felt south of the border. The Mexican plants of Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and DaimlerChrysler account for about 70% of the cars assembled here, most of which end up in American showrooms.

A U.S. sales slump trimmed Mexican production and exports by 5% in December. The trend accelerated in January as exports tumbled to 88,915 vehicles, a 20.7% drop from January 2006.

Mexico's overall export growth slipped to 6% in November and 4% in December after an average increase of 19% over the first 10 months of the year. Industrial production grew an anemic 1.6% in December, much lower than forecasts.

Meanwhile, consumer prices have been rising. Mexico ended 2006 with an inflation rate of 4.05%, up from 3.3% in 2005, sparked largely by skyrocketing prices for tomatoes, tortillas and other basic foodstuffs. Further increases could force Mexico's central bank to raise interest rates, a move that would help curb inflation but would be a further millstone on growth.

"They don't want to tighten policy and increase the risk of a much sharper decline in economic activity," said Marcela Meirelles, Latin America economist with Trust Company of the West in Los Angeles.

Mexico's oil sector probably won't be as much of a help to the economy in 2007 as it has in years past. Petroleum prices have declined steeply since last summer's record highs, meaning less oil revenue for Mexico's treasury. Production also has fallen sharply at Cantarell, its largest oil field, a major worry in a nation that last year relied on petrodollars to fund nearly 40 % of public spending.

Remittances too are showing signs of weakness. Mexican workers last year sent home a record $23 billion to their families. But the pace of growth decelerated markedly over the course of the year.

In the first quarter of 2006, remittances grew 27.5% compared with the January-to-March period in 2005. In the final three months of last year, remittances were up just 5.5% over the same period the year before. November and December were virtually flat.

Slower growth could be a result of tighter U.S. border enforcement. That's a sign of progress for border agents but a potential blow for Mexico, where remittances have become a pillar of the economy.

"That's worrisome," said Christian Stracke, emerging markets analyst with New York-based credit research firm CreditSights Inc. He said remittances play a major role in Mexico's balance of payments. "It's something we're going to have to keep an eye on."

Stracke said Mexico's construction sector, which expanded 5.9% in the fourth quarter, should continue to be a bright spot in 2007.

He said credit should also help keep the Mexican economy moving. Banks and retailers last year extended record amounts of credit card, auto loan, mortgage and other retail credit, which has bolstered consumer spending.

Detained AIDS Doctor Allowed To Visit U.S. Later, China Says (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BEIJING, Saturday, Feb. 17 — China gave in to international pressure on Friday and agreed to release a prominent AIDS doctor from house arrest so she can attend an awards ceremony in Washington next month.

“We’re just really excited about it,” said Wenchi Yu Perkins, an officer with Vital Voices Global Partnership, a nonprofit women’s advocacy group that will honor the doctor, Gao Yaojie, in March along with other women from around the world.

“I just talked to Dr. Gao,” Ms. Perkins added. “She confirmed that last night an official visited and informed her that they would respect her wish to come to the U.S. I think that is the best gift for her for the Chinese New Year.”

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, an honorary co-chairwoman of Vital Voices, announced China’s decision on Friday after receiving the news from the Chinese ambassador in Washington. Mrs. Clinton said in a statement that she was “delighted” and that she had been assured that Dr. Gao would “be allowed to travel freely to the United States.”

Dr. Gao, 80, has been kept under house arrest since Feb. 1 in the central China city of Zhengzhou in Henan Province. Authorities detained her to stop her from traveling to apply for a travel visa , friends and AIDS advocates said.

Dr. Gao is famously outspoken, and although China has taken a more open approach toward AIDS in recent years, officials were apparently worried she might say something provocative or embarrassing in Washington. She gained international attention for her work helping to expose the government-sponsored blood-selling operations that caused thousands of farmers to be infected with H.I.V. during the 1990s.

Dr. Gao’s detention had attracted international attention and brought pressure on the Chinese government. On Tuesday, a provincial newspaper, Henan Daily, published a photograph and article detailing how provincial officials had visited Dr. Gao to wish her “sincere greetings” for the upcoming Lunar New Year. Many AIDS advocates saw the photograph and assumed it meant that China had released her. But, in fact, she was still under house arrest.

Dr. Gao could not be reached for comment on Saturday morning.

NATO Calls Antimissile Worries Unfounded (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Gen. John Craddock of the United States Army, who recently took over as the NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, said Russia had nothing to fear from a planned antimissile system that the United States wants to install in Poland and the Czech Republic. "It's been clearly stated what the U.S. intention is," he said, "and that is to provide defense against missiles from a rogue nation." Although he did not name any country, the antimissile site would be designed to stop attacks by Iran against the United States and its European allies. Last weekend, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia reacted angrily to the plan to install a missile defense system in former Soviet Bloc countries, saying it would set off a new arms race. On Thursday, Gen. Yuri N. Baluyevsky, the chief of the Russian military's general staff, said that if the United States went through with the system, Russia might drop out of the intermediate-range nuclear forces treaty of 1987, in which the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to eliminate land-based ballistic and cruise nuclear missiles with a range of 310 to 3,410 miles.

7 Get Life Sentences In Bombings Of Istanbul Synagogue And Office (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

ISTANBUL, Feb. 16 — A court on Friday sentenced seven Muslim men to life in prison and several dozen other people to lesser terms for their involvement in the deadly bombings of Jewish and British sites here in 2003.

The bombings killed more than 60 people and wounded hundreds more. Suicide bombers drove four explosive-laden trucks into two synagogues, the British Consulate and the HSBC headquarters here in two coordinated attacks five days apart. HSBC is a London-based banking and financial services company.

After a judge read their sentences, some of those convicted shouted, "Long live hell for nonbelievers!" and another yelled, "God is great!"

The life sentences were given to those who were determined to have been masterminds of the plot. Six of the seven denied any links with Al Qaeda and sought acquittal. The judge sentenced 41 other defendants to prison terms ranging from 3 to 18 years on a variety of charges, while 26 defendants were acquitted.

One of those who drew a life term was Louai al-Sakka, a Syrian whom security officials have described as a senior member of the Qaeda network in Iraq. He was found guilty of planning the attacks and providing financing.

Mr. Sakka was arrested in 2005 in Turkey while, according to the authorities, he was preparing a suicide attack on an Israeli cruise ship that was to carry tourists to Antalya, a Turkish Mediterranean port. At the time, the police said plans for the attack and high-powered explosives had been found at his residence.

Earlier this week, local news organizations said Turkish intelligence officials had told them that Al Qaeda had planned to kidnap Mr. Sakka on the way to the courthouse, a warning that prompted heavy security for the last two days of the trial.

Friday's session was dominated by another defendant, Harun Ilhan, who proudly declared himself a member of Al Qaeda and declared that he had been the ringleader of the four Istanbul bombings.

He read from a 700-page defense that he carried in a plastic grocery bag, spending more than four hours reading 83 pages about his hatred of the Turkish state and social deterioration in non-Muslim societies before the judge interrupted, asking him to summarize the rest.

Mr. Ilhan refused, saying, "You have this one-time chance to see why I've done this, became a member of Al Qaeda, how Al Qaeda works and has been supported worldwide, but you're just shutting me up."

After a brief exchange, the judge found Mr. Ilhan in contempt of court and ordered him out of the courtroom, but he refused to move and was carried out by five army guards.

Erkan Gabi Talu, 39, who lost his 8-year-old daughter, Annette Rubinstein Talu, and his mother, Anna Kant Talu, in one of the attacks, watched as Mr. Ilhan was removed. He said he was disappointed to have been denied access to the courtroom at the time of the sentencing.

"I've been waiting for all these years to see their faces at time of the verdict, but I'm denied this moment of limited joy," Mr. Talu said. "In my next visit to her grave, I wished to tell my daughter that she could rest in peace, but with all these acquittals and mild jail terms, I will not be able to do that."

The 2003 attacks were shocking for Turkey's predominantly Muslim population because of the high death toll, but also because Turks thought the country would be spared attacks by radical Islamic militants.

Seven Jailed For Turkey Bombings (BBC)

BBC.com, February 16, 2007

A court in Turkey has sentenced seven people to life in prison for the 2003 Istanbul bombings which killed 58 people including the UK consul-general.

A Syrian, Loai al-Saqa, was jailed for masterminding and securing finance for the attacks on the UK consulate, two synagogues and an HSBC bank branch.

The remaining six were Turkish citizens convicted of organising the bombings.

A total of 74 people were tried - many received lighter sentences and 26 of them were acquitted.

As the verdicts were read out to a packed courtroom, several defendants shouted "God is great".

The judge ruled that five of those sentenced to life, including Saqa, should not be allowed to benefit from any sentence reductions or amnesties.

'High-level operative'

The court was told that a group of men, calling themselves Warriors for Islam, came together to plan the attacks on the direct orders of Osama Bin Laden.

In court, many of the defendants admitted attending training camps in Afghanistan for Islamic extremists - but all but one man denied any part in the Istanbul attacks.

The UK consulate in Istanbul was one of the targets Harun Ilhan, one of the men jailed for life, admitted plotting the bombings and being a member of al-Qaeda.

Saqa - who had denied involvement in the attacks - was described by the state prosecutor as a high-level operative for al-Qaeda.

"Hey my hero brothers! Do not worry for me. Victory is very near," Saqa said during final arguments.

Also sentenced to life in prison were Fevzi Yitiz - for helping to build the truck bombs - and Yusuf Polat, Baki Yigit, Osman Eken and Adnan Ersoz.

Seyit Ertul was convicted of leading an al-Qaeda cell in the Turkish town of Konya and was sentenced to 18 years in prison.

Hamid Obysi was sentenced to 12-and-a-half years for membership of al-Qaeda, bomb-making and producing false identity cards

Twenty-nine people received sentences of six years and three months and 10 more were sentenced to three years and nine months for helping the bombings.

UK Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett welcomed the verdicts.

"These were abhorrent acts, two of which specifically targeted British interests," she said.

Rwanda Genocide Accusation Causes An Uproar (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

A French judge says the current leader, Paul Kagame, ordered the killings that set off the genocide.

— More than a decade after the genocide, a mystery still lies at the heart of Rwanda's darkness.

But France's most celebrated anti-terrorism magistrate believes he knows who assassinated two African presidents on April 6, 1994. The shooting down of the Rwandan presidential jet that night was followed by the killings of an estimated 800,000 people, most of them members of the Tutsi minority.

In a report to French prosecutors late last year, Magistrate Jean-Louis Bruguiere accused the Tutsi leader who is now president of Rwanda, Paul Kagame, of ordering the assassination.

DOJ_NMG_0134170

The investigation includes allegations that U.S. and U.N. officials helped quash earlier inquiries to protect Kagame, an ally of the United States.

The French judge's report, which was obtained by The Times, has caused an uproar in Africa and Europe, and led Kagame's government to break off relations with France.

A United Nations tribunal is judging perpetrators of the genocide, but the ghosts of Rwanda still haunt a world community that failed to intervene. French investigators do not claim that the assassination was the sole cause of the genocide. Tensions already were growing between Tutsis and Rwanda's majority Hutus. But Bruguiere alleges that Kagame sacrificed fellow Tutsis in a brutal "political calculation" aimed at toppling the Hutu-dominated government.

"Kagame deliberately chose a modus operandi that, in the particularly tense environment ... between the Hutu and Tutsi communities, could only cause bloody retaliation against the Tutsi community," says the judge's report, which recommends that prosecutors file formal charges.

Former U.N. investigators who initially looked into the assassination told Bruguiere that their bosses had blocked efforts to pursue leads implicating Kagame. The 67-page French report presents testimony from exiled Kagame bodyguards, spies and commanders. They identified a commando team that allegedly shot down the plane, killing President Juvenal Habyarimana and the president of neighboring Burundi, as well as their aides and the French crew.

In November, Bruguiere issued warrants for nine high-ranking Rwandan officials in the investigation, which he opened in response to a complaint from the widow of one of the French pilots. The judge also urged a U.N. war crimes tribunal on Rwanda to investigate Kagame, who as a head of state is immune from prosecution.

The warrants put Rwandan suspects in danger of arrest if they travel, and Kagame also could be in jeopardy once he leaves office. But a trial in France seems remote for now.

In response to the warrants, Kagame accused the French of trying to conceal their ties to former Hutu leaders and said the prosecution amounted to blaming the victims.

"Mr. Bruguiere is an impostor, a politician," Kagame said. "If he were a judge, he would raise the question of the implication of France in the genocide of the Tutsis in Rwanda."

Magistrate ruffles feathers

Bruguiere's eight-year investigation led French detectives through a diaspora of Rwandan exiles in Africa, Europe and North America. It also revealed intrigue sometimes pitting France and its African allies against forces supported by the United States and Britain.

Bruguiere, 63, has ruffled diplomatic feathers before. He charged six Libyan intelligence officials, including the brother-in-law of the nation's leader, Moammar Kadafi, in the bombing of a flight from Zaire — now known as Congo — to Paris in 1989 that killed 170 people. The charges irritated French diplomats who had been trying to improve relations with Kadafi, but a French court eventually convicted the Libyans in absentia.

The high-profile Rwanda prosecution could culminate the career of the swashbuckling French magistrate. Facing mandatory retirement in two years, Bruguiere is likely to run for the legislature this spring and could also aspire to a Cabinet post.

Critics accuse Bruguiere of grandstanding and sloppiness. His report contains "disconcerting errors" such as misspelled names, Le Monde newspaper said. One of the witnesses, a former Kagame soldier living in Europe, has reversed his testimony and denied that he participated in shooting down the plane.

But a former chief U.N. investigator applauded Bruguiere for taking a new look at the case. The version of events advanced by the Rwandan government is that extremist Hutus killed the president as a pretext for launching the genocide, but Rwandan authorities have never charged anyone in the assassination.

"People feel very comfortable because there's a version of history out there, they've published books, made films, and they feel comfortable leaving it alone," said Michael Hourigan, an Australian who says he quit in disgust when ordered to stop investigating Kagame. "Someone needs to explain why there's been no investigation."

Among the dozen Tutsi dissidents who testified in the inquiry was Aloys Ruyenzi, a former Kagame bodyguard with the wary manner of a man accustomed to looking over his shoulder.

Ruyenzi, 35, says he fled to Europe because Rwandan operatives tried to kill him when he turned against the government. During an interview, he confirmed the testimony he gave to Bruguiere.

"It was my wish to testify," he said. "Nobody forced me to do it."

Ruyenzi is one of many English-speaking Tutsis who grew up in Rwanda's neighbor, Uganda. He received military training in Uganda and became an intelligence sergeant in a Rwandan exile force led by Kagame. He recalls with pride that he was chosen in 1992 to become one of Kagame's bodyguards.

Kagame led an incursion from Uganda, a U.S. ally, into Rwanda, where Hutu governments had for years repressed the Tutsis, often brutally. His crack 600-man guerrilla army forced a truce with Habyarimana, a Hutu who had staunch French backing.

Ruyenzi said he stood guard on March 31, 1994, as Kagame and five top aides discussed shooting down Habyarimana's plane. Col. Theoneste Lizinde, a military advisor, was a key plotter, Ruyenzi said.

"Lizinde was from Rwanda, not an exile, so he knew the territory more than the others," Ruyenzi said. "Lizinde gave the report on where the plane should be shot. The place was near the airport. My testimony was not hearsay. I was an eyewitness. I heard what Kagame said. I was in the room. His quote was: 'If the president does not die, we could not win the war.' "

Ruyenzi and other witnesses testified that shoulder-borne Soviet-made SAM-16 missiles were smuggled to the area in a load of firewood. On April 6, a missile team infiltrated a Hutu-controlled semirural area near the airport in Kigali, the Rwandan capital, the report says.

Habyarimana and President Cyprien Ntayamira of Burundi returned together that evening from peace talks in nearby Tanzania. Their Falcon 50 jet descended into the sights of the commando unit about 8:25 p.m., according to the report. It names Sub-Lt. Franck Nziza as the fighter whose missile blew up the plane and sent flames and wreckage raining onto the presidential estate next to the airport.

"They came back ... and said what they did," Ruyenzi said. "They were promoted."

Hours later, Hutu soldiers intercepted two radio communications, one in the presence of a U.N. peacekeeping officer, in which Kagame's troops alluded to their success, investigators say.

French investigators later traced the missiles to a stock sold by Russia to Uganda, which provided them to Kagame's troops, the report said.

Investigators say that rising hostility between Hutus and Tutsis before the assassination, as well as the downing of the plane, contributed to the genocide that followed. Extremist Hutus had been broadcasting venomous anti-Tutsi propaganda over the radio for weeks. But the investigators accuse Kagame of exposing Rwandan Tutsis to murderous retaliation by Hutus in a ploy to create chaos and seize power.

The Kagame government adheres to the contrasting theory that extremist Hutus angry about the peace deal with the Tutsis killed Habyarimana.

At first, that scenario shaped the thinking of Hourigan, the Australian former U.N. investigator, and his American deputy, retired FBI supervisor James Lyons, who were sent to the killing fields in 1996 to lead a multinational team.

"All the academic and press comment was that it was Hutus around the president," Hourigan said. "But we never, ever met anyone who could give us substantive information to back up those leads. They were empty statements, vague and very generalized."

Leader implicated

In early 1997, U.N. investigators developed three informants close to Kagame who implicated their leader.

"They had firsthand knowledge, and they said it had been a special unit that did black-bag jobs," meaning covert killings, Lyons said in an interview. "Two of the informants knew each other, but the third didn't [know either of them]. That lent credence to what they were saying."

On March 7 of that year, Hourigan used a secure phone at the U.S. Embassy in Kigali to report to Louise Arbour, a war crimes prosecutor based in The Hague, according to testimony.

Hourigan says the prosecutor encouraged him. But when he visited The Hague days later, he said, she ordered him to drop the investigation of Kagame.

DOJ_NMG_0134172

"She had already made her mind up," Hourigan said. "It was almost like the end of a marriage. It wasn't a debate."

Arbour, now the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, has declined to comment.

Hourigan also testified that he thought there was a link between his call on the U.S. Embassy phone and Arbour's about-face. He said in his testimony that he suspected that U.S. spies learned of the emerging focus on Kagame and that Washington leaned on U.N. brass to protect the Tutsi leader.

U.S. officials who served under President Clinton say it is farfetched to think Washington helped quash the investigation. But Herman Cohen, the assistant secretary of State for Africa under President George H.W. Bush, said the idea was plausible because U.S. officials felt guilty about failing to intervene in the genocide.

"The Clinton administration really did everything possible to protect Kagame," Cohen said.

A spokesman for the U.N. genocide tribunal, based in Arusha, Tanzania, declined to comment on that debate. But he said Hourigan's internal report has remained available to prosecutors.

The tribunal has "enormous interest" in Bruguiere's report, spokesman Everard O'Donnell said. But it has not officially received the report and will not be pressured by outside forces, he said.

"Nobody tells the prosecutor what to do," O'Donnell said in a telephone interview.

He said the trials so far had contradicted the idea that the assassination triggered the genocide.

"The whole point about the genocide is that it was planned, preplanned," O'Donnell said. "Although the crash, the killing of the presidents, plays a role, it is not the cause of the genocide."

As for the accusations against Kagame, O'Donnell said the evidence was mixed. "The position is very much today that it's a whodunit," he said. "And we don't know whodunit."

Potential witnesses killed

In a chilling footnote, two potential witnesses identified by the U.N. investigative team were killed in Nairobi, the Kenyan capital, team officials and French investigators say.

Lizinde, named as a lead plotter, was kidnapped and slain in 1996 as he prepared to write a book about the assassination, the French report says. His family accuses Rwandan agents of the killing, citing documents in which Lizinde said he fled to Zaire and then Kenya after being targeted by Kagame's forces, the report says.

The other man slain was former Interior Minister Seth Sendashonga. Kenyan police accused a Rwandan diplomat of trying to kill him in 1996 and deported the official; Sendashonga was killed two years later.

A former Rwandan military intelligence agent living in the United States testified that the killing was the work of a covert unit created to silence dissidents. Sendashonga was dangerous because he "knew about the project of the attack on the presidential plane," the witness, Jean-Pierre Mugabe, told French investigators.

Ruyenzi, the former bodyguard, worries about meeting the same fate. Having lost loved ones in the horror nearly 13 years ago, he said, justice should disregard politics and ethnicity.

"I'm a Tutsi and I don't support anybody who is a criminal," he said. "If he is a Tutsi, let him answer for what he did. If he is a Hutu, let him answer for what he did."

UN Chief Proposes Ambitious Overhaul (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Ban Ki-moon, the United Nations' new secretary general, on Friday warned that an unprecedented global surge in UN peacekeeping operations had left its leadership "impossibly overstretched" and unable to cope without serious reform.

In an ambitious restructuring proposal sent to the General Assembly, he said in the past three years alone nine missions had been started or significantly expanded and three more were on the way.

There are 100,000 peacekeeping personnel in the field, an all-time high, and over the coming year that could increase by 40 per cent. "Our system is dramatically strained and overstretched . . . at a time when we can least afford it," Mr Ban said. "The current approach for mounting and sustaining peacekeeping operations will not sustain the explosive growth."

The core of his proposal is to split the peacekeeping department in two by creating a new department for field support. This would also take in parts of the UN that deal with personnel management and recruitment, and free peacekeeping operations officials to focus on strategy.

Mr Ban, however, faces a deep reluctance by governments to cede any authority to UN bureaucracy. After a troubled first month, he was beset by complaints from rich and poor countries alike that he was not consulting enough and that his team did not appear to understand how the UN worked.

Mr Ban appears to have listened to the criticism. On his return from a two-week trip, he began an outreach campaign with influential countries. The complaints have subsequently become more muted.

"He has done a better job in explaining his proposals now," said a western diplomat, although there remained confusion over the process. "Certainly it is not the way it was two weeks ago: a lot of people want to help him, and don't want the sec retary general to fail in the first thing he does," the diplomat said.

Edward Luck, an international affairs professor at Columbia University who has been advising Mr Ban, said: "In retrospect there was probably more of a problem with presentation than substance. . . It's a good sign that the more he explains the more he people are comfortable with it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

NY Man Accused Of Wanting To Fund Terror (MH)

The Miami Herald, February 17, 2007

NEW YORK - A businessman was charged Friday with secretly trying to pass along thousands of dollars to buy night vision goggles and other equipment for a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, was accused in Manhattan federal court of financing terrorism and material support of terrorism.

The indictment said he accepted an unspecified amount of money between June and December to transfer $152,000 that he believed was being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support an Afghanistan terrorist training camp.

The indictment also charged him with scheming to defraud investors by obtaining millions of dollars for a "Flat Eletronic Data Interchange" and promising high guaranteed rates of return.

Alishtari, also known as Michael Mixon, was scheduled to make an initial court appearance Friday afternoon. It was not immediately clear who would represent Alishtari in court, where he was born, or whether any money actually reached terrorists.

'TERROR' $$ MAN CHARGED (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, February 17, 2007

A Westchester businessman and purported peace activist was nabbed by the feds for allegedly plotting to funnel more than $150,000 to terrorists at training camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, an American-born Moroccan from Ardsley, was ordered held without bail yesterday for agreeing to send $152,000 overseas to pay for night-vision goggles and other equipment for terrorists during an FBI sting operation.

The accused terror buyer was nabbed by the FBI Thursday and charged with providing material support to terrorists, as well as money-laundering and wire-fraud charges, which carry a maximum of 95 years in prison.

Prior to his arrest, Alishtari, 53, also known as Michael Dixon, had agreed to cooperate with law enforcement. But the deal fell through before he provided substantial assistance, according to a source close to the case.

Alishtari also is accused of swindling millions of dollars in a bogus Bronx-based loan program.

Defense lawyer David Greenfield entered a not guilty plea on behalf of Alishtari and declined further comment.

Alishtari drew media attention in 2003 for launching an annual movie project in Florida called Global Peace Film Festival.

The self-described activist has also posted poetry on numerous Web sites advocating peace and radical Muslim ideology, as well as personal pledges to dedicate his time and money to stopping child slavery, fraud and violence.

Ardsley Businessman Accused Of Aiding Terrorists (WPJN)

By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR, THE JOURNAL NEWS

White Plains Journal News, February 17, 2007

NEW YORK - An Ardsley businessman was accused yesterday of trying to funnel $152,000 to terrorists for night vision goggles at a training camp in Afghanistan.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of 472 Ashford Ave. was arrested in New York City by agents with the Joint Terrorism Task Force of the FBI and New York City Police Department. An indictment was unsealed yesterday in U.S. District Court in New York charging Alishtari, who claims to be a banker, with financing terrorism, material support of terrorism, money laundering, wire fraud and conspiracy.

Federal prosecutors accuse Alishtari of accepting a payment to transfer $152,000 for an unidentified party with the understanding that the money was going to be used to fund terrorist training in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Alishtari also is accused of scamming millions of dollars from investors through a phony loan investment program called "Flat Electronic Data Interchange."

A woman who answered the phone at Alishtari's home yesterday and identified herself as his wife cried when informed of the charges against her husband. She said she last saw him Thursday when he left in a cab for a business meeting. FBI agents later raided the family's home, she said, without telling her why they were there.

"My husband is innocent," she said and declined further comment.

On his blog and on an MSN group titled "atalishtarispeeches," Alishtari calls himself a "conservative Republican" and a "Reagan Republican" devoted to peace, dedicated to halting child slavery as well as "Internet fraud, violence and online scams hurting innocent children, women, and families so help me God."

He blames past problems with Flat Electronic Data Interchange, which has an office in the Bronx, on an unnamed convicted financial fraud artist. Alishtari says he now heads a company called IDPixie LLC that purports to offer identity theft protection solutions. He also claims to be a two-time recipient of the National Republican Congressional Committee's New York state Businessman of the Year award. He says he founded the Global Peace Film Festival. Efforts to reach Nina Streich, the festival's director, were unsuccessful.

Federal authorities released few details about how the case against Alishtari started. The indictment makes no mention of an undercover operative or a cooperating witness. It is unclear whether the case was based on a sting operation.

The indictment charges that Alishtari arranged for the transfer of $152,000 in funds that "he believed were being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to be used to support a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan." He is accused of transferring $25,000 from a bank account in New York to one in Montreal as part of the scheme.

Alishtari was arraigned before a federal magistrate in Manhattan and ordered held without bail. He faces up to 95 years in prison if convicted. His lawyer, David Greenfield, did not return calls seeking comment.

Feds Say He Helped Fund Terror Camps (NYDN)

New York Daily News, February 17, 2007

A Westchester County peace advocate has been charged with sending $152,000 to overseas terror camps to pay for night-vision goggles, Manhattan federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, was accused of providing material support for terrorists in a five-count indictment handed up yesterday.

Late last year, Alishtari agreed to transfer $152,000 that he knew would be used to fund terror camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan, prosecutors said. And from 1998 to 2004, he allegedly scammed millions from investors by guaranteeing high returns - returns that didn't materialize.

Alishtari, who posts free-form peace poetry on the Internet, is also accused of money laundering for allegedly transferring $25,000 from a New York bank to one in Montreal, knowing that the money was going to terrorists, prosecutors said.

MAN FACES TERROR SUPPORT CHARGES. A Westchester County man was arrested Friday on charges he attempted to send more than $150,000 to a terrorism training camp in Asia so that night vision equipment could be purchased, officials said. Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, was charged in a six count indictment unsealed Friday in Manhattan federal court with attempted material support of terrorism and other charges. He was ordered held without bail. The indictment accused Alishtari, whose country of origin and citizenship weren't disclosed, with attempting last year to transfer $152,000 that he believed was being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support a terrorism training center. The indictment said that the money was to be used to purchase equipment such as night vision goggles. Alishtari, who officials said lives in Ardsley, also was charged in the indictment with trying to launder $25,000 in cash by sending it to Canada to help terrorism. The indictment also accused Alishtari, known also as "Michael Mixon," with running a massive investment fraud from 1998 to 2004 that caused millions of dollars in losses. - ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO

PINK HOUSE GANG LEADER CONVICTED. The leader of Brooklyn's Pink Houses gang faces life in prison after being convicted Friday on conspiracy and extortion charges. Larone Graham, 37, was convicted on eight of 12 counts in federal court in Central Islip. The jury deliberated for more than a week and also acquitted him of a robbery charge and three counts of firearms possession. In addition to conspiracy and extortion, Graham was convicted of a weapons charge and one count of using explosives during the commission of a felony. U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert will sentence Graham on May 11. Graham was accused of running a crew of thieves who robbed jewelry stores, a Manhattan clothing store, a Brooklyn cigarette wholesaler and a drug dealer. The robberies, which began in December 2003 and continued until January 2005, often involved pistol-whipping employees whose hands were bound with plastic ties, prosecutors said. Two robberies occurred on Long Island and others took place in every New York City borough except Staten Island. In one incident, Graham ordered the abduction of a rival, Jamel Thompson, who was suspected of taking more than his fair share of the $2.5 million stolen by the gang. Prosecutors said Thompson was taken to Rockaway Beach, where a Pink Houses member used a pistol to fire point-blank shots at him. Thompson survived and testified against Graham. Defense attorney Bruce Barket of Garden City said he was "saddened but not surprised" by the verdict, adding he was pleased that Graham was acquitted on four counts. Barket said he plans to appeal. - CARL MACGOWAN

B'KLYN JURY INDICTS COP'S HUSBAND. The husband of a cop was indicted Friday by a Brooklyn grand jury in the attempted murder of city police Officer Andrew Suarez in Park Slope, officials said. Jose Rivera, 31, was charged with attempted murder in the first and second degree and attempted assault in the incident last Saturday, according to Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes. Suarez was shot while in an unmarked police car on Sixth Avenue and Prospect Place. He was wounded in the attack but has been released from the hospital. According to Hynes, after Rivera pulled up next to a Suarez's car the officer pulled out his badge and asked Rivera if he was lost. It was then that Rivera pulled out a gun and fired, hitting Suarez, Hynes said in a prepared statement. Officials said that the other cops in the car with Suarez returned fire and struck Rivera's car several times as it drove away. Rivera's wife, Officer Jacqueline Melendez-Rivera, is suspected of trying to hide her husband's bullet-riddled car. She was charged with obstructing governmental administration, hindering prosecution and tampering with physical evidence. Melendez-Rivera, 37, was not indicted Friday and is free on bail. Her husband is being held without bail, said a spokesman for Hynes. If convicted of the most serious charge of attempted murder, Rivera faces a maximum 25 years to life in prison. - ANTHONY M. TWO PEDESTRIANS STRUCK BY CITY BUS. Two women were struck by a city bus in midtown Friday, but did not suffer life-threatening injuries, police said. The 10 a.m. accident occurred when the bus was trying to make a left turn onto First Avenue, from East 40th Street. The bus driver hit the brakes when he saw a pedestrian motioning toward him, police said, but by then two women, ages 25 and 27, already had been struck. One suffered a fractured leg, while the other was less seriously hurt. They were in stable condition at Bellevue Hospital Center. Police said both the driver and the pedestrians had the green light and that the driver did not see the women. No charges were filed or summonses issued. - ROCCO PARASCANDOLA

Family Says Inmate's Hunger Strike Not Near End (AP)

By Estes Thompson

AP, February 17, 2007

Raleigh | A former Florida university professor who has stopped eating in prison to protest his treatment sounds fine and doesn't intend to give up his nearly monthlong hunger strike, his wife said Friday.

Sami al-Arian, 49, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring to help a Palestinian terror group by making and receiving contributions.

Al-Arian stopped eating Jan. 22 after federal officials told him he had to testify before a grand jury about Muslim charities in northern Virginia that had helped finance his think tank in Tampa, Fla. He had been held in contempt before for not appearing before a grand jury in Alexandria, Va.

During his strike, Al-Arian is drinking just four glasses of water a day. His daughter Laila said earlier in the week he had lost 30 pounds since he stopped eating and that he hit his head after fainting Tuesday.

Al-Arian was moved this week from a jail in Warsaw, Va., to the Federal Medical Facility at Butner, about 22 miles north of Raleigh.

A former University of South Florida computer engineering professor, al-Arian wants to be released so he can leave the United States, his wife said in a telephone interview Friday.

"We worry about Sami, but at the same time we try to do our best to get him out of this whole situation," Nahla al-Arian said during an interview.

Nahla al-Arian traveled with supporters from Florida this week to Washington to see Florida representatives and plead al-Arian's case.

One supporter, Lois Price, who said she met the al-Arians through a United Church of Christ in Tampa, said al-Arian "believes in the American system and justice for all people."

Al-Arian contends his guilty plea relieves him of any obligation to cooperate with the government. Two federal judges have ruled he must testify.

Prosecutors have accused al-Arian of being an active member of the terrorist group Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which has carried out suicide bombings against Israel. He was acquitted of some charges and the jury was hung on others following a six-month trial in 2005. Al-Arian entered his guilty plea in April.

This is at least the second hunger strike for Al-Arian. He started one shortly after he was arrested in February 2003 and continued for 140 days, his supporters say.

Milan Court Indicts 26 Americans In Abduction (WP)

By Sarah Delaney, Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

CIA Operatives May Be Tried in Absentia

ROME, Feb. 16 -- An Italian judge gave approval Friday for what will be the first overseas criminal trial of CIA officers involved in a covert counterterrorism operation, as a court in Milan indicted more than two dozen Americans on charges of kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric four years ago.

After a judicial hearing that lasted two months, the court handed down indictments against 25 CIA operatives, a U.S. Air Force lieutenant colonel and five Italian spies who are accused of grabbing an imam, Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, off the street and stuffing him into a white van as he walked to noonday prayers Feb. 17, 2003. Nasr was taken from Milan to his native Egypt, where he claims he was tortured in prison for more than three years.

The trial is scheduled to open June 8 and will challenge the legality of a long-standing CIA practice known as "extraordinary rendition," in which terrorism suspects are secretly abducted and taken to other countries for interrogation. None of the American defendants is in custody, nor are they expected to appear in court. Prosecutors said they will be tried in absentia.

Arrest warrants against the CIA operatives were obtained in 2005. A judge approved the indictments Friday after the judicial hearing and a lengthy criminal investigation that retraced in minute detail how the CIA put together the kidnapping plot.

The CIA and the State Department declined to comment on the indictments. "This is an issue that is before the judiciary in Italy," State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

It is the second case in which criminal charges have been filed against CIA officers for illegally abducting a terrorism suspect. German prosecutors in Munich issued arrest warrants last month for 13 CIA operatives suspected of kidnapping a Lebanese German man, Khaled el-Masri, in the Balkans in December 2003 and taking him to Afghanistan. He was released five months later after the CIA realized they had grabbed the wrong man.

In addition, the Swiss government announced this week that it had approved a criminal investigation into the use of Switzerland's airspace to fly Nasr from Italy to a U.S. military base in Germany after his abduction.

He was put on another CIA-chartered plane to Cairo soon afterward.

The Milan prosecution team, headed by investigating magistrate Armando Spataro, has asked the Italian government to file a request with the U.S. Justice Department for extradition of the 26 American defendants. The request has already been refused once, by Roberto Castelli, then Italy's justice minister. But it is being reconsidered by a new Italian government that came to power last year.

The indictment publishes the names of the 25 CIA operatives, including the CIA's former Rome station chief Jeffrey Castelli and former Milan substation chief Robert Seldon Lady, who are accused of conspiring with the Italian military intelligence agency, known as Sismi.

Most of the CIA operatives named in the indictments had been using undercover aliases; prosecutors said they do not know the operatives' true identities and acknowledged that it is unlikely they will be found or brought to Italy to stand trial.

A former Sismi director, Gen. Nicolo Pollari, has also been charged.

Arianna Barbazza, a Milan lawyer who has been appointed to represent several of the U.S. defendants, said she and other defense attorneys in the case had been unable to contact their clients. She said it was highly unlikely that the United States would respond to an extradition request, even if the Italian government decided to make one.

Barbazza said the trial will probably reveal more about the Italian spies and their agency, "because it will attempt to verify whether Sismi was aware beforehand of the kidnapping."

Matilde Sansalone, who represents the CIA's former Rome station chief and two other Americans, said the apparent decision by the CIA operatives not to hire their own lawyers "demonstrates a specific choice to not participate in the proceedings."

Sansalone said she and other defense lawyers would not contest Nasr's abduction but would argue that there is insufficient evidence to find individual defendants guilty.

Nasr was released this week by an Egyptian court after spending nearly four years in prison. He is staying with his family in Alexandria, Egypt, and is considering filing a civil lawsuit against the Italian and U.S. governments, according to a Cairo lawyer, Montasser al-Zayat, who has worked on his behalf.

Attorneys involved in the case said it was unlikely Nasr would return to Milan to testify in the trial; he faces arrest in Italy on terrorism-related charges that were filed after his abduction. Sansalone said the outcome of the trial could change if Nasr does testify, however.

This week the Italian government also asked the country's constitutional court to determine whether investigators overstepped their legal authority by ordering wiretaps of the Italian spies' telephone calls. A ruling in the government's favor could be a setback to the prosecutor's case.

Americans To Stand Trial In Rendition Case (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

An Italian judge on Friday ordered 25 alleged CIA agents and the former head of Italy's military intelligence service to be put on trial on charges of kidnapping an Egyptian imam in Milan and spiriting him abroad in February 2003.

The trial will be the first criminal prosecution of people alleged to have been involved in the US Central Intelligence Agency's controversial abductions of terrorist suspects after the attacks on the US of September 11 2001.

It also presents a fresh problem for US-Italian relations, already dogged by disputes over the planned expansion of a US military base in north-eastern Italy and the ability of Italy's centre-left government to keep Italian forces fighting under Nato auspices in Afghanistan.

Caterina Interlandi, the Milan judge who ordered the trial, set June 8 as the date for the start of the proceedings.

The case concerns Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, who prosecutors say was kidnapped on a Milan street, bundled into a van, driven to a US airbase at Aviano, flown to another US base in Germany and then taken to Egypt for interrogation.

Among those accused are 26 Americans, all but one alleged to be CIA agents, and Nicolò Pollari, the former head of Italy's military intelligence service, whom the government removed from his post last November.

None of the Americans is believed to be in Italy at present, and it appears improbable that any will show up voluntarily for the trial. Their court-appointed lawyers say they are not even in contact with their clients.

From the point of view of the US and Italian governments, however, the case has the potential to throw an unwelcome light on the degree to which Italy co-operated with the CIA kidnapping policy, known as the "rendition programme".

The centre-left government of Romano Prodi, prime minister, is unwilling to meet prosecutors' demands to seek the extradition of the Americans so that they appear in court in Milan.

The kidnapping of Mr Nasr occurred one month before the US-led invasion of Iraq, when Silvio Berlusconi, the centre-right opposition leader, was prime minister. He prided himself on being a devoted ally of the US but says his government was not involved in the abduction.

Mr Pollari has likewise denied responsibility for the kidnapping and told the court in a pre-trial hearing last month that he had "opposed any illegal actions" that may have taken place in connection with Mr Nasr.

Americans Indicted In Cleric's Abduction (WT/AP)

By Colleen Barry, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

MILAN, Italy -- An Italian judge indicted 25 suspected CIA agents and a U.S. Air Force lieutenant colonel yesterday in the purported kidnapping and torture of an Egyptian cleric who had been under investigation for recruiting Islamist fighters.

The indictment paves the way for Italy to try the Americans, along with five Italians, in June in the first criminal trial over the CIA's extraordinary rendition program.

But prosecutors think that many of the American names in the indictment are aliases, and even if Italy requests the Americans' extradition -- a move that would strain U.S.-Italian relations -- it is unlikely that the agents, who have all left Italy, would be turned over for prosecution.

All the U.S. agents have court-appointed attorneys, who say they have had no contact with their clients. In Italy, defendants can be tried in absentia.

The CIA did not comment yesterday on the case, which has put an uncomfortable spotlight on intelligence operations and increased U.S.-European disagreement over combating terrorism.

Prosecutors say five Italian intelligence officials worked with the Americans to abduct Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr from a Milan street on Feb. 17, 2003.

Mr. Nasr was purportedly taken to the Aviano Air Base near Venice and then flown to the Ramstein Air Base in southern Germany and onward to Egypt, where he was held for four years and, his attorney said, tortured. He was freed earlier this week by an Egyptian court that ruled his detention was "unfounded."

The Swiss government this week approved prosecutors' plans to investigate the flight that purportedly took Mr. Nasr over Swiss airspace from Italy to Germany. And a German prosecutor recently issued arrest warrants for 13 persons in connection with the purported CIA-orchestrated kidnapping of a German citizen.

Italian prosecutors say the operation was a breach of their country's sovereignty that compromised Italy's own anti-terrorism efforts.

Mr. Nasr, who had the status of political refugee in Italy, was under investigation for terrorism-related activities at the time of his abduction, and Milan prosecutors issued a warrant for his arrest more than two years after he disappeared from Milan, while he was in Egyptian custody.

All but one of the Americans have been identified as CIA agents, including the former Milan station chief Robert Seldon Lady and former Rome station chief Jeffrey Castelli. The other is Air Force Lt. Col. Joseph L. Romano III, who was stationed at the time at Aviano.

Among the Italians indicted by Judge Caterina Interlandi was the former chief of military intelligence, Nicolo Pollari, and his former deputy, Marco Mancini. Mr. Pollari has denied any involvement by Italian intelligence.

Italy Indicts 26, Many From C.I.A., In '03 Abduction (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

ROME, Feb. 16 —An Italian judge indicted 26 Americans on Friday, most of them C.I.A. officers, in what will become the first trial of the American program of secretly whisking away terror suspects. Italy's former top spy was also indicted.

Despite the indictment, issued by a judge in Milan, it is unlikely that any of the Americans, one of whom is an Air Force colonel, will ever face trial here. The trial is expected to take place in June.

The indictments came in connection with the case of a radical Egyptian cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr. The cleric, known as Abu Omar, disappeared near his mosque in Milan on Feb. 17, 2003, and said he was kidnapped.

He was freed this week from jail in Egypt, where he says he was taken and tortured.

The indictment marked a turning point in Europe, where anger is high at the American program of "extraordinary renditions," an aggressive policy of seizing suspected terrorists on foreign soil and interrogating them at secret locations in a third country.

Though the Italian indictment is the first in which such a case was ordered to trial, this week the Swiss government approved an investigation into the flight that was said to have carried Mr. Nasr from Italy to Germany, through Swiss airspace. The flight reportedly then went from an American air base in Germany to Egypt.

Late last month, a German court issued an arrest warrant for 13 people suspected of involvement in the kidnapping in Macedonia of a German citizen of Lebanese descent. There are also investigations into extraordinary renditions in Portugal and Spain.

In the meantime this week, a European Union parliamentary committee issued a detailed report into what it said were "at least" 1,245 secret C.I.A. flights in Europe, some of them involving extraordinary renditions. The report, which awaits approval by Parliament, is particularly sensitive because it suggested forcefully that a number of governments knew of the flights.

"We believe there has been either active collusion by several E.U. governments or turning a blind eye," one member of the European Parliament, Baroness Sarah Ludford of Britain, said this week.

All the operatives, who included the top two C.I.A. officials in Italy at the time, have left the country. A spokesman for the C.I.A. declined to comment on the indictment, and an American government official said that no extradition requests had been received from Italy for those charged. If Italy did seek extradition, there seems little chance the Bush administration would agree.

Here in Italy, the possible complicity of the government of Silvio Berlusconi, the prime minister at the time, is one of the most difficult issues in the case. Among the Italians indicted Friday were Nicolo Pollari, who until earlier this year was Italy's chief of military intelligence, and his former deputy, Marco Mancini.

Mr. Pollari has denied responsibility, saying he cannot defend himself because he would need to use evidence classified as state secrets. The suggestion is that officials outranking Mr. Pollari gave approval for the kidnapping. "We are very disappointed by the decision of the judge, being convinced that the lack of proof and the acquisition of documents covered by secrets of state demonstrates Pollari's innocence," Mr. Pollari's lawyer, Tittal Madia, said, according to the newspaper Corriere della Sera.

The case has snarled Italian politics with several complications. This week, the government of Prime Minister Romano Prodi asked the Constitutional Court to review whether the prosecutor in Mr. Nasr's case, Armando Spataro, overstepped his bounds by wiretapping the phones of Italian agents.

On Friday, Mr. Spataro said in a statement that he "astonished" by the government's move, saying he had followed all the laws in gathering evidence.

Meanwhile, a member of Mr. Prodi's government, Antonio Di Pietro, minister of infrastructure and a former corruption prosecutor, criticized the government for not having requested the extradition of the officers.

Mr. Prodi's government has not said whether it will make such requests. But the issue looms as one more source of conflict between Italy and the United States.

While both American and Italian officials say the relationship remains solid, it has been tested in recent months on several fronts. A big demonstration is being planned on Saturday in Vicenza, in northern Italy, where the Americans have asked to enlarge an existing air base, and Italian officials have recently criticized American actions in Iraq, Lebanon and Somalia.

Earlier this month, an Italian court ordered an American soldier to stand trial for the death in Iraq of Nicola Calipari, an Italian secret service agent killed in 2005 while securing the release of a kidnapped Italian journalist. The soldier is unlikely to be extradited to Italy.

Judge Orders Padilla Jail Personnel To Testify (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 16 -- Officials at the Navy brig where terrorism suspect Jose Padilla was held for 3 1/2 years as an enemy combatant were ordered Friday to testify at a hearing to determine his psychological competency, a ruling that allows the defense to press its claims that sensory deprivation and torture in confinement have rendered the alleged al-Qaeda operative unfit to stand trial.

The ruling marks one of the few times since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that officials responsible for the jail conditions and interrogations of terrorism suspects have been called to testify, and it is the first time in the Padilla case.

Federal prosecutors objected strenuously to allowing the testimony, arguing that the focus of the competency hearing should be on Padilla's psychological state, which they believe is adequate, and not necessarily on what past events might have caused post-traumatic stress disorder, as defense attorneys allege.

During a hearing Friday, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke grew tired of the government's objections.

"The only thing that comes to mind is: 'Methinks the lady doth protest too much,' " she told prosecutors.

Cooke ordered four people to appear at a hearing scheduled for Thursday: Sandy Seymour, who was technical director at the brig; Craig Noble, brig psychologist; Mike Reheuser, a Defense Department attorney; and Andrew Cruz, a brig social worker.

Joanne Mariner, counterterrorism director at Human Rights Watch, said the ruling is significant because while complaints of mistreatment from terrorism suspects have been frequent, it is rare that officials knowledgeable about their confinement have been called to testify.

"This could provide official confirmation of prisoner accounts of abuse," she said. "If they confirm elements of his story, it would have enormous credibility with the public."

After he was arrested in 2002, Padilla was considered so dangerous that he was held without charges at the Navy brig -- a so-called "enemy combatant" accused of plotting a radiological "dirty bomb" attack and later of conspiring with al-Qaeda to blow up apartment buildings with natural gas.

After more than three years at the brig, he was transferred to the civilian legal system, where he faces charges of conspiring to commit murder, kidnapping and other violent acts in the name of Islam. The trial is scheduled for April.

Padilla, 36, and his attorneys have claimed that while incarcerated at the brig in Charleston, S.C., he was forced to stand hooded in painful stress positions, given a drug as a "truth serum," subjected to noxious odors that made his eyes and nose run, and forced to endure sleep deprivation, extreme cold, and harsh lights.

He told a psychologist that at the brig that he sometimes begged his guards not to put him in "the cage," but he would not say what went on there. The conditions of his incarceration have rendered him unable to assist in his own defense, his attorneys said.

"When approached by his attorneys, he begs them, 'Please, please, please' not to have to discuss his case," according to psychiatrist Angela Hegarty, who interviewed him for 22 hours.

A Bureau of Prisons psychologist has found Padilla competent to stand trial, and prosecutors argue that by relating his claims of torture to his attorneys, Padilla has shown his psychological competence to assist in his own defense. But the court-appointed psychologist from the Bureau of Prisons, Rodolfo Buigas, did not interview Padilla, who refused to cooperate. Instead, Buigas talked with brig officials and others about Padilla's behavior.

Florida: Padilla Lawyers Can Question Officials (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Lawyers for Jose Padilla, seeking to prove he is unfit to stand trial, won the right to question government personnel who observed him at a Navy brig and a federal detention center. Judge Marcia Cooke of Federal District Court in Miami ordered eight Defense Department and Justice Department officials to appear for questioning at Mr. Padilla's competency hearing next Thursday. The eight were previously interviewed for a United States Bureau of Prisons report that prosecutors cite as evidence that Mr. Padilla is mentally competent. Mr. Padilla, a 36-year-old American citizen accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, is scheduled to go on trial April 16.

Military Justice Goes AWOL (NYT)

By Stephen Budiansky

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Leesburg, Va.

THIS week President Bush issued a final executive order authorizing military commissions to begin trying suspected terrorists. Under rules drafted by the Pentagon last month, the commissions would be permitted to sentence defendants to imprisonment or even death on the basis of hearsay or coerced testimony.

This lack of basic legal protections provided by civilian courts or courts-martial has brought condemnation at home and abroad as an abandonment of this nation's historic commitment to liberty and the rule of law.

Yet when military commissions — an American invention — were first instituted 150 years ago, they were hailed around the world as an advance for humanity and principles of justice.

The occasion was the Mexican-American War, the first time the United States Army had been involved in an extended military operation beyond the country's borders. In 1846 Gen. Winfield Scott's forces were ordered to seize Mexico City to bring an end to the fighting. Scott immediately foresaw that, as an occupation commander, he would be facing a huge problem of maintaining order both among the Mexicans in the territory he controlled and among his own troops in a foreign land.

The traditional view of the laws of war held that an occupying army could do anything, the legal maxim being "Inter arma leges silent": In time of war, the laws are silent. As a result, the phrase "martial law" was widely seen by Americans as synonymous with sheer tyranny. People recoiled at the notion of a military officer administering law over a civilian population, even an enemy population.

In Congress, many members denounced martial law and inter arma leges silent as a holdover of a barbaric past. Scott asked President James K. Polk for a clarification of his authority as occupation commander. The president ducked the issue.

So Scott issued his own order. In February 1847, he published General Orders No. 20, which enumerated ordinary recognized civilian crimes and created the military commission to try them.

Scott's motive was equal parts necessity (maintaining public order) and shrewd politics (appealing to the Mexican population to cooperate with his forces). In place of arbitrary and raw power and summary justice at gunpoint, a system of impartial courts gave Mexicans the assurance that they would be treated fairly.

Scott in particular wanted to impress upon the civilians the contrast between American justice and the lawlessness they had endured when the Mexican forces led by Gen. Antonio López de Santa Anna rode through their villages, looting, raping and killing.

By the same token, Scott used military commissions to try — and punish — American soldiers who had committed crimes, including rape and theft, against local citizens. This, too, was not lost on the populace.

General Orders No. 20 became the spark that ignited an international revolution in thinking about martial law. It established for the first time the principle that an occupation commander was subject to a higher legal authority, same as civilian government. It became the model for orders promulgated during the Civil War that established military commissions and guided federal occupation commanders in their administration.

These later orders reiterated the revolutionary principle that martial law did not mean arbitrary power or tyranny over an enemy; rather, as a panel of officers who drafted the key Civil War era order on martial law declared, it was exactly the opposite. Far from signifying military oppression, the panel stated, martial law would be "strictly guided by the principles of justice, honor, and humanity — virtues adorning a soldier even more than other men, for the very reason that he possesses the power of his arms against the unarmed."

It is a measure of how far we have come as a nation — and in values at one time widely held — that military commissions, once seen as a great stride forward for American principles of justice and the rule of law, will now for ever after be associated with the abridgement of rights.

And it is a cruel insult to American military honor that where the nation once saw its military as called to an even higher duty in administering justice — because of the special place honor and duty hold for the soldier — it has now turned to the military as a way to shirk the American tradition of "justice, honor and humanity."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Port Authority Now Accepts Dubai Deal, Easing Debate (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

A day after two United States senators called the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey greedy and obstructionist, the agency signed off on a deal that would let DP World, a Dubai-based port operator, sell its leases to A.I.G. Global Investment Group.

In return for its consent, the Port Authority will receive $10 million from A.I.G. to help pay for an overpass that will make it easier for trucks to deliver containers from the company's terminal to train lines. A.I.G. also agreed to spend more than $40 million to improve operations at its terminal at the Port of Newark.

The agreement was somewhat of a compromise by the Port Authority, which had asked for $30 million to cover investments it had made on behalf of DP World and a $50 million commitment from A.I.G. to spend on the port.

The deal all but closes a politically charged debate over which companies should run port terminals in the United States and in particular the New York area. DP World, the port operator owned by the royal Maktoum family of Dubai, United Arab Emirates, inadvertently set off a firestorm last year when it bought P&O Ports North America, a British company that operated ports in New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

Concerned about security at the ports, members of Congress demanded that DP World sell to an American firm its leases to operate terminals in six cities in the United States. In December, DP World and A.I.G. Global Investment Group, an arm of the American insurance giant, reached an agreement estimated at more than a billion dollars.

Five other port authorities, including those in Philadelphia and Miami, had consented to the handover without any financial conditions.

DP World and A.I.G. called the request for compensation by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey unprecedented and unreasonable.

Fearing the deal might fall apart, two United States senators, Charles E. Schumer of New York and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, who opposed Dubai's ownership, accused the authority of standing in the way and of trying to extract money from the companies unfairly.

"I'm glad the Port Authority finally came to its senses," Mr. Schumer said of the compromise. "It's a good deal for all the companies involved, the New York port and the security of the nation. It took a while, but it's a fair settlement."

The Port Authority said its requests, while unprecedented, were not unreasonable. The $10 million that A.I.G. will pay upfront covers about half the cost of the overpass that will reduce the time it takes for containers to get to trains. The $40 million to be invested over the life of the lease will also raise the value of A.I.G.'s terminal, the authority said.

Officials at the Port Authority wanted that commitment because they worried that A.I.G., which has never operated port terminals, might simply resell its lease in a few years for a profit.

According to sources involved in the negotiations, A.I.G. had told the authority that its plans included investing more than $40 million anyway.

The deal could close as early as mid-March if all regulatory approvals are received.

"We ended up with something we wanted to get done: a contribution to a public investment and a commitment to the long-term health of the port," said Stephen Sigmund, a spokesman for the Port Authority.

Dubai Ports Clears Snag To Selling U.S. Holdings (WSJ/AP)

Six major U.S. port operations will come under U.S. ownership after Dubai Ports World cleared a final, $50 million hurdle Friday, to end a year-long political conflict over security at the nation's cargo terminals.

DP World, based in United Arab Emirates, agreed in December to sell its U.S. ports operations to AIG Global Investment Group, following months of criticism that the UAE firm couldn't be trusted running the security-sensitive shipping apparatus.

That deal suddenly foundered this week when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal.

The business brinkmanship led two U.S. senators on Thursday to dub the Port Authority's demands greedy, and threaten political payback if the agency didn't back down.

Late Friday, officials said they had struck a deal to resolve the impasse, with AIG agreeing to make more than $40 million of infrastructure improvements, as well as a direct payment of $10 million to the Port Authority.

DP World Poised To Clear Hurdle (FT)

By Christopher Grimes

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

DP World was set on Friday night to clear a final hurdle to unloading its six US port assets to AIG, the US insurer, after satisfying last-minute – and potentially deal-breaking – demands made by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

The deal comes a day after two US senators lashed out against the Port Authority for demanding $84m in payments before transferring the lease of the Port Newark Container Terminal to AIG.

The senators, Chuck Schumer of New York and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, led last year's bitter political fight that forced the Dubai-based DP World to sell off the assets.

The senators argued last year that allowing DP World to run the ports would jeopardise national security.

The group agreed in December to sell the $1bn-plus port assets to AIG, satisfying the politicians' desire for a US-based operator.

This week, it emerged that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey wanted AIG to pay millions in cash and future infrastructure improvements before agreeing to a deal.

The authority also wanted payments to cover improvements it had made at the container terminal in the last year.

Sen Schumer said on Thursday that the authority's demands amounted to a "ransom fee" and threatened not to back future requests if it persisted with its demands.

Mohammed Sharaf, chief executive of DP World, said the group had never faced a similar demand elsewhere in the world.

He said if the Port Authority had persisted with the demands, the group would be willing to walk away from the deal. Transfer of four of the other US terminals – Miami, New Orleans, Philadelphia and Tampa, Florida – had been made without the addition of such fees.

On Friday night, the groups said they reached an agreement in principle that would allow the deal to move ahead. Ports America, the AIG unit, said it would spend at least $50m in capital improvements at the Newark terminal, including $10m for new rail infrastructure.

"We're pleased that we've reached an agreement that both protects our public investment and helps ensure that AIG is a long-term partner in the health and growth of the ports," a Port Authority spokesman said.

Mr Schumer praised the deal last night, saying that the Port Authority had "come to its senses".

AIG Spokesman Chris Winans said in a statement: "We are extremely pleased that we could work with the Port Authority and DP World to reach a beneficial outcome in the acquisition of the Port Newark Container Terminal."

Driver's License Emerges As Crime-Fighting Tool, But Privacy Advocates Worry (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BOSTON, Feb. 12 — On the second floor of a state office building here, upstairs from a food court, three facial-recognition specialists are revolutionizing American law enforcement. They work for the Massachusetts motor vehicles department.

Last year they tried an experiment, for sport. Using computerized biometric technology, they ran a mug shot from the Web site of "America's Most Wanted," the Fox Network television show, against the state's database of nine million digital driver's license photographs.

The computer found a match. A man who looked very much like Robert Howell, the fugitive in the mug shot, had a Massachusetts driver's license under another name. Mr. Howell was wanted in Massachusetts on rape charges.

The analysts passed that tip along to the police, who tracked him down to New York City, where he was receiving welfare benefits under the alias on the driver's license. Mr. Howell was arrested in October.

At least six other states have or are working on similar enormous databases of driver's license photographs. Coupled with increasingly accurate facial-recognition technology, the databases may become a radical innovation in law enforcement.

Other biometric databases are more useful for now. But DNA and fingerprint information, for instance, are not routinely collected from the general public. Most adults, on the other hand, have a driver's license with a picture on it, meaning that the relevant databases for facial-recognition analysis already exist. And while the current technology requires good-quality photographs, the day may not be far off when images from ordinary surveillance cameras will routinely help solve crimes.

Critics say the databases may therefore also represent a profound threat to privacy.

"What is the D.M.V.?" asked Lee Tien, a lawyer with the Electronic Frontier Foundation and a privacy advocate. "Does it license motor vehicles and drivers? Or is it really an identification arm of law enforcement?"

Anne L. Collins, the Massachusetts registrar of motor vehicles, said that people seeking a driver's license at least implicitly consent to allowing their images to be used for other purposes.

"One of the things a driver's license has become," Ms. Collins said, "is evidence that you are who you say you are."

The databases are primarily intended to prevent people from obtaining multiple licenses under different names. That can help prevent identity theft and stop people who try to get a second license after their first has been suspended.

"The states are finding hundreds of cases of fraud each year in each state," said J. Scott Carr, executive vice president of the Digimarc Corporation, which says it has sold biometric technology to motor vehicle departments in seven states and has a role in the production of more than two-thirds of all driver's licenses in the United States.

But the databases can also be used for law enforcement purposes beyond detecting fraud.

A page concerning Mr. Howell, printed out from the "America's Most Wanted" Web site, is taped to the wall of the investigators' office here. It is a kind of trophy.

"It's always exciting when you get a hit and you're getting someone really bad off the streets," said Maria Conlon, a facial-recognition specialist at the Registry of Motor Vehicles. "That's when everyone's morale goes up."

Most of the work is less glamorous. The analysts' main job is to check roughly 5,000 new driver's license photographs every day against the database. A computer algorithm that takes into account about 8,000 facial data points does a rough cut, and analysts examine potential matches, rejecting the vast majority.

That computers alone cannot do the job does not surprise Richard M. Smith, an expert in digital security. "It's probably one of the more inaccurate biometrics," Mr. Smith said, referring to facial-recognition technologies.

After computers narrow the field of potential matches, Ms. Conlon and her colleagues get to work.

"We don't look at hair," Ms. Conlon said. "We do look at lips, noses, ears."

Scars and tattoos can be useful, but what seem to be birthmarks are often passing blemishes. Some people make it easy by wearing the same clothes, though they are seeking licenses under different names. They have, Ms. Conlon said, "a registry outfit."

The program, in place since April, has yielded more than 1,000 apparent fraud cases referred to the state police. Other potential matches identified by the computers and confirmed by analysts have turned out to be clerical errors where, for instance, the wrong information was attached to a person's photograph. In the six months ending in January, analysts found 157 twins among the images flagged as potential matches.

The database's second function, as a resource for law enforcement agencies, is growing in popularity. Police chiefs from around the state e-mail digital photographs for comparison with the database, sometimes several times a day.

And other uses are not hard to imagine. Coroners have on three occasions sent over photographs of dead people they could not identify. The analysts struck out, perhaps because of the quality of the images.

"To make it work at all," Mr. Smith said, "you have to have good control of camera angle and lighting." Passport and driver's license photographs, along with mug shots, are ideal.

Other sorts of images are not useful — yet. "A video surveillance camera is probably not going to give it to you," Mr. Smith said.

In time, though, the combination of facial recognition and other information — from financial records, mobile phones, automobile positioning devices and other sources — may do away with the ability to move anonymously through the world, Mr. Tien, the privacy advocate, said.

"The real question with biometrics," he said, "is that they are part of a cluster of technologies that will allow for location tracking in both public and private places."

The case against Mr. Howell fizzled last week. He had been charged with invading a home at gunpoint in Dorchester in August 2002 and holding three people captive for hours, repeatedly raping one of them. He fled after being released on bail, said Jake Wark, a spokesman for the district attorney's office, leading to his inclusion on the television show's most-wanted list.

But after Mr. Howell was caught through his license photo, the prosecutors re-examined their case. In the intervening years, the victims disappeared, and prosecutors think they may have left the country. Without their testimony, prosecutors concluded, there was no way to take the case to trial. Prosecutors formally abandoned the case on Friday, and they let Mr. Howell go.

"He is in the wind right now," Mr. Wark said.

WAR NEWS:

House Rebukes Bush On Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

17 Republicans Join 229 Democrats in Opposing Deployment of More Troops

Capping four days of passionate, often angry debate, the House yesterday delivered President Bush its first rebuke since the Iraq war was launched nearly four years ago, voting 246 to 182 to oppose the administration's planned deployment of 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq.

Seventeen Republicans voted with all but two Democrats to approve a resolution that expresses support for U.S. combat forces but opposes the additional deployments. Democrats portrayed the vote as a bipartisan slap at the White House, but Republican leaders kept GOP defections below even their most optimistic estimates, as the debate crescendoed to a dramatic close yesterday.

Although the measure is nonbinding, proponents and opponents delivered outsized predictions of the vote's consequences. Democrats asserted that it will begin to turn the political tide so decisively that the president will have no choice but to begin bringing U.S. forces home, while Republicans warned darkly that the House has emboldened murderous Islamic terrorists at the expense not only of American lives but also of America's way of life.

"Our enemies will be the only ones satisfied by this debate," warned Rep. Eric Cantor (Va.), the Republicans' chief deputy whip. "They will have received all the political rhetoric they require to convince their followers that complete victory is at hand."

But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that the resolution's passage "will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home safely and soon."

The Senate plans to hold an unusual weekend session today to vote on whether to proceed with a debate on the House-passed resolution. Although the resolution is merely an expression of lawmakers' views, Pelosi and other House Democrats have vowed to impose conditions on their support for Bush's war-funding request. Those stipulations could curtail troop deployments and alter the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Bush did not publicly comment on the House vote, but White House press secretary Tony Snow said in a statement: "The president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our Armed Forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

Some liberals and conservatives dismissed the House resolution as merely a symbolic gesture and said that Democratic leaders should have resorted to binding legislation if they were serious about stopping the troop buildup. But House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said that Bush would have vetoed such a bill, with no possibility of an override. The nonbinding resolution is not dependent on the president's signature.

"What the president cannot veto is the opinion of the Congress of the United States, the judgment of the Congress of the United States, the counsel of the Congress of the United States," Hoyer added, pounding on a lectern after the vote. "Let us hope that the commander in chief hears this counsel."

If anything, the Republicans were even more dramatic, as they concluded a debate that sent 393 of the House's 434 members -- 221 Democrats and 172 Republicans -- to the floor over a grueling 44 hours and 55 minutes.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) called the vote "the first step down a very treacherous path, a path that if followed will endanger Americans for decades to come."

As Pelosi delivered her closing remarks in the House chamber, Republican leaders abandoned the floor and crossed the Capitol to appear with their Senate counterparts and denounce what they called the Democrats' "slow-bleed strategy" for the war.

DOJ_NMG_0134188

Still, House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) noted, yesterday's House vote marked the first time Republicans in significant numbers have broken with Bush on the war. The 17 dissidents included longtime GOP foes of the war, such as Reps. Walter B. Jones (N.C.) and Ron Paul (Tex.), but also low-key backbenchers such as Reps. Timothy V. Johnson (Ill.) and Fred Upton (Mich.), staunch conservatives such as Reps. Bob Inglis (S.C.) and Howard Coble (N.C.), and moderates who usually stick with the leadership, such as Reps. Mark Steven Kirk (Ill.) and Phil English (Pa.).

Locally, Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.) and Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.) voted for the resolution, along with all of Maryland's and Virginia's Democrats.

Just two Democrats, Reps. Jim Marshall (Ga.) and Gene Taylor (Miss.) voted against the measure.

In contrast, a two-day debate in June over a pro-Bush Iraq war resolution drafted by House Republicans ended with 42 Democrats joining the Republicans. Just three Republicans broke rank then.

On Oct. 10, 2002, the House voted 296 to 133 to authorize Bush to go to war with Iraq, with 81 Democrats joining 215 Republicans to pass the measure.

GOP leaders said they did not pressure any of their members in yesterday's vote, nor did they count votes ahead of time. But behind the scenes, "there was tremendous pressure from the White House," said Davis, who added that he was bombarded with facts and information sheets pressing for a "no" vote.

A senior Republican lawmaker said that, at the start of the week, the GOP leadership expected to lose upward of 50 members, but that number dropped into the mid-30s by the middle of the week. After Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) went public with his plans to curtail troop deployments, the number dropped down into the teens, settling at 17 by the vote on Friday.

"I think Murtha absolutely exposed them for what they are," Cantor said. The longer the debate went on, he said, the more GOP leaders felt that their side was firming up against the resolution. "Murtha's announcement did it for us," Cantor added. "There was clearly a significant shift in the debate."

With public opinion turning firmly against the war, the Democrats believe they were in a no-lose situation politically. Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, reiterated a well-worn attack line when he said that Republicans had "rubber-stamped the president's failed policies in Iraq."

"There are a lot of people who clearly didn't get the message that the American people sent in the last election," he said. "Every constituent has a right to know where their members stood on this issue, and every constituent will know."

Democrats in the Senate face a similar political dynamic. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said yesterday that most Republicans will block a debate on the House-passed resolution until they are guaranteed a vote on a resolution opposing any effort to cut off funding for the war. He predicted that Democrats will muster nowhere near the 60 votes they would need today to move to a debate on the resolution opposing additional troop deployments.

Many Republicans will not bother to show up in the rare Saturday session. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) will be campaigning for president in Iowa. A Democratic counterpart, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), will be campaigning in South Carolina.

Democratic aides said that will only mean another round of newspaper headlines proclaiming that Republicans are blocking a debate on the war.

"Let us be clear," Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said, "anyone voting 'no' tomorrow is voting to give the president a green light to escalate the war."

House Votes Against Troop Surge In Iraq (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The Democratic-led House yesterday voted against President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, a nonbinding but symbolic action that Republicans said is defeatist and a step backward in the war on terrorism.

"Today we have had an historic victory for the American people," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who voted against the war in 2002.

The 97-word resolution, which opposes sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq, passed 246-182. The vote was preceded by 44 hours and 55 minutes of debate over four days. Seventeen Republicans voted for the measure, and two Democrats voted against it.

The president's spokesman said the resolution won't change Mr. Bush's plan, adding that early signs of its success would leave those who voted for the resolution having to explain themselves later.

"Members of Congress have taken their own gamble here. They're gambling on failure -- some members, at least," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

The White House is downplaying yesterday's House vote -- and one planned for today in the Senate on another Iraq war resolution -- arguing that the more important votes were last month's Senate confirmation of Army Gen. David H. Petraeus to command U.S. forces in Iraq andan upcoming vote on an emergency spending bill to fund the war on terrorism.

Meanwhile, House Republican leaders are vowing to defeat Democratic plans to begin slowly choking off funding for the war. Democrats intend to introduce legislation next month that they hope will limit the president's use of money in the supplemental war-funding request.

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, said the resolution "is clearly the first step toward defunding the troops and the war against Islamic totalitarianism."

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, said Thursday that he hopes to require certification for adequate training and equipment for any deployed troops, and to place caps on how long those troops can serve and be enlisted.

"They won't be able to do the deployment," said Mr. Murtha, who voted in favor of authorizing the war.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, denounced the plan "to eliminate funding for our troops that are in harm's way."

Democrats insist the best way to "support the troops" is to take them out of what they say is a civil war in Iraq.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat, who voted for the war, said it "has weakened our fight against al Qaeda. In fact the war has enhanced the group's recruitment."

Republicans insist that Iraq is a hard but necessary fight against terrorists and insurgents backed by Iran and Syria, and that the conflict is part of the country's broader fight against terrorism.

The four-day debate, in which 392 of 434 House lawmakers participated, came to a dramatic conclusion yesterday afternoon.

Republicans sent Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas, a prisoner of war in Vietnam for almost seven years, to the House floor as their last speaker.

"Let my body serve as a brutal reminder that we must not repeat the mistakes of the past," said Mr. Johnson, 76. "We must not cut off funding for the troops."

Republicans gave Mr. Johnson a two-minute standing ovation and were joined by the smattering of Democrats in the chamber.

Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri closed the debate for the Democrats. Mr. Skelton, who voted to authorize the war, said that sending more troops "will embroil [them] more deeply in a sectarian conflict [that] cannot be won militarily."

Immediately after the resolution passed, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, sent out a release that said the Senate "must join the House and vote on the escalation."

Mr. Reid has taken the unusual step of bringing senators in for a weekend vote today on closing off amendments to an anti-surge resolution identical to the House bill.

Democrats say Republicans are avoiding an up-or-down vote on the surge, but Republicans say they want to vote on alternative resolutions, one of which would guarantee no funding cuts for the military.

"Senate Republicans want a vote in support of funding for the troops," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, who said he expects to defeat Mr. Reid's attempt to stifle debate on other resolutions.

A Divided House Denounces Plan For More Troops (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny, Michael Luo

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — A sharply divided House of Representatives passed a resolution on Friday formally repudiating President Bush's decision to send more than 20,000 new combat troops to Iraq.

The rare wartime rebuke to the commander in chief — an act that is not binding, but that carries symbolic significance — was approved 246-to-182, with 17 Republicans breaking ranks to join all but two Democrats in supporting the resolution.

Passage was never in doubt, but the debate, lasting full days and much of three nights, brought nearly every member to the floor to declare, briefly but often vehemently, where they stood on a short, resolution affirming support for the troops but denouncing Mr. Bush's new approach to the war.

"We owe our troops a course of action in Iraq that is worthy of their sacrifice," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat. "Today, we set the stage for a new direction in Iraq."

With 392 members speaking, the debate lasted twice as long as when Congress voted in 2002 to authorize the use of force against Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0134190

And it illustrated how the partisan divide over the war has deepened. While Democratic leaders had purposefully written the resolution to attract a bipartisan following, the number of Republicans who joined them was only about half of what some Democrats had predicted.

"Republicans may have lost the vote on this nonbinding resolution," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican minority leader. "But we won the debate."

The Senate is expected to consider Saturday whether to move toward a vote on an Iraq resolution, but there, enough Republicans are expected to hold ranks to block the Democrats' approach, at least for now. In political terms, the resolution carries weight because of public sentiment, particularly from voters who placed Democrats in control of Congress.

Several historians compared its significance to the repeal by Congress in 1971 of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution authorizing the Vietnam War. That vote did not halt the conflict as members of Congress approved continued financing for two more years.

The House resolution stood out, historians said, because it criticized a specific battlefield tactic proposed by the president. It also could set the stage for a more consequential clash with the White House if Congress begins exercising broader power and authority in an effort to bring the war to a close, possibly by restricting financing.

"Never before in our history has Congress attempted to control or restrict strategic battlefield decisions," Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, said. "It is wrong as a matter of policy and it will come back to haunt us for years to come."

The deliberations represented the third major Iraq debate in four years, but with Democrats controlling Congress, the rules, tone and outcome changed. Republicans were not allowed to offer their own alternative proposal, but they forcefully defended the president and his policy.

Now, questions of financing the conflict loom large for Democrats in Congress. The White House and Republicans pre-emptively accused the party of starting along a path to cut financing for the troops, a suggestion Democratic leaders denied. But some of their rank and file are pressing for exactly that.

On Friday afternoon, as the debate neared an end, people seated in the gallery applauded when Ms. Pelosi praised the fortitude of American forces. Lawmakers and spectators rose as she called for a moment of silence to honor the more than 3,100 United States troops who have died in Iraq since the conflict began.

The resolution specifically stated Congress's disapproval of the president's plan to deploy more than 20,000 troops to Iraq, which Mr. Bush outlined in a speech on Jan. 10. But through more than 45 hours of deliberations, the debate grew far beyond the context of the resolution.

The arguments grew familiar as the hours marched past, with lawmaker after lawmaker rising to address what was typically a nearly empty chamber. Democrats argued that Americans should not referee a civil war, that previous efforts to pour more troops into Iraq had failed and that diplomatic measures were the only way out of the crisis.

Republicans, meanwhile, sought to portray the war in Iraq as a key battleground in a titanic global struggle against militant Islam and criticized the resolution as a slap in the face for troops on the battlefield. Failure in Iraq, they said, would lead to widespread instability in the region.

"What we're doing with this resolution is not a salute to G.I. Joe," said Representative Phil Gingrey, a Georgia Republican. "It's a capitulation to Jihadist Joe."

The White House, reacting to the vote, turned its attention to what many assume will be the next fight: the president's spending request for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"The president," Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said, "believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

Even before the House voted at midafternoon, senators had already started to speak about the resolution in their chamber. The Senate has been locked in a stalemate over Iraq for two weeks, but Democratic leaders are seeking to put Republicans on the record during a brief Saturday session.

Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, the chairman of the Republican Conference, dismissed the significance of the weekend vote, which is on a procedural question, and announced that he and Senator Bob Corker, Republican of Tennessee, were flying to Baghdad instead. Two Democrats scheduled to take the trip canceled.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, planned to miss the vote to campaign in Iowa. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton planned to break away from campaigning in New Hampshire to vote.

Iraq has dominated this session of Congress. While Democrats are broadly aligned against the war, there is little unity on the next step. Some lawmakers seek to cut financing and cap troop levels while others propose delving into war strategy.

"There is a long tradition of Congressional dissent during wartime, but I don't know that it's ever formalized itself the way this is shaping up," said the associate Senate historian, Donald Ritchie. "Taking a stand in opposition to a commander in chief's decision on a war policy, that's unusual."

After the vote, Democratic leaders painted their victory as an expression of public outrage at the war and a sign that the new Congress intends to challenge the president. “It’s the first time he has had a review of his policy, rather than a rubber stamp,” said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Caucus.

Representative Boehner, the Republican leader, said the Iraq debate highlighted the intentions by Democrats to begin reducing financing of the war, which he described as “a slow-bleed policy that cuts off funding and reinforcements for our troops in harm’s way.”

Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat who oversees defense appropriations, has said he would seek to block new deployments by requiring troops to meet a series of conditions and training guidelines. A day before the vote, he presented his plan in a 24-minute broadcast on MoveCongress.org, a Web site dedicated to ending the war.

Democratic lawmakers and senior aides said they believed Mr. Murtha’s appearance could have kept some Republicans from supporting the resolution, fearful of being linked to the antiwar coalition.

But for all the attention paid to the symbolic resolution, it remains an open question whether it will have much immediate effect.

“It is very hard to change war policy from Capitol Hill,” said Representative David R. Obey, a Wisconsin Democrat and chairman of the Appropriations Committee. “We won’t have a real solution on Iraq until Republicans walk down to the White House and say, Mr. President, the jig is up, this is a bad direction and you need to rethink what you’re doing.”

Partisanship Marks House Vote Against Troop Surge (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House on Friday renounced President Bush's decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, the first official challenge by the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill to his management of the war.

The nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of the troop buildup passed 246-182 largely along party lines, with 17 Republicans joining 229 Democrats to back the rare wartime rebuke of a commander-in-chief. Voting against it were 180 Republicans and two Democrats.

The sharp partisan split was a disappointment to Democratic leaders who had hoped for more GOP support and lessened the vote's political impact.

Still, it marked a milestone in the declining public support for the nearly four-year war and signified the growing Democratic determination to press for a de-escalation of the U.S. involvement in the military conflict.

"Today, in a loud voice, the Congress of the United States have said to the president, `Mr. President, we need a new direction in Iraq'," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

During this week's four-day debate on the resolution, lawmakers of both sides of the argument characterized it as a first step toward a more concrete Democratic push to change Bush's course in Iraq. An effort already is under way in the House to attach strings to the latest White House funding request for the war, a move aimed at delaying -- and perhaps thwarting -- much of the new troop deployment.

Democrats warned the president to take heed. "If need be, Congress will end this war -- with binding legislation," said Rep. Allan Mollohan, D-W.Va., a senior member of the House Appropriations Committee.

Democrats gained control of the House and Senate in last fall's election due in a large part to voter disaffection with the war. The Senate will meet in a rare Saturday session for a vote on whether their chamber will take up the House resolution.

Bush has said he intended to ignore the message sent by the House measure, though he has expressed concern about Congress taking further action that would limit his stewardship of the war.

Following the House vote, the White House issued a statement saying that Bush ordered the troop buildup "because he, like most Americans, believed the existing situation in Iraq was unacceptable."

It also noted that Congress will have the opportunity to "show its support for the troops" by approving his request for $93 billion in additional war funding, with most of the money targeted for Iraq.

Republicans were gearing up for the new fight, portraying the symbolic resolution as the opening gambit in a "slow-bleed" strategy that would cut off funding for troops in harm's way.

Several GOP lawmakers pressed that case in arguing against the measure on Friday. House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., criticized the resolution as the start of "an all-too-binding spiral toward defeat in a fight that we cannot afford to lose."

The two-sentence resolution first states that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect" U.S. forces serving in Iraq, phrasing that Democrats hoped would undercut attacks that they were undermining the troops.

The second sentence says Congress "disapproves of the decision" Bush announced in a nationally televised speech Jan. 10 to add 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus already in Iraq.

GOP leaders considered it a victory to limit defections to 17 of their 201 members. Still, discontent within a GOP caucus that once provided near lock-step support for Bush's Iraq policies was evident in the debate leading up to the vote. In their floor speeches, several GOP lawmakers distanced themselves from the troop increase and said they doubted it would quell the violence in Iraq, even as they announced their intention to oppose the resolution.

In a typical comment, Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, R-Md., said Friday he was voting against the measure "not because I believe that the (troop) surge will be helpful, but rather because I believe that a yes vote will send the wrong message to our enemies and might send the wrong message to our troops."

Democratic leaders asserted that they were pleased with the GOP support the resolution garnered.

"This is the first time you've had a break in the Republicans' blind support for a policy that has led us into a blind alley," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

But the difficulties facing Democrats in influencing Bush's war strategy likely will be apparent Saturday as the Senate meets to try to move forward with a debate on the House resolution.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has been trying for weeks to engage the chamber in a discussion on the troop-increase plan. Reid said Friday, "Americans deserve to know whether their senator stands with the president and his plan to deepen our military commitment in Iraq."

In the Senate, however, the minority party has more tools than in the House to keep an issue from coming up, and Republicans have succeeded in blocking Reid's efforts.

GOP Senate leaders have opposed allowing the debate on the troop increase to proceed because Reid has refused to permit a vote on an alternative Republican resolution aimed at waylaying moves to cut military funding.

"There's no question that the Democrats in the House and Senate intend to tie the president's hands when it comes to the conduct of war in Iraq," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said Friday. "That's why we want a vote in the House and Senate that says ... the United States Congress will not cut funding for our troops in harm's way."

During the House's four days of often heated debate, 392 of the chamber's 434 members spoke (there is one vacancy). Many of the lawmakers sprinkled their speeches with quotations from President Lincoln, Napoleon and other historical figures.

The resolution's opponents contended it would embolden America's enemies and demoralize U.S. troops. They also repeatedly assailed Democrats for failing to offer an alternative to Bush's plan in Iraq, a fight they said was a crucial front in the larger war on terrorism.

Friday's vote was in stark contrast to earlier votes on the war when the House was under Republican rule. In 2002, the House voted 296-133 to authorize the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

House Rebukes Bush Iraq Plan 246-182 (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Breaking with President Bush over the war in Iraq, 17 Republicans joined House Democrats in approving a resolution rejecting the administration's decision to add more than 21,000 new combat troops by May.

Though largely symbolic, the 246-182 vote opens a new chapter in the Iraq debate that will force grittier fights this spring and summer, testing Mr. Bush's powers as commander in chief against Congress's control of the funds he needs for the war.

"As even the president acknowledges, we retain the power of the purse and we will have ample opportunity to exercise that power," said Rep. Alan Mollohan (D., W.Va.). "It is a last call for us to work together ... on ending this war. It is the last call for the president to come back to the people."

White House allies in the Senate expect to stall action on the nonbinding measure in a rare Saturday session called by the Democratic leadership. But the Republican defections and new Democratic unity underscore how much the political landscape has changed in the past year.

Eight months ago, only three House Republicans opposed a similar resolution supporting the war effort and warmly praising the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. By comparison, even Republicans who stood with the president in this week's debate were often critical of Mr. Maliki and leery of committing more U.S. forces.

The White House was pleased to hold down its losses to 17 -- lower than some earlier predictions. But the counterweight is that since November's elections, the president has faced an almost solid wall of Democratic skepticism toward his military tactics. Last June, 42 House Democrats supported the administration-backed resolution; yesterday only two -- from Georgia and Mississippi -- sided with the White House.

As a result, the four days of debate foreshadowed the tough slog ahead unless lawmakers and Mr. Bush can reach some consensus. Republicans hammered home the argument that passage of the resolution could damage the morale of troops in Iraq. Invoking memories of Vietnam, the party chose to close debate with an emotional appeal by Rep. Sam Johnson (R., Texas), an Air Force veteran and former POW from that war.

"The pain inflicted by your country's indifference is tenfold that inflicted by your ruthless captors," Mr. Johnson said to a standing ovation.

Reflecting on the fight ahead, Speaker Nancy Pelosi questioned if Mr. Bush "is moveable in terms of the course of action he wants to take militarily," but said she hoped the House vote would make him more "open to a truly robust initiative" to find a diplomatic and political settlement to the fighting.

The California Democrat said the Republicans were using a "stale" argument in accusing the Democrats of not supporting the troops in the war. But as Congress reasserts itself, she said both lawmakers and the White House had to recognize each other's role.

The first test will be a $93.4 billion emergency spending request for the war that the House Appropriations Committee must consider three weeks from now. Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), the bill's manager, said he is going to give the military "all the money they want" and more than the administration's request for readiness. But Mr. Murtha will also recommend adding restrictions that could slow the troop increase and make it harder to maintain the higher troop levels once the 21,000 have been added.

He said he believes he can get this bill out of the House committee but acknowledged that his ideas will face tougher sledding in the Senate. "It's very, very hard," he said. But Mr. Murtha, a Vietnam veteran like Mr. Johnson, already is looking ahead to the next round when the massive 2008 defense bill must be debated. "I think in the '08 bill, we're going to start looking at benchmarks," he said, and if those goals aren't met, it could then lay the groundwork for the beginning of a U.S. withdrawal.

House Rejects Troop Surge Plan (CHIT)

By Bay Fang, Naftali Bendavid

Chicago Tribune, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Rebuking President Bush on a war that enjoyed great support at its outset but has become deeply unpopular, the House went on record Friday opposing Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops in Iraq, with 17 Republicans joining all but two Democrats in voicing their disapproval.

The nonbinding resolution, approved on a 246-182 vote, was Congress' most forceful action yet to challenge Bush's conduct of the war after November's congressional elections, in which the Democrats were catapulted to a majority in both houses of Congress, largely by the public's growing frustration with the Iraq conflict.

Even some of the strongest opponents of the resolution voiced little faith Friday in Bush's escalation strategy, stressing instead the importance of backing the troops, supporting the commander-in-chief and showing steadfastness in fighting terrorism.

The White House and Republican House leadership had worked feverishly over four days of debate this week to stem defections from the GOP side, concerned about the political impact if a large majority of lawmakers opposed the president. Republican leaders also complained that Democrats did not allow them to offer alternative resolutions more supportive of the president.

But Democrats, confident that the public is with them on Iraq, argued that the war has been misguided and poorly executed and that sending the additional troops would only produce more American deaths without turning the tide of what has become a bitter civil war.

The president had no immediate comment on the House action. His spokesman said Bush was too occupied with other duties to watch the proceedings on television.

The rhetoric on the House floor Friday was emotional, sweeping and at times agonized, with orators on both sides speaking of honoring the dead, staying true to the nation's mission and respecting the Constitution. In a chamber that often sees a lone congressman addressing an empty chamber, many seats were filled, and particularly eloquent speeches were met with standing ovations. It was perhaps the closest Congress had come in three decades to the impassioned debates that animated the nation during the Vietnam War.

"The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, in a rare speech from the House floor. "The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home."

Rep. Sam Johnson, a Texas Republican who served seven years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was equally impassioned as he wrapped up the debate, during which 390 of 434 lawmakers spoke. "Now it's time to stand up for my friends who did not make it home, and for those who fought and died in Iraq already," Johnson said in opposing the resolution. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them." He ended his remarks with a salute.

Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), one of five new congressmen who are war veterans, talked about having to drive a Humvee with no doors down what was known as "Ambush Alley" in Baghdad.

"Half those names on the Vietnam [Memorial] wall are there after the civilian leadership in our country knew that it was strategically a mistake to stay there," he said. "But they didn't have the courage to stand up. This Congress is showing the courage to stand up."

Potentially adding to the power of the rebuke, the Senate plans to debate a measure identical to the House resolution Saturday. Republican leaders will try to block that vote with procedural moves, but the Senate action raises the possibility of a unified congressional response to a military move the White House considers the province of the executive branch.

One outspoken supporter of the deployment, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), characterized the Senate action as a "partisan stunt." The presidential contender was in Chicago and told reporters he intended to keep his campaign schedule in Iowa rather than return to the capitol for the debate.

"I think it's an insult to the public and our soldiers to pretend we're discharging our responsibilities to them when all we're doing is debating a meaningless, meaningless resolution," McCain said.

The House vote portends a larger battle next month, when Bush's request for a $93 billion supplemental Pentagon spending measure will come before Congress. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), who heads the subcommittee that oversees military spending, said he plans to offer legislation that will put such strict standards on deployments—requiring that troops spend one year at home between combat tours, for example—that Bush will have no choice but to start bringing troops home.

"They won't be able to continue," the former Marine said in a Webcast on an antiwar site. "They won't be able to do the deployment."

Republican critics said that Friday's vote was a purely political statement and that the smaller-than-expected number of Republican defections meant a compromised victory for Democrats.

"This was a political vote that gave members who wanted to be on the record that they didn't support the war, to be on the record," said Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), who held Murtha's post on the House panel until January.

Nevertheless, the vote marked the completion of a dramatic turnaround from the fall of 2002, when the House acquiesced, 296-133, to Bush's request to authorize military action in Iraq.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) said, "There have been over a half a dozen votes in the United States Congress that have rubber-stamped the president's policy in Iraq. This is the first vote in a four-year war that rejected the policy."

In The House: Four Days Of Warnings, Reason And Rising Voices On Iraq (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

'For the most part, the tenor of the debate rose to the occasion,' Pelosi said after about 45 hours of Iraq speeches.

WASHINGTON — The House debate this week on the war in Iraq was marked by emotional commentaries and dire warnings about the costs of escalating the U.S. commitment or reducing it. On Friday, the deliberations ended with a new element: an audience.

During most of the four days consumed by the rhetorical face-off, lawmakers filed into a mostly empty House chamber to deliver their speeches. A sprinkling of aides and a few other members of Congress looked on, though frequently they were chatting among themselves or thumbing their BlackBerrys.

The mood and the interest level changed on Friday, however, as the House neared its vote on the resolution opposing President Bush's deployment of more troops to Iraq. The measure, though nonbinding, was viewed by both sides as fraught with significance.

Democrats and Republicans alike crowded the chamber by midafternoon to cheer their sides during the final appeals for votes. Spectators waiting to enter the third-floor public galleries lined the halls and the marble stairs.

Lawmakers on both sides of the issue said their votes were important. For some, the issue was personal.

That was evident when Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), an Iraq combat veteran, countered GOP assertions that Democrats were undermining troop morale.

"We are the troops" said Murphy, 33, his voice rising and his face suddenly flushed. "Friends that we served with when we deployed are … saying, 'Thank God one of our own is standing up and speaking truth to power.' "

It was also evident when 76-year-old Sam Johnson (R-Texas), a prisoner of war in Vietnam for almost seven years, shuffled to the floor on his cane three times during the week to speak against the resolution.

"I know what it does to morale and mission success," to have Congress express disapproval of a war effort, Johnson, whose body is twisted from years of beatings and confinement in leg irons, said Friday.

"Moms and dads watching the news need to know that the Congress will not leave their sons and daughters in harm's way without support," he continued. "Let my body serve as a brutal reminder that we must not repeat the mistakes of the past."

Johnson was the next-to-last of 392 lawmakers who spoke in the debate that began early Tuesday afternoon. As he finished, fellow Republicans in the now-crowded chamber rose to applaud him for a full two minutes. Johnson hauled himself up from his chair and shook his fist in acknowledgment.

Some Democrats briefly joined the ovation. Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who as chairman of the House Armed Service Committee gave his party's last speech, paid him homage at the start of his remarks.

On Friday, after a total of 44 hours and 55 minutes of debate, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) declared that "for the most part, the tenor of the debate rose to the occasion."

As lawmakers filed out of the chamber after the vote, some rushing to catch planes to their districts, many said they believed they had participated in a historic event.

Rep. Timothy J. Walz (D-Minn.) a former Army National Guardsman who served in Afghanistan and who rooms in Washington with Murphy, said he was "thankful" for the chance to vote for the resolution.

He said that Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Burlingame) had told him, "There is nothing nonbinding about the vote of a U.S. congressman representing his or her district in that sacred chamber, especially on an issue as important as a war."

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) took a few minutes to explain why he viewed the vote as a "successful failure."

The number of Republicans — 17 — who joined with virtually all of the House Democrats to pass the resolution was below some expectations for GOP defections. That kept the tally below the two-thirds threshold that would be needed to override a presidential veto of future war-related legislation.

"The real battle is coming, and Republicans have laid a foundation to defend funding for the troops," Pence said.

Congress Flexes Its Muscles On Iraq (NSDY)

By Timothy M. Phelps, Craig Gordon

Newsday, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- To its proponents, Friday's Iraq vote in the House was the historic answer to the embarrassments of 1964 and 2002, when Congress overwhelmingly approved wars in Vietnam and Iraq that would become unpopular.

To its opponents, the nonbinding statement of disapproval of the president's war plan was at best a meaningless gesture, at worst a terrible precedent or even a solace to America's enemies.

Scholars saw it as major shift in a trend that had lately seen Congress dominated on such issues by the presidency.

"People will look back in history and see it as the first step in an effort by Congress to limit the commander-in-chief powers of this president," said James Thurber of American University, an authority on Congress and the presidency.

"It's similar to the early steps with regard to Vietnam," he said. "It's not the same as setting timelines and cutting money, but I think those things are likely to come unless there is a significant change on the ground in Baghdad."

"It's enormously consequential because there's been no debate [about Iraq] before," said Ross Baker, an expert on Congress and the presidency at Rutgers University. "It's a reasonable place to start."

"What we're talking about at this stage is a battle over public opinion," Baker said. "It's a declaration of one of the four parts of the federal government that there's dissatisfaction with the war."

To be sure, Friday's vote was merely symbolic and doesn't limit President George W. Bush's ability to carry out the war as he sees fit. But coming a little more than a year after a near-unanimous reaffirmation of the war in the House, it was a stunning rebuke to Bush, signifying just how isolated he and the Republicans are in pursuing a course of adding troops in Iraq.

"It seems like he's ready to go ahead against his own Chiefs of Staff, top generals and the American people," not to mention of majority in Congress, Thurber said.

Bush this week worked to downplay the significance of the vote, saying in effect that the Democrats were within their rights to go on record as they saw fit as long as they didn't meddle with war funding. But some experts saw the vote as an important victory for new Democratic House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

"Pelosi really did pull this one off as well as could be expected," said Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at George Washington University. "She got it down to a message you could read on the head of a pin -- 'support the troops, oppose the surge.'"

Rep. Steve Israel (D-Huntington), who voted in favor, said the vote Friday was the "mirror image of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution" on Vietnam in 1964.

"For the first time the House of Representatives has sent the administration a bipartisan statement of policy that their war plans should be changed and I think that it's significant as a matter of policy today and as a matter of historical context."

But Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford) said that as far as he knew, it was the first time Congress had "ever legislated against a particular battlefield strategy. To me its a very bad precedent."

King, and outside experts, said the fact that only 17 Republicans voted for the resolution was a disappointment to the Democrats and did not bode well for Democratic intentions to start putting binding restrictions on use of funds in Iraq.

"This vote isn't as overwhelming as I thought it would be, so that isn't exactly a harbinger that the next one would pass," said Hess.

House Passes Nonbinding Resolution On Iraq (SFC)

By Edward Epstein

San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 2007

The House sent President Bush a double-barreled confrontational message today, telling him it opposes his latest buildup of troops in Iraq and in the next few weeks will try to start curtailing military operations in the war zone.

The Democratic-led House approved 246 to 182 a nonbinding resolution expressing the support of Congress for the U.S. troops serving in Iraq while opposing Bush's plan to send 21,500 more combat troops into the war.

Seventeen Republicans joined 229 Democrats in voting for the resolution. Two Democrats and 180 Republicans voted against it.

Before the House voted after 45 hours of debate that began Tuesday, lawmakers heard Speaker Nancy Pelosi reiterate her position that the 97-word resolution is just the start of the Democratic effort to end the four-year-old war.

"The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home," Pelosi said in the debate's final hours before a chamber half-full of Democrats who had been summoned to hear their new speaker. The Republican side was all but empty as she spoke.

Next up for the House will be legislation being pushed by one of Pelosi's closest allies, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., that will seek to limit Bush's ability to deploy more troops to Iraq. Murtha, the chairman of the panel overseeing military spending, plans to attach his proposals as conditions next month to Bush's latest $100 billion war spending request. Murtha said he will require that no units be sent to Iraq until fully trained and equipped, including the latest armored protection against roadside bombs.

Murtha also plans, with Pelosi's full support, to require military units receive more time at home before they can be redeployed to Iraq and to end the practice of "stop loss" in which miliary personnel are kept on active duty past their date for leaving the service.

Today's House passage of the resolution spurred Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., to try to break the partisan deadlock over the war in the upper chamber.

Republicans earlier blocked a vote on a more wide-ranging bipartisan resolution against Bush's plan that had been sponsored by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., a former Navy secretary and past chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Reid plans a rare Saturday vote -- when the body should have begun its weeklong Presidents' Day recess -- on a motion to proceed with debate on the House-approved statement.

But the minority leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., told reporters Friday that he remains confident he can muster enough Republicans to block Reid's latest effort, which would need 60 votes to pass. Democrats hold a 51-49 majority in the Senate.

McConnell appeared with the House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, to demand votes in both chambers on proposals that Congress not cut funding for the war while U.S. forces are in the field.

Bush has said that while he disagrees with Pelosi and Murtha and their supporters he respects their right to make their case opposing his latest troop increase.

Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow, said Murtha's proposals to require better training and equipment as well as longer times between deployments were dangerous.

"Anything that is going to tie the hands of military commanders and deny both the funds and flexibility they're going to need, he will take a dim view of," Snow said of the president.

"We're just not going to get into trying to characterize a specific position about a bill that has yet to see the light of day," Snow added.

Bush spoke with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Al Maliki on Friday and encouraged him to have his forces take a more active role in fighting insurgents. The president said he conveyed "a message of urgency to the Iraqi government that our patience is not unlimited and that we expect that government to perform."

The final hours of the House debate -- in which 392 members spoke -- were pointed as both sides repeated the themes that have sounded since Tuesday.

Republicans opponents said the resolution was contradictory in praising the troops but opposing their mission. They also said it amounted to micromanaging military strategy.

"Are we really best equipped to decide what reinforcements are sent into battle?" asked Rep. Greg Walden, R-Ore. "Isn't that better left to the commanders in the field?"

Rep. Mike Ferguson, R-N.J., acknowledged that Bush's strategy hasn't worked too well, but said the Democrats, by opposing Bush's "surge," were in effect endorsing the status quo.

"The prospected of success are dwindling but a new and amplified effort may offer the best hope we have for success and for the Iraqi government," Ferguson said.

And Republicans warned that the Iraq war is part of the broader fight against Islamic extremism.

"What we're doing with this resolution is not a salute to GI Joe. It's a salute to jihadist Joe," said Rep. Phil Gingrey, R-Ga.

But Democrats said it's time for a sharp change of course with Iraq stuck in a civil war as the American military operation soon enters its fifth year with more than 3,100 Americans killed and more than $400 billion spent.

"Sending 21,000 more troops is nothing but stay the course on steroids," said Rep. Xavier Becerra, D-Los Angeles

Rep. Paul Hodes, D-N.H., one of the Democratic freshman who ousted a GOP incumbent last November on an anti-war platform, said Congress must rein in the president. "The administration is in a parallel universe of its own creation," Hodes said.

While the resolution doesn't require Bush to do anything, its proponents hope it sends him a strong signal that he should sit down with Congress' Democratic leaders to discuss new strategy.

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-San Mateo, one of the resolution's bipartisan co-sponsors, said calling the resolution nonbinding ignores its real power.

"What could be more binding on the president than the view of the elected representatives of the American people?" asked Lantos, the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Boehner, who accuses the Democrats of slowly trying to suffocate the miliary effort in Iraq, challenged them to a direct debate on cutting off funding.

"Let's get away from the shadow boxing, the slow bleed," and have an up-or-down vote on funding, rather than attaching conditions to future spending legislation, he said.

House Vote Repudiates Iraq Policy (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, February 17, 2007

Paul is the only Texan among 17 GOP dissenters

WASHINGTON — The Democratic-controlled House, joined by U.S. Rep. Ron Paul of Lake Jackson and 16 other Republicans, on Friday delivered a symbolic but stern repudiation of President Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Only two Democrats defected in the showdown with the White House over an increasingly unpopular war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

On the 246-182 vote, the Democrats were joined by a smaller-than-expected group of Republicans. Early predictions suggested that as many as 60 Republicans skittish over the public's growing opposition to the war would back the resolution engineered by Democratic legislative leaders.

With the exception of Paul, Texas' 18 other Republicans and 13 Democrats voted along party lines. Paul, who has a strong Libertarian streak and is weighing a GOP presidential bid, was the only Texas Republican who voted against the 2002 resolution authorizing Bush to go to war to depose Saddam Hussein.

"Resorting to a medical analogy: A wrong diagnosis was made at the beginning of the war, and the wrong treatment was prescribed," said Paul, a physician. "Refusing to reassess our mistakes and insisting on just more and more of a failed remedy is destined to kill the patient. In this case, the casualties will be our liberties and prosperity here at home and peace abroad."

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, of Nevada, set a rare Saturday vote to bring up the identical resolution in the Senate. Sen. John Cornyn, of Texas, and other Republicans said they would block Democrats from getting the 60 votes necessary to bring up the measure unless they also can vote on an alternative that would oppose any cuts in troop funding.

Emotional clashDuring four days of House debate, Democrats and Republicans clashed in often emotional, personal terms about the future course of the U.S. military campaign in Iraq and the broader fight against Islamic militants.

Republicans warned that the resolution marks the first step in a Democratic campaign to prevent Bush from deploying additional troops by cutting off funds.

Democrats, mulling a number of ways to place constraints on Bush's ability to deploy more troops to Iraq, will get a chance to do so when they take up his request for $93 billion in additional war funds.

Former Vietnam POW Sam Johnson, a Republican congressman from the Dallas area, beseeched colleagues Friday to reject the resolution, which affirms support for the troops but disapproves of Bush's decision to send more to Iraq.

"Our troops and their families want, need and deserve the full support of the country and the Congress," Johnson said, receiving a standing ovation as lawmakers from both parties saluted his heroism. "Moms and dads watching the news need to know that the Congress will not leave their sons and daughters in harm's way without support."

Johnson and his allies insisted that withdrawal from Iraq would destabilize the Middle East and embolden al-Qaida. Democrats argued that the United States is mired in a civil war that can be won only by diplomatic means and with Iraqi resolve. Staying in Iraq brings with it a far greater peril, they said.

"The longer it takes us to resolve the situation in Iraq, the longer resources and attention will continue to be diverted from the war on terrorism," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, of California. "Our ability to respond to the escalating conflict in Afghanistan and other potential crises in the world is constrained severely by the deterioration in military readiness to levels not seen since the Vietnam era."

Facing the reality that the resolution would pass, the White House did little to lobby against it and now is focused on the steps Democrats will take to block the so-called troop surge.

"What the president is insistent upon is that our forces have the funds they need and the flexibility required to continue to execute not only the Baghdad security plan, but the way forward that's designed to secure the situation in Iraq," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

House Minority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio, called "unthinkable" any strategy to deny funding for troops.

"The American people will not support a strategy that involves pulling the rug out from under American troops," Boehner said.

Opposition to escalationEfforts to limit Bush's ability to deploy troops could prove a far tougher vote for Democrats, who fear being viewed as denying the troops necessary armor, protection and support.

A new AP poll found that while 63 percent of Americans oppose a troop surge, two-thirds also reject the idea of cutting off funds to the troops.

Rep. Al Green, D-Houston, said he was unsure how he'd vote on the Democrats' possible next action.

"I don't make snap decisions about how we will handle issues concerning our military because our military makes ... the freedoms that we enjoy possible," Green said. "For me, it would be a serious vote and I would think long and hard before I cast a vote one way or another."

Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, previewed the strategy Republicans would use to fight any funding cuts.

"Does this Congress want to tell our troops in the ground 'Do more with less even though we in Congress have it within our power to give you aid?' " Poe asked.

He dramatically read to the House the letter a besieged William Barrett Travis wrote from the Alamo in 1836 begging for reinforcements.

Thirty-two men joined the 150 or so fighters inside the San Antonio mission, whose defenders were killed a few days later by Mexican soldiers.

House Opposes Iraq Buildup (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON – The House voted Friday to oppose a troop buildup in Iraq, the first time since the war began nearly four years ago that Congress has gone on record against President Bush's policy.

Seizing that momentum, Senate Democratic leaders are delaying their weeklong recess to vote today on whether to consider the House's measure. They'll try to pressure enough Senate Republicans up for re-election next year to join them and allow the debate to begin – or they'll blast those Republicans as supporting the escalation of an unpopular war.

While the House's 246-182 vote on a nonbinding resolution carries no force of law, its political symbolism gives it some historic significance. Congress has rarely objected to a president's military strategy once combat is under way.

"People will look back in history and see it as the first step in an effort by Congress to limit the commander-in-chief powers of this president," said James Thurber of American University, an authority on Congress and the presidency.

"It's similar to the early [congressional] steps with regard to Vietnam," he said. "It's not the same as setting timelines and cutting money, but I think those things are likely to come unless there is a significant change on the ground in Baghdad."

Seventeen Republicans voted for the resolution – about half what Democrats had hoped for – while two Democrats from conservative districts voted against it: Reps. Gene Taylor of Mississippi and Jim Marshall of Georgia.

War opponents hope Friday's vote will serve as a turning point, the first of several actions that the Democratic-led Congress will take to pressure the president to redeploy troops to Afghanistan, the Middle East or elsewhere, or bring them home. Within minutes of the vote, Democrats said their next move would be to challenge Mr. Bush's request for $93 billion in new funds for the Pentagon

But getting binding anti-war legislation through the Senate, where Democrats hold only a 51-49 majority, and past Mr. Bush's veto, will be difficult, if not impossible.

HOW TEXANS VOTED

All Texas Democrats in the House voted for the resolution, as did Republican Ron Paul of Surfside. The rest of the state's GOP representatives voted against it.

Mr. Bush made no comment on the developments in the House, and his spokesman said the president was too busy to watch the proceedings on television.

Mr. Bush has already said passage of the measure will not deter him from proceeding with the deployment of 21,500 troops, designed primarily to quell sectarian violence in heavily populated Baghdad.

Emotional, agonizing

The rhetoric on the House floor Friday was emotional, sweeping and at times agonized, with orators on both sides speaking of honoring the dead, staying true to the nation's mission and respecting the Constitution. In a chamber that often sees a lone congressman addressing an empty chamber, many seats were filled, and particularly eloquent speeches were met with standing ovations. It was perhaps the closest Congress had come in three decades to the impassioned debates that animated the nation during the Vietnam War.

"The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, who led the House in a moment of silence, out of respect, she said, for those who fought, and "particularly those who have lost their lives in the war, and their families."

Vietnam POW

Rep. Sam Johnson, the Plano Republican who served seven years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was equally impassioned as he wrapped up the four-day debate, during which 390 of 434 lawmakers spoke. As he stepped to the microphone, lawmakers in both parties rose to applaud his heroism.

"Now it's time to stand up for my friends who did not make it home and for those who fought and died in Iraq already," he said in opposing the resolution. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them," he added, snapping off a salute as he finished his remarks to another ovation.

House Denounces Bush's Iraq Strategy (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

The US House of Representatives on Friday issued a rebuke to George W. Bush's Iraq strategy in the first concrete demonstration of opposition to the war by Capitol Hill since the US-led invasion almost four years ago.

The 246-182 vote was non-binding and will have no impact on Mr Bush's plan to deploy 21,500 extra troops in addition to the 131,000 already there as part of his "new way forward in Iraq" unveiled last month.

But leaders of the Democratic party, which won midterm congressional elections in November largely on the back ofdisaffection over Iraq, said yesterday's symbolic step would be followed by measures to limit Mr Bush's ability to "escalate" the war.

The vote, to be followed by a similar one in the Senate on Saturday, marked the most significant questioning of a US president's wartime authority since the 1970 vote to rescind the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which led to war in Vietnam.

Nancy Pelosi, Democratic speaker of the House, said: "The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success. The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home."

The White House said Friday's resolution went against the wishes of the Iraqi government and the US military in Iraq.

Republican leaders said the Democratic party was attempting a "slow bleed" of operations in Iraq that would culminate in a move to cut off congressional funding for US troops there. Seventeen of the 201-strong Republican caucus voted with Friday's resolution, fewer than party leaders had feared.

"They [supporters of the resolution] are gambling on failure," said Tony Snow, White House spokesman. "The president has a plan for success...What we're afraid of is that this is, in fact, going to serve as a precursor for cutting off our troops."

Democratic leaders plan to tread a fine line in the next few weeks that will involve taking further steps to oppose Mr Bush's prosecution of the war - such as attaching conditions to future congressional funding of military operations - while also making it clear they will continue to support American troops in the field.

"The Democratic party is highly conscious of the fact that the overwhelming majority of the American public opposed the Vietnam war and yet it was the Democrats who emerged as the losers politically," said Mark Schmitt at the New America Foundation, a centrist think-tank in Washington.

Among Democratic plans being floated are measures that would require the Iraqi government to meet certain benchmarks before new funds were authorised and conditions on the US administration's ability to redeploy military units to the battlefield. The US army has complained that it is severely under-equipped and overstretched.

House OKs Measure Opposing Troop Surge (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Democratic-controlled House issued a symbolic rejection of President Bush's decision to deploy more troops to Iraq on Friday, opening an epic confrontation between Congress and commander in chief over an unpopular war that has taken the lives of more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

The vote on the nonbinding measure was 246-182, and within minutes, Democrats said their next move would be to challenge Bush's request for $93 billion in new funds for the Pentagon.

"The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi, leader of Democrats who gained power last fall in elections framed by public opposition to the war.

"The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home," she vowed after the vote, in which 17 Republicans joined 229 Democrats in a wartime rebuke to the president.

Citing recent comments by Democrats, Bush's Republican allies said repeatedly the measure would lead to attempts to cut off funds for the troops. Outnumbered, they turned to GOP Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas to close their case - and the former Vietnam prisoner of war stepped to the microphone as lawmakers in both parties rose to applaud his heroism.

"Now it's time to stand up for my friends who did not make it home, and for those who fought and died in Iraq already," he said. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them," he added, snapping off a salute as he completed his remarks to yet another ovation.

Moving quickly, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., set a test vote for Saturday on an identical measure, and several presidential contenders in both parties rearranged their weekend campaign schedules to be present.

Republican senators said in advance they would deny Democrats the 60 votes needed to advance the resolution, adding they would insist on equal treatment for a GOP-drafted alternative that opposes any reduction in funds for the troops.

Even so there were signs of Republican restlessness on the issue. Only two members of the GOP rank and file sided with Democrats on an earlier procedural vote; the total figured to be higher this time.

The House vote completed a turnabout from the fall of 2002, when the House bowed, 296-133, to Bush's request to authorize military action against Iraqi ruler Saddam Hussein.

U.S.-led troops made quick work of his regime but soon found themselves targeted in a country where long-suppressed sectarian rivalries flared and outside forces rushed to intervene. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died in the ensuing war, along with more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

Bush made no comment on the developments in the House, and his spokesman said the president was too busy to watch the proceedings on television.

After a secure videoconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush said the Iraqis reported providing troops to fight alongside Americans, making sure that no ethnic or religious factions are ignored in the security operations, providing $10 billion toward reconstruction and working on an oil revenue-sharing law.

"That's good news for the Iraqi people. And it should give people here in the United States confidence that his government knows its responsibilities and is following through on those responsibilities," Bush said.

More than 390 of 434 lawmakers spoke during nearly 45 hours of dignified debate that spilled across four days - an unusual amount of time devoted to what Republicans and Democrats alike said was the most significant issue confronting the country.

House Republican Leader John Boehner appeared to choke back tears at one point as he read from a letter that a husband of a former congressional aide wrote home before being killed in Fallujah.

Pelosi led the House in a moment of silence, out of respect, she said, for those who fought, and "particularly those who have lost their lives in the war, and their families."

DOJ_NMG_0134201

Supporters of the nonbinding resolution included 229 Democrats and 17 Republicans - fewer GOP defections than Democrats had hoped to get and the White House and its allies had feared. Two Democrats joined 180 Republicans in opposition.

The developments unfolded as a new poll showed more than half those surveyed view the war as a hopeless cause.

A sizable majority, 63 percent, opposes the decision to dispatch more troops, although support for Bush's plan has risen in the past few weeks from 26 percent to 35 percent, according to the AP-Ipsos poll.

The House measure disapproves of Bush's decision to increase troop strength, and pledges that Congress will "support and protect" the troops.

Bush has already said passage of the measure will not deter him from proceeding with the deployment of another 21,500 troops, designed primarily to quell sectarian violence in heavily populated Baghdad.

Already, troops of the Army's 82nd Airborne have arrived in Iraq. Another brigade is in Kuwait, undergoing final training before proceeding to Iraq. Three more brigades are ticketed for the Baghdad area, one each in March, April and May.

In addition, the Pentagon is sending two Marine battalions to Anbar Province in the western part of the country, the heart of the Sunni insurgency.

Bush and his allies in Congress calculated days ago that the House measure would pass, and increasingly have focused their energy on the next steps in the Democrats' attempt to end U.S. participation in the war.

"The President believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our Armed Forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

But Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., who chairs the committee that will review Bush's request, said, "the president wants a supplemental (spending bill). If he wants it, he's going to have to accept certain things."

Democrats have made clear in recent days they will use Bush's spending request to impose certain standards of readiness, training and rest for the troops.

"That stops the surge (in troops) for all intents and purposes, because ... they cannot sustain the deployment," Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., said recently.

Republicans pointed to Murtha's remarks repeatedly during the day as evidence that despite their claims to the contrary, Democrats intend to cut off funds for the troops.

"This is all part of their plan to eliminate funding for our troops that are in harm's way. And we stand here as Republicans ... committed to making sure our troops in harm's way have all the funds and equipment they need to win this war in Iraq," said Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader.

House Rebukes Bush On Iraq Troop Surge (HILL)

By Klaus Marre, Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, February 16, 2007

With bipartisan support, the House Friday passed 246-182 a non-binding resolution expressing its disapproval of President Bush's plan to send more combat troops to Iraq.

Seventeen Republicans joined all but two Democrats in supporting the measure. Two Democrats and four Republicans did not vote.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said the vote on the resolution, which supports the troops but rejects the surge of U.S. forces, would send a "strong message" to Bush. "The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home," she said.

But House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the vote is "the first step down a treacherous path." He accused Democrats of wanting to "micromanage the war" through the power of the purse. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) said the resolution transfers the House into 435 generals.

Republicans voting for the resolution were Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Howard Coble (N.C.), Tom Davis (Va.), John Duncan Jr. (Tenn.), Phil English (Pa.), Wayne Gilchrest (Md.), Bob Inglis (S.C.), Tim Johnson (Ill.), Walter Jones (N.C.), Ric Keller (Fla.), Mark Kirk (Ill.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio), Ron Paul (Texas), Tom Petri (Wis.), Jim Ramstad (Minn.), Fred Upton (Mich.) and James Walsh (N.Y.).

Democratic Reps. Gene Taylor (Miss.) and Jim Marshall (Ga.) voted with the Republicans.

Despite the loss, Republican leaders were pleased to limit the defections. At the beginning of the week, House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said estimates of as many as 60 Republicans crossing party lines were not "at all unreasonable." Blunt said the final vote count showed that the GOP "won the debate."

The White House responded to the vote by pointing out that the measure is non-binding.

"[The president's surge plan] enjoys the support of the Iraqi government and U.S. military leadership, including Gen. David Petraeus, Commander of the Multi-National Force in Iraq, who recently was confirmed to his post by an 81-0 vote in the Senate," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

"The president ordered a new way forward in Iraq because he, like most Americans, believed the existing situation in Iraq was unacceptable. The president concluded that this new strategy was necessary in order to help the Iraqi government gain control over Baghdad, assume more responsibility for security, and pursue reconciliation of all of Iraq's communities."

Snow added that Congress will soon "have the opportunity to show its support for the troops in Iraq by funding the supplemental appropriations request the president has submitted, and which our men and women in combat are counting on."

The White House spokesman also told reporters Friday that the resolution did not come up during a 45-minute conversation between the president and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Pelosi said Congress owes the troops "a course of action in Iraq that is worthy of their sacrifice." The Speaker said placing the emphasis on training Iraqi forces would allow "the phased redeployment of our forces from Iraq to begin within the next four to six months."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has said he favors the House resolution over a bipartisan Senate measure and will seek to bring it to a vote in the upper chamber. The Senate will meet Saturday and vote on cloture on the resolution.

House Passes Iraq Resolution As Senate Readies For Saturday Vote (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, February 16, 2007

The House passed a nonbinding resolution Friday afternoon opposing President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, as Senators were preparing for what is expected to be a brief but bitter Saturday session during which Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will attempt to bring the measure to the floor.

The resolution passed the House, 246-182, with 17 Republicans joining all but two Democrats in voting "aye."

On the Senate side, although Democrats at press time appeared to have peeled off several Republicans — notably Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) — senior Democratic aides said Reid likely would fall just short of the 60 votes needed to end a GOP filibuster. One aide predicted Democrats would fall just three or four votes short of breaking the filibuster.

While Democratic aides said every member of their Caucus aside from Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.) would attend the Saturday vote — despite the angry private protests of the crowd of 2008 presidential aspirants — several Republicans were expected to skip the vote. Sens. Kit Bond (R-Mo.) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), both announced today they would forgo the vote.

Outside organizations were gearing up for a last-minute push to pressure vulnerable Republican incumbents to break with their leaders and end the filibuster. MoveOn.org, VoteVets and Americans Against Escalation In Iraq were all planning phone banking, e-mail campaigns and "citizen lobbying" trips to Capitol Hill for today and Saturday morning targeting GOP moderates up for re-election in 2008.

One lawmaker who will not be present for Saturday's vote is Senate GOP Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.), who will be leaving before the roll call vote to lead an official visit to Iraq.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) also will be on the trip, as will a handful of House Members from both parties.

House Rebukes The President On Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Seventeen Republicans joined Democrats on Friday in passing a two-sentence resolution denouncing President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq.

The resolution passed easily, 246-182.

Democratic leaders on Saturday will attempt to bring the same measure to the floor in the Senate. (Full story)

Democrats hailed the victory, while outside the chamber, Republican congressional leadership blasted the resolution, calling it the first step toward de-funding the war.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, said the passage of the non-binding resolution "should send a very clear and firm message to the president of the United States: that the American people spoke in November, that they wanted a new direction in Iraq. This resolution today sets the stage for that new direction," she said.

"The Congress of the United States knows that if we pass a bill, a law, a binding document, the president can veto that," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland. "What the president cannot veto is the opinion of the Congress of the United States, the judgment of the United States Congress, the advice and counsel of the Congress of the United States. He cannot veto that."

The resolution says that Congress supports the military but disapproves of Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq. A clear majority of Republicans battled to the end against the resolution.

"One vision sees no hope for us in Iraq and counsels that we withdraw, just give up," said Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the ranking Republican on the Foreign Affairs Committee. "By contrast, the other vision focuses on success."

House Minority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said he was concerned that the "Democrats in the House and Senate intend to tie the president's hands when it comes to the conduct of war in Iraq. That's why we want a vote in the House and Senate that says that we will not, we the United States Congress, will not cut funding for our troops in harm's way."

The Democratic leadership has said it will not cut funds for troops already in Iraq, but Sen. John Murtha, chairman of the committee in charge of the Defense Department's purse strings, has already signaled he may attempt to tie future deployments to legislation requiring the troops be fully equipped and armored before they're allowed to be shipped out.

Republicans say that's not necessary.

"What we have now is a system where you can move personnel very quickly; they marry up with the equipment in places like Kuwait and they move into the battle," said Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, the ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee. "So our ability to move people quickly and move equipment quickly to the fight to save American lives and American interests will very much be compromised by any of these micromanaging policies.

"Micromanaging DoD personnel policies and trying to choke off equipment and people for the war-fighting theater is extremely dangerous," Hunter said.

The White House acknowledged the resolution's passage, noting in a statement from Press Secretary Tony Snow's office that the president's plan "enjoys the support of the Iraqi government and U.S. military leadership, including Gen. David Petraeus, commander of the Multi-National Force in Iraq, who recently was confirmed to his post by an 81-0 vote in the Senate."

"The resolution is nonbinding. Soon, Congress will have the opportunity to show its support for the troops in Iraq by funding the supplemental appropriations request the president has submitted, and which our men and women in combat are counting on," the statement said. "The president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

Now that the House has completed its debate, the showdown moves to the Senate, where Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada has promised to bring up the same resolution Saturday. Reid urged Senate Republicans to drop procedural moves that blocked votes on similar Senate resolutions last week.

"We demand an up-or-down vote," Reid said Thursday. "The resolution says we support the troops and oppose the escalation of the presence in Iraq. We're determined to give our troops and the American people the debate they deserve."

But it was not clear whether Reid and his allies will get the 60 votes needed for the Senate to cut off debate on other matters and bring up the issue. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said Republicans will insist on "a measure of fairness" that will allow them to offer alternative resolutions, including one stating the Senate won't cut off money for troops in the field.

"If we have only one alternative, it will involve a vote on funding the troops," said McConnell. He predicted enough Republicans would stick with him to prevent the House resolution from coming to the floor.

On February 5, all but two Republican senators voted to block debate on another non-binding resolution backed by most Democrats and several Republicans that would have expressed the Senate's opposition to deploying additional troops.

Republicans said Reid's latest move appears to leave behind that measure, backed by Virginia Republican John Warner, the influential former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and current Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, a Democrat from Michigan.

Published polls indicate a solid majority of the U.S. public opposes the Bush plan, and Democrats said the November election victories that put them in control of Congress show Americans want to wind down the nearly four-year-old war.

US House Rejects Bush Iraq Plan (BBC)

BBC.com, February 16, 2007

The US House of Representatives has voted in favour of a resolution criticising President George W Bush's decision to send extra troops to Iraq.

Seventeen of his Republican Party joined the Democrats in passing the non-binding motion 246 to 182.

The vote follows days of fierce debate, during which the Democrats have made it clear that more decisive steps to limit Mr Bush's war policy could follow.

The Senate is due to vote on Saturday on whether to debate the troop plan.

Text of resolution Previous Senate attempts to debate the anti-troop surge resolution have been met with delaying tactics from Republican members.

DOJ_NMG_0134204

If senators do vote to consider the resolution in their unusual Saturday session, Mr Bush faces the possibility that both chambers of Congress will repudiate his Iraq policy within two days, says the BBC's Justin Webb in Washington.

Although both the Congressional resolutions are non-binding, the president needs the legislators to support his $93bn (£48bn) emergency troop funding measure.

"The president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country," the White House said in a statement shortly after the vote.

White House officials said Mr Bush had been too busy to watch the proceedings on television.

'Tragic goal'

The House vote brought to a close the first full debate there since the Democrats took control of Congress in November.

Written by the Democrats, the resolution states that the House "will continue to support and protect" US soldiers in Iraq but that it "disapproves" of the 21,500-strong troop increase.

The bipartisan resolution today may be non-binding. But it will send a strong message to the president

Speaker Nancy Pelosi About 400 of 434 representatives in the House spoke during four days of debate.

Speaking after the vote, House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi said it would send an unmistakable signal to the White House.

"The president's escalation plan repeats past mistakes. The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success.

"The bipartisan resolution today may be non-binding. But it will send a strong message to the president - we here in Congress are committed to protecting and supporting our troops."

Ms Pelosi had earlier warned there would be "no more blank cheques" for Mr Bush on Iraq.

House Minority Leader John Boehner had urged lawmakers to vote against the motion, saying it was "the first step towards a tragic, unthinkable goal".

"We face a sophisticated, determined enemy who wants to annihilate our way of life," he said.

"We have a duty to stand and fight against those that seek to destroy America and the freedom that defines us."

Democrats Signal A Wider Battle Lasting The Rest Of President's Term (WP)

By Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

After enjoying great deference in the conduct of national security for his first six years in office, President Bush now faces an assertive opposition Congress that has left him on the defensive. The nonbinding resolution passed by the House yesterday on a largely party-line vote seems certain to be the first of a series of actions that will challenge Bush for the remainder of his presidency.

At stake is not just Bush's decision to send an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, the plan specifically renounced by the resolution. By extension, the 246 to 182 vote passed judgment on Bush's overall stewardship of the war in Iraq and, more broadly, on his leadership in the world. At a time when the president is confronting Iran over its nuclear enrichment program, the House vote demonstrates that he has far less latitude to take aggressive action than he might have had in the past.

"This is an important moment," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, who was President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser and is now a counselor at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "And it's an important moment not only about what's in the past, or even in the present, but also what might be happening in the future."

The resolution, he said, "tells the president that the country's increasingly tired of the war and the country's reaction to his provoking a new war would be even worse."

Both sides recognized that the House vote, along with a Senate vote scheduled for today, represents the opening salvo in a more protracted struggle. "To me, this is kind of a baby step. It doesn't have teeth," said David J. Rothkopf, author of "Running the World," a book on the making of modern foreign policy. "The real question is going to be whether the Democratic leadership goes further and challenges funding, because that's where Congress historically has been able to show its influence."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her close adviser, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), are devising a strategy to tie Bush's hands by placing conditions on future funding for the war, such as requiring any units sent to Iraq to meet certain standards for training, equipment and rest between deployments. Because those conditions might be hard to meet, they could slowly constrict Bush's ability to keep up troop levels.

But yesterday's vote signaled peril for the Democratic congressional leadership as well. Despite deep Republican discontent with the course of the war, Democrats were unable to persuade more than 17 members of the president's party to register that dissatisfaction with their votes. If Democratic leaders could not build a broader bipartisan coalition for a symbolic vote, it may prove much harder to attract Republican support for proposals to limit Bush's options in Iraq.

Many Democratic strategists remain allergic to repeating the finale of the Vietnam War, when Congress voted to cut funds for the South Vietnamese government and the nation fell to the North in 1975. For years afterward, Democrats have struggled to shed the image of being soft on defense, which is why they were so eager to bring along more Republicans yesterday.

The White House privately pressed that point with wavering Republicans. Even as Bush resigned himself to certain passage of a resolution with no substantive force and publicly made little effort to oppose it, aides such as national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley lobbied GOP lawmakers to stick with the president to avoid emboldening Democrats down the line. "If Republicans go along with this," an administration official said, "it sends a message to Murtha about what he might be able to do with the supplemental" war-spending measure.

Administration allies warned about the precedent beyond Bush as well. "If Congress proceeds to throttle the president's strategy, then it will seriously undercut the ability of future presidents to do what they need to do to protect the nation in a time of war," said James Phillips, a foreign policy scholar at the Heritage Foundation. "It's a mistake to think you can effectively run a war by committee."

The president and Congress have wrestled over national security since the founding of the nation. The first congressional investigation back in 1792 when George Washington was president looked into a bloody military defeat inflicted by Native Americans. Congress challenged the White House during the Mexican-American War and the Civil War, rejected the Treaty of Versailles negotiated by Woodrow Wilson after World War I, and tried to keep Franklin D. Roosevelt from aiding allies facing threats from Nazi Germany.

The clash between branches came to a head during the Vietnam War, when Congress rescinded the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution that Lyndon B. Johnson had used to justify an escalation. A measure to cut off money for the war was rejected in 1970 but increased pressure on Richard M. Nixon to turn the fighting over to the South Vietnamese. As Nixon withdrew U.S. forces, Congress in 1973 cut off funding for "offensive" operations, in effect ratifying what by then was the president's stated course. A 1974 vote cut aid to South Vietnamese forces by 50 percent after U.S. forces were already gone, leading to the fall of Saigon.

Tension between the executive and legislative branches over national security has percolated since then. Congress restricted Ronald Reagan from funding the contra rebels in Nicaragua, and the Senate rejected the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty submitted by Bill Clinton. But the tension had not reached the Vietnam War level until yesterday.

"There's always been a lot of dissent in wartime," said Senate historian Donald A. Ritchie. Sometimes, as in Vietnam, it takes a while to build, he added: "There's a certain point when everybody marches together. They were very much united with Johnson in '65 and '66. But when the war turned bad, that's when they broke away. The same was true in the Civil War, and the same was true in any protracted war when things didn't go well."

A Symbolic Vote Is A Sign Of Bitter Debates To Come (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — The symbolic House vote on Friday opposing the American troop buildup in Iraq was an act of Congressional defiance that lays the groundwork for an even more bitter and ultimately more consequential clash over whether and how lawmakers might restrict President Bush's authority to prosecute the war.

Even before the vote, the White House and Democrats who control Congress were girding for the next fight, over Mr. Bush's request for $99.6 billion in emergency spending for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Already, Democrats are contemplating moves that, while short of cutting off money for the war, would restrict how Mr. Bush can spend it by limiting the Pentagon's ability to recycle troops back to Iraq after they have returned home.

The 246-to-182 vote, with 17 Republicans crossing party lines to join Democrats, was a stark reminder of how isolated Mr. Bush has become as he presses ahead with his increasingly unpopular Iraq policy. The president himself seemed resigned to the outcome. At a news conference on Wednesday, he told reporters, "They have every right to express their opinion."

At this point, it is unclear whether that opinion will eventually translate into the political resolve to rein in Mr. Bush. But by emboldening critics of the Iraq war, the vote has made the debate over financing, which would have been unthinkable even six months ago, a virtual certainty. "What the president is getting is a real indication that the weather is going to get worse," said Tom Daschle, the former Senate Democratic leader. "He's going to be in the middle of a huge storm."

At his news conference on Wednesday, Mr. Bush seemed to be telling lawmakers to bring it on. "I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress, starting now," he said, "that they need to fund our troops and they need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done."

American history is replete with examples of clashes between Congress and the White House over war powers. Congress, for example, used its power of the purse to bar covert military assistance for the Nicaraguan contras — a move that led to the Iran-contra scandal under President Reagan — and to cap the number of troops in Vietnam.

When it comes to the war in Iraq, Mr. Bush has been betting that Congress will be unwilling to play that kind of "constitutional hardball," in the words of Martin S. Lederman, an expert on presidential war powers at the Georgetown University School of Law.

If Congress does try to restrict financing, Mr. Bush could be forced into a difficult choice of abiding by a statute he does not approve of, or asserting he has the constitutional authority to flout it.

Or, if lawmakers attach restrictions to a military spending measure, he could find himself in the uncomfortable position of vetoing a bill that provides money for the troops.

Allies of Mr. Bush make clear he will not accept financing restrictions without a fight.

"No president can afford to accept that kind of condition," said David B. Rivkin, a lawyer for the Reagan and first Bush administrations, who has been an ardent supporter of Mr. Bush in Iraq. "If Congress can do this to the president, the president, instead of being head of a co-equal branch, is a ward of Congress, a flunky."

For Democrats, the debate is not without political risk. They do not want to seem unpatriotic by advocating withdrawal of financial support for soldiers engaged in battle. At the same time, they are under intense pressure from the antiwar faction of their party and mindful of the results of midterm elections in November, which put them in the majority and have been widely interpreted as a call to bring the troops home.

On the House floor, Speaker Nancy Pelosi tried to give voice to the Democrats' balancing act. "The bipartisan resolution today is nonbinding," she said, "but it will send a strong message to the president: we are committed to supporting the troops and we disapprove of the escalation."

But symbolically opposing the president's plan to add more than 20,000 troops is not enough for war opponents, who have been banding together in state legislatures around the country to pass their own nonbinding resolutions and are pressing Congress to do more.

"We want the war to end," said the author of one such bill, Jeanne Kohl-Welles, who represents Seattle in the Washington State Senate.

"We want to have no more escalation, period," she said. "Rather than a nonbinding resolution, I would like Congress to take action to make it binding."

Just how Democrats will proceed is not entirely clear. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who is running for president, wants to repeal the 2002 resolution authorizing the Iraq war. Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who leads the House subcommittee that oversees the Pentagon budget, is drafting his own version of the president's financing request that could effectively limit troop deployments to Iraq.

The Murtha plan has already proven explosive. ThePolitico.com, a Web site that covers politics, dubbed it a "slow-bleed strategy," a term that Republicans seized upon. In an online commentary posted Friday, William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, wrote, "The national Democratic Party has become the puppet of antiwar groups."

The president, meanwhile, has pursued a kind of divide-and-conquer strategy, pitting the Senate against the House. With the Senate set to take up the House resolution on Saturday, he has been reminding reporters that the Senate had overwhelmingly confirmed Gen. David H. Petraeus — who supports the troop buildup — as the new American troop commander in Iraq. Why, Mr. Bush asks, would the House disapprove of the plan that the Senate has sent General Petraeus to carry out?

People on both sides say the Senate is unlikely to muster the votes to pass the House resolution, let alone restrain spending authority.

Mr. Bush has been urging Congress and the American public to give his troop buildup a chance, and for a while, at least, that argument may hold. The question is, how long?

Senate Democrats To Try Again For War Debate (POL)

By John Bresnahan, Carrie Budoff

The Politico, February 16, 2007

Senate Democrats, following four days of often-contentious war debate in the House, will try again Saturday to force debate of President Bush's plan to deploy another 21,500 troops in Iraq, but their second attempt in two weeks appears unlikely to succeed.

Several Republican senators, including John Warner of Virginia, intend to vote with Democrats. But Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said that he did not expect Democrats to stitch together the 60 votes necessary to move the Senate toward a debate on the anti-surge resolution approved by the House.

On Friday, the House adopted a Democratic non-binding resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send another 21,500 troops into Iraq.

The vote was 246 to 182, largely along party lines.

Seventeen Republicans broke ranks with the president and their own House leadership and supported the measure. Only two Democrats opposed it.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow pointedly noted the House resolution was non-binding.

"Soon, Congress will have the opportunity to show its support for the troops in Iraq by funding the supplemental appropriations request the president has submitted, and which our men and women in combat are counting on.'' Snow said, adding the "president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

In the House, the number of GOP defectors was smaller than Republican leaders had initially feared, thanks to a lobbying campaign by the president; his national security adviser, Stephen Hadley; and top GOP House leaders.

The 17 Republicans supporting the resolution were: Reps Mike Castle of Delaware, Howard Coble of North Carolina, Tom Davis of Virginia, John J. Duncan Jr. of Tennessee, Phil English of Pennsylvania, Wayne Gilchrest of Maryland, Bob Inglis of South Carolina; Timothy V. Johnson of Illinois, Walter B. Jones Jr. of North Carolina, Ric Keller, Fla.; Mark Kirk of Illinois, Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio, Ron Paul of Texas, Tom Petri of Wisconsin; Jim Ramstad of Minnesota, Fred Upton of Michigan, and Jim Walsh of New York.

Everyone but Inglis, Johnson and Petri had been mentioned as Republicans who would likely cross the aisle and vote with the Democrats.

The two Democrats who voted against the resolution were Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Gene Taylor of Mississippi.

Republican leaders were confident the defections would be under 20, a significant drop from the beginning of the week when Democrats were projecting 40 to 60 Republican defections.

Minority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., told a group of reporters afterward that Democratic projections of 40 to 50 defections at the early part of the week were not off base.

"We never had an opportunity to win the vote,'' he said, "but I thought we won the debate.''

In the Senate, At least one Republican in a group of seven that sent a letter last week to Senate leaders urging a debate will stick with his party. Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, said Friday that he will vote against the cloture motion because Democrats are not allowing debate on alternative resolutions, including one favored by GOP leaders to protect funding for troops in Iraq.

"The American people want Congress to play a role in the way this war is being handled," Voinovich said in a statement. "The first step is to demand a better plan, and we owe the people more than the 10 lines in the House resolution. You can't even begin to address a real solution to a complex situation in 10 lines."

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said "it remains to be seen whether we can get to 60 votes."

"Sen. Reid remains hopeful," said spokesman Jim Manley. "If not, we will be right back at this issue shortly after the recess."

Reid expects attendance from all members of the Democratic caucus, with the exception of Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota, who is still recovering from brain surgery, Manley said.

The rare Saturday session forced several presidential candidates to rework their weekend campaign schedules.

The Senate's third ranking leader, Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said he will not cancel his plans to travel to Iraq Saturday – a trip that had been in the works for a month.

"What more important place could you be?" Kyl asked reporters Friday at a Capitol news conference. "Getting the real story, not the story that is being spun here on Capitol Hill."

Not The "Real Vote" (WP)

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Or so Rep. John Murtha says of the House's Iraq resolution.

REP. JOHN MURTHA (D-Pa.) has a message for anyone who spent the week following the House of Representatives' marathon debate on Iraq: You've been distracted by a sideshow. "We have to be careful that people don't think this is the vote," the 74-year-old congressman said of the House's 246-182 decision in favor of a resolution disapproving of President Bush's troop surge. "The real vote will come on the legislation we're putting together." That would be Mr. Murtha's plan to "stop the surge" and "force a redeployment" of U.S. forces from Iraq while ducking the responsibility that should come with such a radical step.

We'll return to Mr. Murtha's plan, but first it's worth considering the five days of debate that he so breezily dismissed. It's true that nonbinding resolutions won't stop the troop surge, which is already underway. But after years of minimal debate and oversight of the war, the House Democratic leadership was right to allow scores of representatives to speak at some length on Iraq. Some of the speeches were little more than partisan rhetoric, but there were also intelligent and heartfelt interventions, especially from veterans of Iraq and Vietnam.

The House vote does matter: It ought to increase the pressure on Mr. Bush and the Iraqi government to follow through on their pledges to accompany the military campaign with tangible steps toward political accords and economic reconstruction. Senate leaders would be wise to reach an agreement today allowing a similar debate. And both chambers should aggressively conduct oversight hearings aimed at holding the administration to its promise to link continued U.S. troop deployments to Iraqi performance.

Mr. Murtha has a different idea. He would stop the surge by crudely hamstringing the ability of military commanders to deploy troops. In an interview carried Thursday by the Web site MoveCongress.org, Mr. Murtha said he would attach language to a war funding bill that would prohibit the redeployment of units that have been at home for less than a year, stop the extension of tours beyond 12 months, and prohibit units from shipping out if they do not train with all of their equipment. His aim, he made clear, is not to improve readiness but to "stop the surge." So why not straightforwardly strip the money out of the appropriations bill -- an action Congress is clearly empowered to take -- rather than try to micromanage the Army in a way that may be unconstitutional? Because, Mr. Murtha said, it will deflect accusations that he is trying to do what he is trying to do. "What we are saying will be very hard to find fault with," he said.

Mr. Murtha's cynicism is matched by an alarming ignorance about conditions in Iraq. He continues to insist that Iraq "would be more stable with us out of there," in spite of the consensus of U.S. intelligence agencies that early withdrawal would produce "massive civilian casualties." He says he wants to force the administration to "bulldoze" the Abu Ghraib prison, even though it was emptied of prisoners and turned over to the Iraqi government last year. He wants to "get our troops out of the Green Zone" because "they are living in Saddam Hussein's palace"; could he be unaware that the zone's primary occupants are the Iraqi government and the U.S. Embassy?

It would be nice to believe that Mr. Murtha does not represent the mainstream of the Democratic Party or the thinking of its leadership. Yet when asked about Mr. Murtha's remarks Thursday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) offered her support. Does Ms. Pelosi really believe that the debate she orchestrated this week was not "the real vote"? If the answer is yes, she is maneuvering her party in a way that can only do it harm.

On To The Hard Part On Iraq (NYT)

President Bush lost touch long ago with Iraq's political reality — not to mention Americans' anguish and disbelief at his mismanagement of the war. So we welcome the House of Representatives' long-overdue attempt to shake some sense into Mr. Bush with a resolution opposing his decision to send another 20,000 combat troops to fight this disastrous war without any plan to end it.

Yet yesterday's vote, in which 17 Republicans joined the Democrats to produce a margin of 246 to 182, was the easy part. It takes no great courage or creativity for a politician to express continuing support for the troops and opposition to a vastly unpopular and unpromising military escalation. Even if the Senate manages to overcome its procedural self-hobbling and approve a similar resolution, the war and the mismanagement will go on.

The next necessary steps will require harder thinking and harder choices. Congress needs to do what Mr. Bush is refusing to do: link further financing for the war to the performance of Iraq's Shiite-led government, which is making no serious effort to rescue its country from civil war.

Congress needs to impose clear benchmarks and rigorous timetables, insisting that the Iraqi government stop equivocating and start disarming sectarian militias, adopt a formula to share oil revenues equitably and end employment discrimination against Sunni Arabs. Congress must be prepared to cut off financing if the Iraqis refuse.

We fear that clever maneuvers like the one proposed by Representative John Murtha, reportedly with the backing of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, to dress up a reduction in troop strength as a "support the troops" measure won't help contain the war or make American troops safer. Mr. Murtha would link this year's war financing to the Pentagon's adoption of new deployment rules, including longer stretches from the battlefield for returning troops, more specialized training and better defensive equipment. That would let representatives cast a politically safe vote for financing the war, while forcing the Pentagon to gradually reduce the number of active duty troops available to serve in Iraq.

This page has advocated many of the same reforms — but not as a back-door way of forcing lower troop numbers in Iraq. Congress's overriding goal must be to find the most responsible way to extricate American troops from what is becoming an increasingly unwinnable war, while trying to contain the suffering and minimizing the damage to American interests in the region.

Instead of camouflaged troop squeezes, Congress needs to grasp the problem straight on and do what the administration won't do. It must impose tough requirements and deadlines on the Iraqi government, and link the future of all American troops in Iraq to the timely achievement of these goals.

House Irresolution (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

A funny thing happened yesterday on the way to the House of Representatives' vote to "support" the troops but assail their mission in Iraq: The majority for this "non-binding" attempt at gathering political cover was a lot smaller than advertised.

Yes, the Democrats carried the day, 246-182, and thus can say to their antiwar supporters that they "sent a message," or something, to President Bush and the Iraqis. But the margin was smaller than media speculation had predicted, with only 17 Republicans heading for the tall grass.

Minority Leader John Boehner and the GOP leadership deserve credit for making a spirited argument against the resolution that clearly won over many of their skittish backbenchers. Credit, too, to such "moderate" GOP Members as John McHugh of New York and Jim Saxton of New Jersey, who opposed the resolution despite the unpopularity of the war in their states. And credit as well to the two Democrats, Gene Taylor of Mississippi and Jim Marshall of Georgia, who didn't join their party's defeatist ranks.

As for those in favor, no fewer than 69 Members were for the war before they were against it. By our count, 13 Republicans and 56 Democrats voted to authorize the war in October 2002, when it was popular, but yesterday voted against it now that the going is tough. We have more respect for those, such as Texas Republican Ron Paul or Ohio Democrat Dennis Kucinich, who voted against the war from the start.

The immediate effect of the modest majority vote may be to slow the momentum for Speaker Nancy Pelosi's "slow-bleed" strategy to micromanage the war without actually cutting off funds. Democrats don't want to leave their fingerprints on defeat in Iraq by actually voting to bring the troops home. So instead, they're hoping to put restrictions on troop deployments that will make it impossible for the Iraq commander, General David Petraeus, to fulfill his mission. Yesterday's vote showed that if Democrats want to execute this cynical duck-and-run, they will have to do it without much Republican help.

Words Of War (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Great oratory isn't the House's strong suit. But at least its members actually voted on Iraq policy.

FORTUNATELY FOR Congress, actions speak louder than words — even symbolic actions such as the House of Representatives' approval Friday of a nonbinding resolution opposing the "surge" of U.S. troops to Iraq.

The surge is necessary, but the resolution may be as well — as a way to hold President Bush to his commitment that U.S. involvement in Iraq is not open-ended. Still, the world will little note, nor long remember, the words that were uttered by House members before the 246-182 vote. Congress is often a cave of winds, but with a few exceptions the House's Iraq debate was a blowhard's paradise.

This debate had it all: pointless recriminations about the original decision to invade Iraq and topple Saddam Hussein; strained analogies to Pearl Harbor, the Alamo and an unfriendly neighbor who won't mow his own lawn; invocations of Osama bin Laden (as the real enemy in Iraq or, alternatively, as the real enemy from whom Iraq has distracted us); and, on both sides, simplistic depictions of what's going on in Iraq as either a civil war with no international implications (a scenario attractive to supporters of the resolution) or the epicenter of the worldwide "war on terror" (an article of faith for some opponents).

Non sequiturs and contradictions abounded. Some opponents of the resolution ridiculed it as meaningless and "fake"; others warned that it was all too substantial, the first step in a Democratic master plan to defund the war directly or by erecting new "readiness" requirements that would make the surge impractical. (Such proposals are in the air but aren't affected by this resolution.) Meanwhile, some supporters of the resolution talked as if it would not only stop the surge (which it won't) but end current U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Perhaps the most perplexing aspect of the debate was the near-universal emphasis on "supporting the troops," a mantra so malleable that it was cited by both supporters and opponents of the resolution. For Rep. Yvette D. Clarke (D-N.Y.), supporting the troops meant moving them "out of harm's way." But Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) asked Democrats: "How can we say you support the troops when you don't support sending the people necessary to back them up to do the job that we sent them there to do to start with?"

Perhaps it was too much to expect eloquence or even originality in this week's debate. But what the members said was less important than what they did, which was to give vent to the American people's impatience with a war that has cost more than 3,000 American lives and will soon begin its fifth year.

Rice Makes Unannounced Visit To Iraqi Capital (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 17 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made an unannounced visit to Baghdad Saturday for meetings with U.S. and Iraqi officials, arriving in the embattled capital as the Iraqi government reported initial success in a new security effort.

Rice was expected to hold a town hall-style meeting with U.S. Embassy and military personnel in the heavily fortified Green Zone and later meet with senior Iraqi government officials, according to Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the embassy. The secretary of state, who arrived at about 11:30 a.m. Baghdad time, planned to brief reporters on her visit Saturday afternoon. No further details about her trip were immediately disclosed.

Rice, the highest-ranking U.S. official to visit Iraq since the start of the new crackdown on sectarian violence in Baghdad, made the previously unannounced stop as part of a trip to the Middle East. She was scheduled to fly to Israel this weekend for a meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, and she planned to hold talks Monday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Her visit came amid a relative lull in violence, which the Iraqi government held up as a promising sign that the new Baghdad security plan is off to a good start. A top U.S. military official cautioned, however, that it might be a temporary letup as militant organizations assess the new measures and gear up to fight back.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki assured President Bush Friday that the three-day-old plan "has achieved fabulous success," according to an account of the conversation released by the prime minister's office. Speaking by secure video link-up, Maliki also told Bush that officials will be "firm in dealing with any side that breaks the law, regardless" of their sect.

U.S. Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr., the commander of the 1st Cavalry Division in Baghdad, spoke of the recent calm in more cautious terms. "We do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil told reporters at the Pentagon Friday, speaking from Baghdad in a video link-up, according to a transcript. "This enemy knows how -- they understand lethality, and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

Meanwhile on Friday, a U.S. military spokesman said the leader of a powerful Sunni insurgent group in Iraq was not wounded in a clash with police, denying a report from Iraq's Interior Ministry. "We believe that al-Masri was not killed or wounded in any action yesterday," Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver said Friday.

A ministry spokesman said Thursday night that the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, who is known by the alias Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was injured in a shootout with police earlier that evening. The spokesman also said one of Masri's top deputies, Abu Abdullah al-Mujamie, was killed in a gun battle with police near Samarra.

A statement posted online attributed to the insurgent group denied that Masri had been killed and accused the Iraqi government of fabricating the report.

However, an al-Qaeda in Iraq leader confirmed the death of the deputy in a phone interview Thursday night. Repeated attempts to reach ministry sources Friday for further details on the reported clash were unsuccessful.

Iraqi and U.S. forces have been sweeping targeted areas of the city to root out insurgents and restore order in neighborhoods. So far, officials say, they have met little resistance.

The increased patrols are accompanied by other security measures, such as tightened controls at the borders with Syria and Iran and a crackdown on civilians carrying weapons.

To support the growing number of U.S. Army brigades in the Baghdad area, Pentagon officials said Friday that an additional division headquarters of about 1,000 soldiers will be sent three months earlier than expected. The 3rd Infantry Division headquarters, based at Fort Stewart, Ga., will deploy to Iraq in March instead of June. The soldiers will provide command and control, intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance.

The acceleration of the deployment reflects an immediate need for more support for what will be 10 U.S. brigades in Iraq's capital, officials said. There are currently eight brigades operating under the 1st Cavalry Division's leadership.

The deployment is the headquarters' third to Iraq, including the initial invasion of Baghdad in 2003. The unit's original June deployment was announced in November and was scheduled to be part of President Bush's plan to send about 17,500 additional U.S. troops to Baghdad.

Secretary Of State Rice Visits Baghdad (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 17, 2007

The success of a new security crackdown in Baghdad will be measured largely on how well the U.S.-backed government capitalizes on any respite of sectarian violence, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday.

Rice made an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital to check on the early days of the campaign to put down tit-for-tat violence between Sunnis and Shiites that has consumed Baghdad and contributed to the exodus of an estimated 3.8 million Iraqis from their homes.

Insurgent violence remains a concern. Rice's plane circled the airport for 30 minutes before landing because of military action in the city.

The joint U.S.-Iraqi campaign is under way as the House delivered a symbolic blow to President Bush's strategy to turn around an unpopular war that has been largely stalemated by internal Iraqi reprisal killings and terror campaigns that have little to do with U.S. forces.

"If in fact militias decide to stand down and stop killing innocent Iraqis ... that can't be a bad thing," Rice told reporters traveling with her. "But how the Iraqis use the breathing space that that might provide is what's really important."

Rice spoke with American troops and U.S. Embassy personnel before a scheduled meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite. The beleaguered official is increasingly seen as unwilling or unable to deliver security, essential public services or political inclusion for minority Sunnis.

Rice is the highest-level U.S. official in Iraq since the recent start of a massive security operation in the Iraqi capital. The visit was not previously announced as part of her trip to the Middle East.

She told the U.S. forces and diplomats that their work was worthwhile in helping Iraq and securing the safety of the U.S. at the same time.

"When you see Iraqis toiling and squabbling and struggling ... remember it's not easy to build a democracy," Rice said.

Rice will get an update on the security operation begun just days ago from U.S. generals, but she told reporters that the campaign appeared to be off to a good start. The number of Iraqi civilians killed in Baghdad's sectarian violence fell drastically Friday, and officials credited the security operation begun in force just days ago.

Ten bodies were reported by the morgue in the capital, compared to an average of 40- to 50 per day common in recent months, as parts of Baghdad have descended into a lawless jumble of gang killings and sectarian payback.

While the reduction in killings was a relief, U.S. officials sounded a note of caution. Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, said militias and insurgents have apparently decided to lie low at least during these early days of the security crackdown.

"They're watching us carefully," Fil said Friday. "There's an air of suspense."

But in the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk a suicide car bomber rammed into a crowded market on Saturday moments after a booby-trapped vehicle exploded, killing at least nine people and injuring 60, the police said. The back-to-back blasts shattered the brief lull in major violence around the country.

Meanwhile in Washington, the House of Representatives on Friday passed a nonbinding resolution, 246-182, voicing opposition to Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops into Iraq. The Senate was to meet in a rare Saturday session to consider a similar measure.

Rice Grilled On Extra Funding Sought For Iraq, Afghanistan (WP)

By Karen Deyoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Skeptical lawmakers yesterday demanded a detailed accounting of how Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to spend $6 billion in supplemental funds that the administration has asked for the State Department this year, much of it for Iraq and Afghanistan.

"I think you've got a lot of explaining to do," Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) told Rice at a hearing of the House Appropriations subcommittee on state and foreign operations. "A huge majority of the funds in the supplemental are for military, not political or economic or reconstructive, purposes."

Both Republicans and Democrats asked pointed questions about the rising cost of efforts that seem to be failing, despite newly announced U.S. strategies for both countries. Even as the administration has asked for more money, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) told Rice, it ought to increase its diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East.

"I plead with you, I beg of you," Wolf said, "if we're going to ask a young man or woman in our military to go to Iraq three different times, it's not asking too much . . . to send somebody to engage with regard to the Syrians."

Rice replied: "We don't have an ideological problem with talking to Syria." But, she said, "there just isn't any evidence that they're trying to change their behavior."

The supplemental funding is in addition to more than $140 billion in emergency money that President Bush has requested, primarily to fund new military operations. In a Thursday address, he urged Congress to provide $11.8 billion to accelerate military and police training and reconstruction in Afghanistan, where he said al-Qaeda and the Taliban are launching new offensives after having been "driven from power" by U.S. forces in 2001.

In a video posted on the Internet yesterday, al-Qaeda appeared to ridicule Bush's latest remarks. "Bush raved in his latest speech . . . that he has deprived al-Qaeda of a safe haven in Afghanistan," said a voice attributed to and read over a photograph of Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri. "The entire world bears witness to his barefaced lie."

The 24-minute video, marked as a product of al-Qaeda's video arm and made available and translated by the Alexandria-based analysis firm IntelCenter, is the longest and most sophisticated to date from Afghanistan. After Zawahiri's introduction, it purports to document an undated mujaheddin attack on a U.S. military encampment in Afghanistan. IntelCenter said it thinks the voice-over narration was provided by Adam Gadahn, the California native who has been indicted in absentia on a charge of treason for alleged al-Qaeda activities.

Intelligence and military officials in Washington did not dispute that the video is an al-Qaeda product. But they noted that it is not a recent recording, because the fighters are shown in warm-weather clothing amid greenery.

Regarding the claimed military operation, a Pentagon official said that "no one has been able to verify what they're talking about." The official said that U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan have not lost any direct engagements with Taliban or al-Qaeda forces. He said it is possible that the scenes of fighters preparing for battle and firing weapons may have been juxtaposed with those of a deserted compound once occupied by the U.S. military.

In yesterday's hearing, Rice acknowledged the poor results in U.S. efforts to stem Afghan opium production, which reached record levels last year.

"I have to say this is a case where priority and success actually are not linked," she said in response to a question from Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.). "We have put enormous effort into this, and it's just a tough problem to crack."

"Yeah, but it's not good enough," Lewis replied. He has heard a lot about various U.S. counternarcotics programs, he said, "but there have been no results."

Panel members sharply questioned both the supplemental budget and the other funding requests, including a planned $250 million cash payment to the government of Lebanon, $86 million requested for security assistance for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, and more than $500 million being spent for a new U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

Rice said a major portion of the Iraq money would fund the expanded Provincial Reconstruction Teams. The teams, led by U.S. diplomats, are located in Baghdad neighborhoods and elsewhere in the country, where they assist in developing the Iraqi economy and governance.

The teams, embedded with U.S. military units, are expected to "bring about 40,000 jobs [to] critical areas" in Iraq, Rice said. Iraqi government money, she said, would pay for additional job creation.

The Iraqi expenditure of $10 billion in reconstruction and job-creation funds was one of the "benchmarks" for the Baghdad government that Bush set when he announced his new strategy last month. Iraq has a $12.5 billion surplus of previously budgeted but unspent funds.

Rice pledged yesterday that the administration will see to it that Iraq's Shiite-dominated government spends the money, with at least $2 billion going to areas outside the capital. In White House remarks yesterday, after a conversation with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush said that Maliki has already "met that benchmark" by again budgeting the money.

Maliki Hails Lull In Violence (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 16 -- The relative lull in violence is a promising sign that the Baghdad security plan is off to a good start, the Iraqi prime minister said yesterday, while a top U.S. military official cautioned that it might be a temporary letup as militant organizations assess the new measures and gear up to fight back.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki assured President Bush that the three-day-old plan "has achieved fabulous success," according to an account of the conversation released by the prime minister's office. Speaking by secure video link-up, Maliki also told Bush that officials will be "firm in dealing with any side that breaks the law, regardless" of their sect.

Baghdad Plan Is A "Success," Iraq Prime Minister Tells Bush (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 16 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki told President Bush on Friday that the increased effort to provide security in Baghdad had gone exceedingly well so far, Mr. Maliki's office said in a statement.

The two spoke via video link and, according the statement, Mr. Maliki said, "The security plan has been a dazzling success during its first days."

Across Baghdad, there were signs of the heightened troop presence, as cars were searched at new checkpoints and raids resulted in the arrest of at least 35 people, according to Iraqi officials.

Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr., commander of the First Cavalry Division in Baghdad, told reporters on Friday that there had been a substantial reduction in violence in the past 48 hours, which he attributed both to the increased troop presence and the decision by Sunni and Shiite militants to keep a low profile.

"They're watching us carefully," he said. "There's an air of suspense throughout the city. We believe, there's no question about it, that many of these extremists are laying low and watching to see what it is we do and how we do it. How long that will last, we don't know."

American military officers also disputed Iraqi reports that the commander of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was wounded in recent fighting, saying they have seen no evidence to support the claim.

Still, in an interview on Friday, Iraq's Interior Ministry spokesman, Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, continued to maintain that Mr. Masri had been wounded in fighting near Balad, north of Baghdad. He said Mr. Masri was wounded Thursday afternoon, then managed to flee. But two other Iraqi officials contradicted that account.

In Hilla, south of Baghdad, the Iraqi security forces arrested 34 members of a messianic Shiite splinter group that just three weeks ago tried to overthrow the Shiite clerical hierarchy in Najaf.

In heavy fighting in January, hundreds of members of the group, called the Soldiers of Heaven, were killed as American forces joined the Iraqis in a daylong battle in which an American attack helicopter was shot down.

Jury Remains Out On Baghdad Crackdown (HC/AP)

By Brian Murphy,

Houston Chronicle/AP, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — As a military offensive seeks to bring Baghdad from the brink of anarchy, a top Iraqi security officer tried Friday to measure its early stages using the grim logic of a place with daily bloodshed: by counting the bodies arriving at the morgue. A total of 10 corpses were collected off the streets — apparently all victims of the city's lawless jumble of gang justice and sectarian payback. The daily body tally recently has often been 40 or more, excluding major bombings, said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi.

This was the basis for an upbeat message by Moussawi, a spokesman for the joint U.S.-Iraqi security sweep that began this week and has so far faced limited resistance. But his American counterparts remain much more guarded.

"I would say that it is way too early to establish any trends," said Lt. Col. Chris Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We've just started to focus our operations. We have months to go to see if we are going to succeed or not."

Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, attributed the reduction in violence not only to the increased security presence but also to an apparent decision by the militias and insurgents to lay low for a while.

"But make no mistake, we do not believe ... that's going to continue, and we do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil said. "And this enemy knows how — they understand lethality and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

The contrasting outlooks cut across the entire mission, dubbed Operation Law and Order, which seeks to reclaim the streets. Powerful militias and freelance vigilantes have carved Baghdad into fiefdoms and made even daily errands a gamble that could end with a car bombing or gunfire.

The Iraqis are eager to show clear progress to boost the leadership of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. U.S. commanders, however, are approaching the neighbor-by-neighbor sweep as a methodical campaign without quick victories — learning from past mistakes of pouring through an area, only to find that militiamen simply went underground and returned after American forces left.

"We are just at the beginning stages," reminded Garver.

But evidence of the offensive against militants appeared around the country.

Borders to Iran and Syria have been temporarily sealed in attempts to foil suspected supply routes. In Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, U.S. forces are under sharply escalating attacks from Sunni Muslim insurgents — suggesting that some groups have shifted from Baghdad to other areas to sidestep the crackdown in the capital.

U.S. military officials said demolition experts destroyed a bomb-making factory they linked to the al-Qaida in Iraq faction in Salman Pak, just southwest of Baghdad. The statement said the workshop contained about 1,000 pounds of explosives.

But doubt was cast on another reported blow to al-Qaida in Iraq.

The Interior Ministry said that leader Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was wounded and an aide killed Thursday in a clash with Iraqi forces near Balad, north of Baghdad.

Garver, the U.S. military spokesman, later said the Pentagon had no information that al-Masri was hit. The al-Masri deputy reported killed, identified as Abu Abdullah al-Majemaai, was detained last week and remains in jail, said an Iraqi army officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose the information.

In a statement posted on an Islamic militant Web site on Friday, the al-Qaida-affilated Islamic State of Iraq purportedly denied that al-Masri was wounded. It said the Iraqi government was "making up such news that has been denied even by their masters, the Americans."

Iraqi security officials also said 34 armed men belonging to a messianic Shiite cult were detained near Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad.

The Soldiers of Heaven, or Jund al-Samaa, cult was involved in a fierce gunbattle last month with Iraqi forces who accused it of planning to kill Shiite clerics and others in a bid to force the return of the "Hidden Imam" — a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad who disappeared as a child in the 9th century. Shiites believe he will return one day to bring justice.

In mosques Friday, some Muslim clerics supported the general goals of the military push to calm Baghdad. But others used the weekly prayers to denounce the American troop buildup in Baghdad.

Political leaders, too, quarreled over the widening security sweeps — reflecting starkly opposing perspectives among Iraq's two Muslim groups.

The majority Shiites have generally favored the campaign as a way to neutralize Sunni militant groups, blamed for waves of recent car bombings. Sunnis — who enjoyed a privileged position under Saddam Hussein — believe Shiite factions will use the military push to try to cement controls of key areas in Baghdad.

Sunni lawmaker Dhafir Al-Ani said on Al-Arabiya television that the Baghdad security plan had lost the "element of surprise" because it was announced long in advance, giving Shiite militiamen time to flee to Iran. He also claimed Shiite militias had provided security forces with some of the names on their wanted list.

But a Shiite lawmaker, Hadi Al-Amiri, backed the U.S.-Iraqi crackdown as a way to "target all those who cause the Iraqi bloodshed."

In Geneva, the International Organization for Migration offered a bleak picture of Iraqis trying to escape the violence and insecurity. Nearly 18,000 people have left their homes in the past three weeks in central and southern Iraq — some fleeing for the borders and others taking shelter in makeshift housing.

As many as 1 million Iraqis could flee their homes this year unless the unrest is brought under control, said a report by the 120-nation agency. An estimated 1.4 million Iraqis have already left their homes.

"The numbers of people that are being displaced are increasing every day," said Jemini Pandya, a spokeswoman for the group. "The security situation is not improving. It's not changing."

In other developments:

_ The Pentagon said it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq.

_ Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, told the Arabic language daily Al-Hayat that Sunni insurgents who are "honorable and genuine" must be given the chance to join the political process now that the United States is eager to pull its troops from Iraq. He said U.S. and Iraqi representatives must negotiate "with the participation of the resistance" after "America has failed to run the country."

_ On Saturday, two explosions tore through a crowded market area in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least five people and injuring 17, police said. The first blast came from a car rigged with explosives and was followed by a suicide attacker who drove a bomb-laden car into a busy area, which included a bus depot in a mostly Kurdish district of the city, authorities said. The blasts also damaged about 20 shops.

Sadr Commanders Flee Crackdown In Iraq (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Iraqi officials on Friday reported an “exodus” of commanders from the Shia Mahdi army, as armed groups seek to protect themselves from the US military crackdown in Baghdad and preserve their organisations.

Mystery has swirled over the whereabouts of Moqtada al-Sadr, the fiery cleric whose Mahdi army is accused by the US of a leading role in the sectarian violence that has devastated the capital.

Mr Sadr has always kept a low profile, fearing he might be captured or killed by US troops. US officials say he has fled Iraq and is hiding in Iran. His aides denounce the US assertions and say he remains in his country.

Jalal Talabani, the Iraqi president, late on Thursday said Mr Sadr, whose group is a partner in the governing Shia coalition, had ordered his commanders to leave Iraq to facilitate the US operation in the city.

A senior Iraqi official told the FT on Friday that there has been an “exodus” of commanders over recent days, and that Mr Sadr is likely to have travelled to Iran, though he had no idea how long he would stay there. Iranian officials say they have no comment on Mr Sadr’s whereabouts.

“All groups that are armed and those who are suspected of violence, whether from Mahdi or other organisations, saw that the government and the US were serious about the security plan and that everyone would be targeted,” said the official. “They fled, in a cautious attempt on their part to prevent capture.”

The senior official denied that the government had helped co-ordinate the “exodus” or asked Mahdi commanders with links to Iran to move out of Iraq for their own protection.

But the move by Mahdi commanders has highlighted the dilemma facing the Iraqi government as it seeks to balance support for the US operations with pressure from domestic coalition partners whom it relies upon for political backing.

It is not clear how long the Mahdi commanders will stay away. In previous security crackdowns in the capital, militias and Sunni insurgents faded but re-appeared when US forces retreated.

Iraqi officials say the return depends on the US and the government’s ability to establish their authority in Baghdad. “If we’re able to establish government authority, it will be more difficult for them to re-establish their own power on the ground,” said the senior government official.

One Shia Iraqi political adviser said the departure of Mahdi commanders would facilitate the military crackdown on the Sunni insurgents. By the time the commanders come back the insurgents may have been sufficiently weakened, reducing the need for Shia militias to fight a sectarian war, he suggested.

The retreat of the Mahdi commanders comes as Iran adopts a cautious approach to the intensifying US pressure against its alleged involvement in Iraqi violence, amid growing concern in Tehran that Washington could be preparing for direct military action against the Islamic republic.

The relationship between the Mahdi army and Iran has been at the centre of US-Iranian tensions. The US insists elements in Tehran have provided the militia with sophisticated explosives. Iran denies the allegations.

Sunni Insurgents Carrying Fight North Out Of Baghdad (HC/AP)

By Lauren Frayer,

Houston Chronicle/AP, February 17, 2007

BAQOUBA, IRAQ — Sunni insurgents have been streaming out of Baghdad to escape the security crackdown, carrying the fight to neighboring Diyala province where direct fire attacks on Americans have nearly doubled since last summer, U.S. soldiers say.

That has led to sharp fighting only 35 miles north of the capital in a province known as "Little Iraq" because of its near-equal mix of Sunni and Shiite Arabs as well as Kurds. At stake is a strategic region that extends from the northeastern gates of Baghdad to the Iranian border.

"I was here in 2004 and I don't remember them ever attacking tanks in open daylight, but now that's exactly what they're doing," said Capt. Paul Carlock, 31, of Chattanooga, Tenn., a company commander in the Army's 1st Battalion, 12th Cavalry Regiment. "There's a big Sunni influx here, and in the last month or so it's been pretty violent."

Some U.S. officers suspect the advance publicity for the Baghdad security plan may have encouraged extremists — both Sunnis and Shiites — to flee the capital for surrounding provinces, including Diyala, where fewer U.S. troops are stationed.

Even before President Bush announced last month that he was sending in 21,500 more soldiers, mostly to Baghdad, violence had been steadily decreasing in the capital and increasing in Diyala.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told President Bush that the increased effort to provide security in Baghdad had gone exceedingly well so far.

The two spoke Friday via video link and al-Maliki said, "The security plan has been a dazzling success during its first days." A total of only 10 corpses were collected Thursday off Baghdad streets. The daily body tally has often been 40 or more.

Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, attributed the reduction in Baghdad violence not only to the increased security presence but also to an apparent decision by the militias and insurgents to lay low for a while.

"But make no mistake, we do not believe ... that's going to continue, and we do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil said. "And this enemy knows how — they understand lethality and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

On Thursday, a rooftop sniper fired on members of the 12th Cavalry as they patrolled a suburb of Baqouba with Iraqi soldiers. Shots rang out for about 15 minutes until a Bradley Fighting Vehicle arrived and drove off the attackers.

Gates Follows Rumsfeld With A Less Combative Case For The Defence (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Before Robert Gates held his first Pentagon press conference as defence secretary, reporters were curious how his modus operandi would differ from Donald Rumsfeld's, his predecessor. When he opened with something Mr Rumsfeld rarely gave - an apology - it was clear a new era had dawned.

Sitting between reporters at a large table, Mr Gates apologised for the crowded room and for holding the briefing on Friday afternoon, before explaining that he would prefer "a more informal setting than the dais and the big sign behind me".

Although he returned to the Pentagon briefing room - where Mr Rumsfeld enjoyed lecturing reporters from the podium - for his second "round table", Mr Gates sat at a small table, prompting a joke that he resembled an anchor man for the Pentagon television channel.

Asked if he was trying to distinguish himself from the "acknowledged master of the Pentagon briefing", Mr Gates, who as director of the Central Intelligence Agency, had few public dealings with the media, said he would "never be in that category".

He added that he was not making a statement about the past. But he appeared to do just that when he explained his preference for "more of a conversation than a one-way means of communication".

Mr Rumsfeld, who might best be described as charismatically antagonistic, revelled in answering not the question posed to him but the question he wanted to be asked.

Travelling to Europe last week, Mr Gates seemed almost shy in comparison. But when interrogated in Seville about the evident contrast with Mr Rumsfeld, he warmed up, saying he found the questioning "amusing". "As an old Kremlinologist, it shouldn't surprise me," he said.

Then he closed by saying that people could judge for themselves after his speech to a security conference in Munich whether he would take "a different path than secretary Rumsfeld".

He did. Mr Rumsfeld ruffled many feathers by splitting US allies into "old Europe" and "new Europe".

Remarking in Munich that European countries had often been pigeonholed into categories - the "free world" versus the "Iron Curtain" - Mr Gates drew guffaws when he said: "Some have even spoken in terms of 'old' Europe versus 'new'."

But in his less abrasive manner, he also delivered a Rumsfeld-like message in reminding the mostly European audience Nato was a "military alliance" and not a "social club".

Back in the Pentagon press room on Thursday, Mr Gates maintained his non-combative style. Asked about recent comments by a US general that the trail for Osama bin Laden had "gone cold", Mr Gates would reply only that the al-Qaeda leader should "keep looking over [his] shoulder".

Responding to a similar question in 2001, Mr Rumsfeld gave the New York Times a dose of the typically entertaining, yet infuriatingly evasive, answers that ultimately reduced the news value of his press conferences. "If you're chasing the chicken around the chicken yard and you don't have him yet and the question is, 'how close are you?' the answer is, 'it's tough to characterise because there's lots of zigs and zags'."

In a sign Mr Gates may be seeing his honeymoon draw to a close, he came under pressure over recent contradictory statements by members of the military and Bush administration officials about the extent to which top Iranian officials had approved attacks on US solders in Iraq.

Ultimately, said Larry Di Rita, the former Pentagon spokesman, Mr Gates would probably have to deal with the "inescapably confrontational" nature of Washington press conferences. "[But] if secretary Gates wants to find ways even on the margins to take some of that edge out, more power to him," he said.

Some In Surge To Deploy Earlier (WT/AP)

The Pentagon said yesterday it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq.

The 3rd Infantry Division headquarters staff will deploy from Fort Stewart, Ga., next month -- about three months earlier than planned, according to an Army statement. It said family members have been notified of the change.

It is the 3rd Infantry's third deployment to Iraq. The first was during the initial invasion in 2003.

The decision to send them early is related to Bush's decision to deploy an extra five Army brigades -- about 17,500 soldiers -- to Baghdad as part of the president's new approach to stabilizing the country amid rising sectarian violence.

There currently is just one Army division headquarters staff in Baghdad -- the 1st Cavalry Division. That unit's commander, Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, Jr., told Pentagon reporters by video teleconference from Baghdad that he saw no need for another division headquarters staff, but he said the matter was being studied.

"I've told my bosses that it's just fine, that we do not have a command-and-control issue right now," he said.

Gen. Fil also said he has requested an unspecified number of extra attack helicopters and combat engineers, and that U.S. and U.S.-trained Iraqi army troops face a determined and ruthless foe in the capital region.

"They have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before," Gen. Fil said.

A division headquarters normally would command no more than about five brigades. Gen. Fil's division currently has eight ground combat brigades operating with it, including a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, which was the first of the five extra brigades under Mr. Bush's plan to arrive in Baghdad. It got there in January.

The next to arrive, the 4th Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, from Fort Riley, Kan., is now in Kuwait conducting its final training before heading to Baghdad later this month. The three other brigades -- including two from the 3rd Infantry Division -- are scheduled to go between March and May.

Since Mr. Bush's announcement of the troop buildup on Jan. 10, when he said 17,500 more soldiers would go to Baghdad and about 4,000 more Marines would go to western Anbar province, there has been controversy over the actual size of the buildup.

The Congressional Budget Office, a nonpartisan arm of Congress, said recently that the Pentagon might need to send 15,000 to 28,000 combat support and combat service support troops to Iraq, in addition to the 21,500 combat troops. But Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates has said that estimate grossly exaggerates the need for support forces.

Al Qaeda's Outrages Swing Sunnis To U.S. (WT)

By Pamela Hess, United Press International

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

RAMADI, Iraq -- Sunni tribes in troubled Anbar province have begun working closely with U.S. and government forces, contributing nearly 2,400 men to the police department and 1,600 to a newly organized tribal security force, authorities say.

U.S. troops are training and equipping the new tribal forces, which are called Emergency Response Units (ERUs), and are charged with defending the areas where they live, according to the local U.S. commander.

By a U.S. count, 12 of the Ramadi area's 21 tribes are cooperating in the security effort, six are considered neutral, and three are actively hostile. That is almost the reverse of the tribal posture last June, when three were cooperative and 12 were hostile.

For nearly four years, the tribes around Ramadi survived by playing both sides, working with U.S. forces when it suited them, while at the same time helping or tolerating Sunni insurgent groups and al Qaeda in Iraq -- the terrorist organization once led by Jordanian Abu Musab Zarqawi.

That changed in August, according to U.S. Army Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade Combat Team, 1st Armored Division, which has been responsible for security operations in Ramadi since June.

Al Qaeda in Iraq -- which has also turned its intimidation tactics on the tribal leaders -- kidnapped and killed Sheik Khalid of the Albu Ali Jassim tribe and left his body where it could not be found, preventing the family from burying him within 24 hours as prescribed by Muslim tradition.

"Al Qaeda overplayed its hand," Col. MacFarland said at his headquarters, a dusty base on the west side of Ramadi.

At a meeting that month, several sheiks drew up an 11-point declaration vowing to fight al Qaeda, within the rule of law, and declaring solidarity with coalition and government security forces. It is a movement referred to by the tribes as "the Awakening."

Al Qaeda "assassinated a lot of the sheiks," said Sheik Ahmed Abureeshah, 41, whose brother, Sheik Sitar, is the driving force behind the initiative. "They killed my father. They killed three of my brothers. They killed 14 other sheiks from different tribes. ...

"Then we met the sheiks of the tribe one after one, and we decided that we must put our hands together and fight to defeat these criminals."

The tribes sent hundreds of young men to join the police -- more than 1,000 in December and more than that last month, a record recruiting effort for the province.

The men were assigned to police stations in their own tribes' neighborhoods, giving the tribes a vested interest in their success and contributing to unusually high rates of policemen turning up for work. Others were organized into the ERUs, which operate in the countryside while the police remain in the cities.

Improved security, in turn, made it possible for the brigade to pour in reconstruction money, enabling some $3 million in projects to be undertaken.

As the benefits of cooperation became evident, "the tribes began flipping, like a domino effect," Col. MacFarland said. "Almost every week, we get another sheik knocking on our door."

Ramadi remains dangerous for Americans -- Col. MacFarland's brigade has lost 85 troops in the area -- but the improvement in security is measurable.

From July 2006 to January 2007, the daily average number of attacks fell by 38 percent and roadside bomb attacks dropped by 57 percent to an 18-month low.

The roadside bombs also are getting smaller and less complex, enabling the brigade and the Iraqi police to find more than 80 percent of improvised explosive devices before they detonate.

It is "a very significant indicator that this potent weapon system has become less effective in Ramadi," Col. MacFarland said.

More important to the colonel, attacks are occurring farther from the town center and from the main road -- suggesting that residents are not tolerating insurgents the way they once did, and are tipping off police to suspicious activities.

Jury Remains Out On Baghdad Crackdown (AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 17, 2007

As a military offensive seeks to bring Baghdad from the brink of anarchy, a top Iraqi security officer tried Friday to measure its early stages using the grim logic of a place with daily bloodshed: by counting the bodies arriving at the morgue. A total of 10 corpses were collected off the streets — apparently all victims of the city's lawless jumble of gang justice and sectarian payback. The daily body tally recently has often been 40 or more, excluding major bombings, said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi.

This was the basis for an upbeat message by Moussawi, a spokesman for the joint U.S.-Iraqi security sweep that began this week and has so far faced limited resistance. But his American counterparts remain much more guarded.

"I would say that it is way too early to establish any trends," said Lt. Col. Chris Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We've just started to focus our operations. We have months to go to see if we are going to succeed or not."

Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, attributed the reduction in violence not only to the increased security presence but also to an apparent decision by the militias and insurgents to lay low for a while.

"But make no mistake, we do not believe ... that's going to continue, and we do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil said. "And this enemy knows how — they understand lethality and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

The contrasting outlooks cut across the entire mission, dubbed Operation Law and Order, which seeks to reclaim the streets. Powerful militias and freelance vigilantes have carved Baghdad into fiefdoms and made even daily errands a gamble that could end with a car bombing or gunfire.

The Iraqis are eager to show clear progress to boost the leadership of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. U.S. commanders, however, are approaching the neighbor-by-neighbor sweep as a methodical campaign without quick victories — learning from past mistakes of pouring through an area, only to find that militiamen simply went underground and returned after American forces left.

"We are just at the beginning stages," reminded Garver.

But evidence of the offensive against militants appeared around the country.

Borders to Iran and Syria have been temporarily sealed in attempts to foil suspected supply routes. In Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, U.S. forces are under sharply escalating attacks from Sunni Muslim insurgents — suggesting that some groups have shifted from Baghdad to other areas to sidestep the crackdown in the capital.

U.S. military officials said demolition experts destroyed a bomb-making factory they linked to the al-Qaida in Iraq faction in Salman Pak, just southwest of Baghdad. The statement said the workshop contained about 1,000 pounds of explosives.

But doubt was cast on another reported blow to al-Qaida in Iraq.

The Interior Ministry said that leader Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was wounded and an aide killed Thursday in a clash with Iraqi forces near Balad, north of Baghdad.

Garver, the U.S. military spokesman, later said the Pentagon had no information that al-Masri was hit. The al-Masri deputy reported killed, identified as Abu Abdullah al-Majemaai, was detained last week and remains in jail, said an Iraqi army officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose the information.

In a statement posted on an Islamic militant Web site on Friday, the al-Qaida-affilated Islamic State of Iraq purportedly denied that al-Masri was wounded. It said the Iraqi government was "making up such news that has been denied even by their masters, the Americans."

Iraqi security officials also said 34 armed men belonging to a messianic Shiite cult were detained near Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad.

The Soldiers of Heaven, or Jund al-Samaa, cult was involved in a fierce gunbattle last month with Iraqi forces who accused it of planning to kill Shiite clerics and others in a bid to force the return of the "Hidden Imam" — a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad who disappeared as a child in the 9th century. Shiites believe he will return one day to bring justice.

In mosques Friday, some Muslim clerics supported the general goals of the military push to calm Baghdad. But others used the weekly prayers to denounce the American troop buildup in Baghdad.

Political leaders, too, quarreled over the widening security sweeps — reflecting starkly opposing perspectives among Iraq's two Muslim groups.

The majority Shiites have generally favored the campaign as a way to neutralize Sunni militant groups, blamed for waves of recent car bombings. Sunnis — who enjoyed a privileged position under Saddam Hussein — believe Shiite factions will use the military push to try to cement controls of key areas in Baghdad.

Sunni lawmaker Dhafir Al-Ani said on Al-Arabiya television that the Baghdad security plan had lost the "element of surprise" because it was announced long in advance, giving Shiite militiamen time to flee to Iran. He also claimed Shiite militias had provided security forces with some of the names on their wanted list.

But a Shiite lawmaker, Hadi Al-Amiri, backed the U.S.-Iraqi crackdown as a way to "target all those who cause the Iraqi bloodshed."

In Geneva, the International Organization for Migration offered a bleak picture of Iraqis trying to escape the violence and insecurity. Nearly 18,000 people have left their homes in the past three weeks in central and southern Iraq — some fleeing for the borders and others taking shelter in makeshift housing.

As many as 1 million Iraqis could flee their homes this year unless the unrest is brought under control, said a report by the 120-nation agency. An estimated 1.4 million Iraqis have already left their homes.

"The numbers of people that are being displaced are increasing every day," said Jemini Pandya, a spokeswoman for the group. "The security situation is not improving. It's not changing."

In other developments:

· The Pentagon said it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq.

· Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, told the Arabic language daily Al-Hayat that Sunni insurgents who are "honorable and genuine" must be given the chance to join the political process now that the United States is eager to pull its troops from Iraq. He said U.S. and Iraqi representatives must negotiate "with the participation of the resistance" after "America has failed to run the country."

Iranian Force, Focus Of U.S., Still A Mystery (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — Like so much else about the Iranian state, the Quds Force, which conducts overseas operations for Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, remains remarkably mysterious even to those who closely study the country.

The Quds Force is under intense scrutiny by American intelligence agencies because it is suspected of supplying sophisticated explosives to Iraqi militants. Among those detained in recent American raids on Iranian offices in Iraq were several Iranians identified by the United States military as Quds operatives, including a diplomat said to be the No. 2 official in the Quds Force.

Questions about what exactly Quds Force officers have done and whether they acted at the direction of the Iranian leadership have taken on particular urgency as the Bush administration sends more troops to damp the violence in Baghdad. But the competing power centers inside the Iranian government, and the intense secrecy that obscures decision making, make answers elusive.

"We know that the Quds Force is involved," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told reporters on Thursday. "We know the Quds Force is a paramilitary arm of the I.R.G.C.," he added, using the abbreviation for the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps.

"So we assume that the leadership of the I.R.G.C. knows about this," Mr. Gates said. "Whether or not more senior political leaders in Iran know about it, we don't know."

Most independent experts say it is only logical to assume that Iran deployed large numbers of operatives in Iraq as soon as Saddam Hussein was ousted in 2003. Many of Iraq's Shiite clerics, politicians and militia leaders have close ties to Iran, where some spent years in exile while Mr. Hussein and the Sunnis of his Baath Party ruled Iraq.

And the past role of the Quds Force as the long arm of the Islamic revolution abroad, performing a mix of military, intelligence and training operations, has been widely reported in past conflicts like those in Lebanon and Bosnia. Its name, the Arabic word for Jerusalem, symbolizes the Iranian government's commitment to driving Israelis out of the occupied Palestinian territories.

The Quds Force "is the handpicked elite of an already elite ideological army," said Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford University.

As part of the Revolutionary Guard, the force officially answers to the supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and not the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, though Mr. Ahmadinejad is believed to have personal ties to many senior guard officials.

But the Quds Force is cloaked in secrecy inside Iran and is the subject of considerable guesswork from scholars in the United States, who in interviews this week offered estimates of its size ranging from 3,000 to 50,000 men. The true number, along with details of the strength and budget of the entire Revolutionary Guard, is hidden even from the Iranian Parliament, said Mr. Milani, according to legislators he has spoken with.

Some specialists even question whether the Quds Force exists as a formal unit clearly delineated from the rest of the Revolutionary Guard.

"It could be that anyone with an intelligence role in the Revolutionary Guard is just called Quds," said Vali R. Nasr, who studies Iran and political Islam at the Naval Postgraduate School.

Whether properly identified as part of the Quds Force or not, members of the Revolutionary Guard mobilized intelligence and paramilitary agents in Lebanon in the 1980s, where they trained the Shiite militia Hezbollah; in Afghanistan, during the anti-Soviet jihad in the 1980s and episodically since then; in the former Yugoslavia, supporting the Bosnian Muslims against Serbian forces; and in other trouble spots.

The guard has also been accused of supporting terrorist attacks outside Iran, notably the 1996 truck bomb attack on the Khobar Towers complex in Saudi Arabia that killed 19 American service members. In December, a federal judge ruled that the government of Iran bore responsibility for the Khobar Towers attack and ordered Tehran to pay survivors of those killed more than $253 million.

The Revolutionary Guard was created after the Islamic revolution that overthrew the shah in 1979. The government of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini did not trust the existing Iranian military, where support for the monarchy remained strong. The new rulers established the guard as a parallel military force, recruited from among the revolution's most devout religious supporters.

In the past 25 years, the Revolutionary Guard, whose strength is estimated by Western specialists at 125,000 to 300,000, has gradually evolved into more of a conventional military and has become deeply involved in lucrative business enterprises inside and outside Iran. But all along, it has conducted overseas operations, both covert and overt, often under the Quds Force name.

The actions of the Quds Force are not necessarily ordered by Ayatollah Khamenei, and the supreme leader may not even get reports of all its actions, said Hooshang Amirahmadi, director of the Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Rutgers University. "The Iranian government is a very loose grouping of power centers," blurring lines of control and authority, he said.

There have been past instances of actions by rogue intelligence officers that the Iranian government has disavowed. In 1999, for example, Iran's Intelligence Ministry blamed rogue officers for the killings of five prominent critics of the government's conservative wing.

But Mr. Amirahmadi said he did not think the Iranian leadership should be allowed to sidestep responsibility for actions by its operatives in Iraq. "The Bush administration can't say, 'We have a C.I.A., but we don't control it,' " he said, adding that the same rules should apply to Tehran.

Though the American allegations about the Quds Force have received attention from administration officials and the media only in recent weeks, they are not new. On several occasions over the last year, senior Pentagon officials have spoken publicly about the Iranian role in Iraq.

More recently, Bush administration officials have engaged in a balancing act, engaging in harsher rhetoric about Iranian actions and offering more evidence on sophisticated improvised explosive devices, which they say are traceable to Iran, but vehemently denying they have any plans to go to war against the country.

But by all accounts, the imperfect nature of American intelligence agencies' reporting on Iran makes certain conclusions difficult to reach. "I just don't think we have a very acute understanding of the internal workings of the regime in Iran," said Patrick Clawson, an Iran expert at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Businessman Sentenced In Iraq Scheme (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

An American businessman whose companies made more than $8 million in Iraq reconstruction money through a gifts-for-contracts scheme was sentenced to 46 months in prison. The businessman, Philip H. Bloom, who has lived in Romania for many years, pleaded guilty last year to bribery and conspiracy to commit money laundering. Mr. Bloom admitted bribing military personnel with jewelry, computers, cigars and sexual favors. Three Army Reserve officers were indicted last week as part of the case; the officers, Col. Curtis G. Whiteford of Utah, Lt. Col. Debra M. Harrison of New Jersey and Lt. Col. Michael B. Wheeler of Wisconsin, were accused of steering contracts to Mr. Bloom from 2003 to 2005.

Missing In Baghdad: My Father (WSJ)

By Sarmad Ali

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

About 5 o'clock on a mid-December morning, I was awakened by a call from my brother in Iraq. "Dad is missing," he said. He was upset and some of his anger spilled out at me: "You should be here," he shouted. "You don't seem to care."

My father had left home in Baghdad that morning to go to the auto-repair shop across town where he works. Fifteen minutes after he left, car bombs exploded on his route to work and he hasn't been seen since.

His disappearance set off a desperate search by my family through the netherworld of war-torn Baghdad. It also put me in the agonizing position of trying to help my family with the violent dislocations of civil war -- over the phone, from thousands of miles away. I'm the oldest son and have been studying and working in New York for more than two years. Since my father vanished, my three grown siblings and my mother have looked to me as the head of the family.

Every time I hear about a bomb going off, I brace myself for the worst possible news. Last February, my entire family went missing for two weeks, without a word. When my cellphone rings and an Iraqi number shows up on the display, I say a silent prayer before answering.

My life has always been marked by Saddam Hussein's wars. Born to Sunni parents -- my mother a homemaker, my father a mechanic -- I grew up in a brick house in a poor Baghdad neighborhood where Sunnis and Shias lived together. War with neighboring Iran dominated my early childhood. Many nights, Iranian jet fighters roared overhead. Most afternoons, we would watch "Sowar min Al-Marakah" ("Pictures from the Battle"), a propaganda show featuring battlefield footage and the mangled corpses of Iranian soldiers. My parents once gave me medication to fight a recurring nightmare of being squashed under an Iranian tank.

I was in primary school in 1991 when Operation Desert Storm kicked off after Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait. Once, a U.S. missile hit a spice factory near our home. We smelled the spices, thought it was a chemical attack and covered our mouths with wet towels. During most of my teens, we lived under U.N. sanctions on government-issued rations of staple foods.

There were happy times, too. Some of my fondest childhood memories are of the celebrations surrounding the Muslim religious holiday of Eid. During the festival, my father used to take me, my sisters and my brother to the park for amusement rides, to eat kebab and to walk at night by the Tigris River.

I always wanted to be a journalist. But under Saddam, studying journalism was pointless, since all newspapers were run and rigorously monitored by the government. In middle school, I started teaching myself English, practicing with translation texts and old American newsmagazines left in our basement by a relative. I used to spend hours memorizing vocabulary lists and looking up new words in an outdated dictionary. I dreamed of going to school in a Western country, of traveling the world and writing about it.

A radio that Mr. Ali brought to New York from Baghdad. He inherited it from his late grandfather and used it in Iraq to listen to the BBC in Arabic and English during and after the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

By 2003, at the time of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, we were already used to war. My family evacuated to the countryside, with the exception of my father, who said that if he had to die, he would rather die at home.

We returned several weeks later, after Saddam was toppled. My father welcomed us back, but he appeared broken. A secular Sunni and fervent patriot, he had been against the American invasion and never thought it would happen. Now, he had become pessimistic about the future of his country: The looting in the aftermath of the invasion disgusted him. "They stole everything from the government buildings around us," he said, as we walked in the door. "TVs, computers, and even water pipes."

But life continued. My father went back to work; my younger sister and brother went to high school, and my older sister, who had graduated with a degree in English, helped my mother around the house. I found a job as a journalist for a new local English-language paper. I reported stories on bombings, reconstruction projects and other news from all over Iraq.

The violence increased. I had been on the job less than one year when the editor, an Iraqi-American, left the country, afraid that his life was in danger. Along with three other journalists, I kept the publication alive on the Web, posting news items from an Internet cafe in downtown Baghdad.

Before he left, the editor got me in touch with Columbia University in the U.S., which shortly afterward offered me a scholarship to study journalism. My parents said I should accept. I did, and four months later I took off. The morning I left, my brother insisted on carrying my big suitcase to the cab. My mother splashed a pitcher of water behind me, an Iraqi tradition wishing a traveler a safe return home.

With $300 in my pocket, I took a 15-hour cab ride to Jordan, and a plane to New York from there.

By August 2004, I settled in New York, enjoying the life of a newcomer in his 20s. I started to take classes and learned new things, from buckling my seat belt in a plane to working out in a gym; from using a washing machine to eating sushi and tandoori dishes. Later, I landed an internship, and then a reporting job with this newspaper.

During one conversation with his mother, Mr Ali asked her for some of his favorite Iraqi recipes: lentil soup, tomato sauce with beans and Iraqi-style biryani. He scribbled them down on envelopes and keeps them next to his bed.

But as I was getting used to my comfortable new life, I was also regularly pulled back into Iraq, where things were getting worse. A few months after my arrival in New York, I was chatting with a friend in Baghdad on my cellphone when he told me that an acquaintance had died in a roadside bomb attack. I became afraid of getting calls from Iraq, sometimes not answering them. I considered changing my phone number so no one could call me with bad news -- but I could still call people back home when I felt like it. Other times, I became obsessed with fear and would call to check on my family and friends, burning through a 400-minute calling card in a weekend.

When Al-Askari's famous gold-domed Shiite mosque was bombed last February, violence erupted throughout Iraq. Suddenly I couldn't get in touch with anyone back home. I didn't know whether my family members were dead or alive, whether they were taken by gunmen for ethnic reasons or if it was just that their phone line was down. I stopped eating, stopped going to work. I tried calling at three different times every day, to no avail. They surfaced two weeks later, safe and sound, after having fled to the countryside to stay with distant relatives, in an effort to escape violence or retaliation against Sunnis.

During an instant-message conversation with a friend in Iraq, the war dealt me its first massive blow: Haider Al-Maliki, a friend from university in Baghdad who had come to visit me in New York the year before, was found dead, his body riddled with 13 bullets. He was stopped by unknown gunmen while in a cab in the southern city of Amarah and shot on the spot. Other friends began going to their jobs at the government and in the Green Zone in disguise, trying to avoid Haider's fate. One friend poses as a student, while another takes a roundabout route to work for fear of being followed.

Meanwhile, my sister, seeing that ethnic violence was increasing near our neighborhood, asked me if the family should buy a gun. "Ask the neighbors what they are doing," I told her, not knowing what to do. When we talked a week later, my family had opted against it.

My father kept going to work every day, despite the rising violence. It was one way of staying sane. Then, in December, he went missing, and I got my brother's frantic call.

I told my brother to calm down and said that I was here to help -- that I left the country to help the family. "You are there, with air conditioning, entertaining yourself, while we are here in hell," he retorted.

I tried to ignore the comments -- I had heard them from him before -- and told him to focus on the matter at hand. He did. After dad left, he said, there was a huge bombing near the central station where he was supposed to transfer to another bus. Dad never showed up at work and never came back home.

I told him to go to the area of the bombing -- a busy marketplace in central Baghdad -- to see where the wounded were taken. I also called three of my old friends in Baghdad to ask them to accompany him. My brother had already asked some of our cousins to visit police stations to see if my father had been taken into custody.

A few hours later, we talked again. By that time, my brother had visited a local hospital, where most victims were taken. He said that my father wasn't on the hospital's official list of the dead, so he walked around to see if he could recognize him among the wounded. He described a scene of chaos and carnage: Blood was everywhere, people were weeping in the halls, hospital staff were running back and forth -- but my father was nowhere to be found.

An Iraqi-flag key chain bought by Mr. Ali the first time he visited the United Nations. It hangs on the wall of his apartment.

Two days after the bombing, I called my friend Ala and asked him to go to the hospital morgue to see if my father might be among the unidentified dead, victims who weren't carrying IDs or were burned beyond recognition. Ala went and checked three charred bodies, but concluded they were not my father. One was too fat, he said. Another had hair, while my father is bald. And the last one was too young and short to be my father.

My cousin went to a nearby police station, a mini-fortress surrounded by barbed wire and sandbags, to see if my father was mistakenly being held. He told the lieutenant that he was looking for his uncle and gave him the name. He wasn't there.

A week passed and my father still hadn't been found. On the phone, my mother sounded faint and sick but kept saying she was all right. She told me to take care of myself and that my father would come back. She insisted that my father was fine. Her proof: He was not at the morgue.

My older sister couldn't keep up appearances. She stopped eating, stopped taking showers and descended into a depression, my younger sister said. She hadn't been well for more than a year, ever since several cars exploded near her on a market square. Back then, the sight of a child's charred body had sent her into shock. For days, all she could do was hug her knees and murmur over and over: "Poor girl, they killed her, animals." She recalled running through streets awash with blood and sewage, packed with civilians pushing flat wooden carts on which they piled the wounded and the dead. Her condition improved only after she got antidepressants. But after my father went missing, she spiraled back into a severe depression. Medical assistance proved elusive this time, with violence deterring nurses from visiting.

On my way to the gym one recent day, I got a call from my brother with more bad news. A mortar shell hit near my house and damaged the already-fragile bedroom walls. "Do you know that your mother and sisters are sleeping in the hallway shivering in this cold winter?" my brother said. I told him I would send money. Exasperated, he said that even with money they wouldn't be able to fix the room and that they would sleep in my old bedroom from now on.

I feel responsible for my family, but at the same time helpless. I am not a U.S. citizen, or a permanent resident. My guest status here prevents me from being able to bring my family to join me. I ask them to stay strong and take care and stay indoors. I try to give them hope, although I know it could be a false hope. Sometimes I stop calling them for a few weeks to avoid listening to all this.

I've considered going back many times, mostly because I miss my family and I haven't seen them for more than two years. But that is risky -- both because of the growing violence and because it's not certain that I could leave the U.S. and return. My mother says I should stay here. "Don't even think of coming back," she told me on the phone a few weeks ago. "People are leaving, not coming."

These days, my mother and sisters don't go outside the house at all. None of them have traveled before. They don't have passports. And they don't have the money it takes to buy tickets, taxi rides, hotel rooms. They say there are no guarantees of finding a way to make a living in neighboring countries like Jordan.

I seek consolation in small things that remind me of home. I keep three envelopes with my mother's recipes scribbled on them -- lentil soup, tomato sauce with beans and Iraqi-style biryani -- next to my bed. When bad things happen back home, I cook them. My laptop is stocked with songs about Baghdad. I search the Internet for pictures of Iraq before the U.S. invasion. Pictures of the Tigris River. Of bustling Baghdad streets. Of the past that is no longer.

Occasionally, I talk to the few Iraqis I know in the U.S. -- a friend in Michigan, another in Massachusetts. A small Iraqi-flag key chain hangs on a nail sticking out of my wall.

Bombings in the news send me scurrying to my computer for information about the exact time and location of the explosions. I lay curled under my green comforter, going over in my mind where my family members and friends might have been at the time.

New friends keep me company. While civil war raged in Iraq, I attended parties celebrating Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's. At Christmas break, I went to the home of a friend's aunt in Connecticut; I shopped for gifts -- books, a T-shirt, a scarf, a tie -- and we ate a big dinner.

I don't tell my friends in America too much about what is happening with my family in Iraq. I try to avoid talking about the war because it's so far removed from the word of restaurants, coffee shops, and polite conversations. I worry people won't understand or don't want to be bothered. During a recent dinner in New York's Chinatown, a friend asked, "How's your family?" When I told her about my father, she was shocked. She offered condolences and said I shouldn't hesitate to ask her for help. I felt grateful, but a little awkward because I knew that neither she nor anyone else who means well can really change things for my family.

Sometimes, my family becomes hopeless and says my father must be dead -- otherwise he would have returned by now. Other days, they are more optimistic, saying that he may have been taken by kidnappers and he will be released.

The last time we talked, my younger sister pleaded with me to help her find a way out of Baghdad. She said she would cook and clean for me, if I could just figure out a way to get her out of there. It made my heart sink.

Trying to check on the fate of my father, I called my brother on his cellphone -- the only phone in my family's possession -- late last month. That day, bombs had gone off on a Shiite market where he likes to shop for DVDs and CDs. Press reports said there were more than 80 dead. He did not pick up his phone. Not the next day either. I recently reached a friend in Iraq, who said he had seen my brother. But I'm still waiting for him to call back.

For Baghdad's Uprooted Girls, School Offers A Hard Haven (WP)

Families Fled Sectarian Killing

BAGHDAD -- The textbooks at their new school might call their predicament "forced internal displacement," but the Iraqi girls living this phenomenon describe it in different terms.

Safwan Abbas worries about failing math. Fatima Hamza wanders the halls missing her friends. To finish the hours of nightly reading she needs to catch up to her classmates, Hadil Muhanned now must wear wire-rimmed glasses.

In Baghdad alone, 38,766 people have been driven from their homes by the daily sectarian killing, the United Nations reports, and the echoes of this mass migration resonate every day at Amil High School for Girls in Baghdad. Located in the relatively safe Shiite area of Kadhimiyah, along the western bank of the Tigris River, the whitewashed concrete schoolhouse has become a haven for Shiite Muslim students fleeing with their families from the religious segregation now pulling apart many of Baghdad's neighborhoods.

In the past three months, Amil High School has accepted 135 new students, pushing the school's population over 1,000, and more families show up each day. Iraq's Human Rights Ministry has sent employees to distribute skirts, backpacks and shoes to the new pupils.

Teachers who once taught in a room of 40 students now cram more than 70 girls into a class, sometimes three to a desk. Headmistress Suad Kokaz has instituted after-school tutoring sessions for the new students, many of whom attended classes only sporadically at their old schools because of the threat of violence. The school's guidance counselor, Shulair Abdullah, keeps a list, now 16 names long, of students who have lost family members to violence in recent months.

"I run around screaming every day, this is such a hard job," Kokaz said. "I have never witnessed such a challenge."

Like countless others in Baghdad, Safwan Abbas's life as a 14-year-old changed with a missive. Until October, she had lived with her parents and two brothers in the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya in western Baghdad. But the message on the leaflet that was dropped in their yard was blunt: "You are infidels and you have 72 hours to leave," she recalled.

"I was so scared, I thought they were going to kill us at any second," she said.

When they arrived in Kadhimiyah, Safwan, a round-faced girl with a soft voice and dark eyes, enrolled at Amil with great trepidation. She walked the speckled-tile hallways, ringing with the shouts of the elementary students who share the building, and stared at the bare white classroom walls, feeling disoriented.

"The first time I came here, I felt like a stranger. I had this feeling that I had to return to my neighborhood," she said. "It has been very difficult to adjust. It's not just a matter of finding friends. I feel desperate here, it's so frustrating. I can't adjust myself. I miss all my girlfriends and my house."

For three straight weeks, she said, she couldn't stop crying. She remembers her nightly gossipy phone calls, sometimes lasting more than three hours, with her best friend, Tahani Talib. She still has her cellphone, but her parents have decided they won't pay for the minutes now that they spend $385 a month for rent -- a hefty sum in Baghdad, and about double what an Iraqi family could expect to pay in that neighborhood before the war. Safwan often passes nights and the Friday holiday studying, but she has not been able to understand the math classes at Amil.

"This is the first year I have ever flunked in mathematics," she said. "It's very hard seeing my girlfriends pass the exams, and I'm not passing. I'm trying to do my best, but it's so hard."

After four hours of morning classes each day, Hadil Muhanned, 17, said she spends up to seven hours studying to meet the academic demands of Amil. It was enough reading -- geography, physics, English, history, chemistry, math -- that she needed to get glasses. But each day feels more like a relief than a struggle, she said.

Before her family moved from the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Adel, Hadil was one of the few Shiite students who attended al-Khuroud High School. She rarely went more than twice a week because of fighting in the neighborhood. One student and her father were kidnapped, she said. Gunmen assassinated a school security guard. The girls read the graffiti scrawled on the neighborhood's concrete walls: "There is no existence for Shia."

On Jan. 28, after Hadil had left, a mortar shell crashed down on al-Khuroud, killing at least five girls and wounding more than 20 others, leaving windows shattered and blood spattered on the school's stone steps.

"We were living in constant anxiety," she said. "Here we at least feel comfortable. We are living as one."

In the past year, threats of violence have driven more than 470,000 people from their homes in Iraq, the United Nations says. They often flee religiously mixed neighborhoods to live among the relative protection of their own sect.

Within Baghdad, militias and insurgents have systematically tried to homogenize mixed neighborhoods. Many neighborhoods on the western side of the capital have become more predominantly Sunni, while Shiites have tended to congregate east of the Tigris. Near Amil High, internal refugees have begun living in abandoned school buildings, one sliver of a humanitarian crisis that has overwhelmed the government's resources, according to Abdul-Samad Sultan, the minister of displacement and migration.

"Really, we need international help, because you could use the whole budget of the country and it will not be enough. Because these people have lost everything, they need fuel, they need electricity, there's a lack of sanitation, education, jobs," he said. "Many of these families are, of course, far, far below the poverty line."

Since November, freshman Fatima Hamza, 15, her parents, four brothers and two sisters have shared a one-bedroom apartment in Kadhimiyah after also fleeing the Adel neighborhood. Sitting in the office of Kokaz, the headmistress, a black head scarf embroidered with flowers covering her dark hair, Fatima bit her finger and quietly explained her new discomfort.

"Before that, in our schools there, we had our friends and our house and our home, but here it is different," she said. "It is hard psychologically, leaving that all behind."

"I'm getting along all right with the classes, but I'm having trouble relating to people," she added, then lowered her voice to a whisper, out of earshot of the headmistress: "Not everyone feels happy about us being here."

DOJ_NMG_0134226

The influx of new students from Sunni neighborhoods has also placed a strain on the teachers and administrators. Kokaz, who said many new students are months behind her school in the state curriculum, has asked her teachers to allow students to postpone exams if they are not ready.

"They are treating the school like savages," said Majda Chechan, head of the elementary school that shares the building with Amil. "They broke the stairs."

The guidance counselor, Abdullah, holds therapy sessions with some of the new students to discuss their emotional problems and their difficulty accepting their new surroundings. Several of the students refused to believe their new circumstances were permanent.

"Maybe the situation will change?" Fatima said in the headmistress's office. "Most of my friends are also displaced. We hope this cannot last forever."

Al-Qaida Releases Video Of Afghan Attack (HC/AP)

By Jasper Mortimer,

Houston Chronicle/AP, February 17, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt — Al-Qaida posted today a video showing what it claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of U.S. and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan.

The video appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage U.S. claims to be winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan. It argues that the people of Afghanistan support the insurgents and provide physical assistance to their attacks on U.S.-Afghan forces.

The tape begins with the deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, ridiculing President Bush's claim to have deprived al-Qaida of a safe haven in Afghanistan, calling it a "barefaced lie."

Al-Zawahri, who speaks in Arabic with an English translation in subtitles, seems to be referring to a Bush speech on Jan. 10 when the president said that U.S. forces "took away al-Qaida's safe haven in Afghanistan — and we will not allow them to re-establish it in Iraq."

With a narrator speaking in American-accented English, the tape then shows video film of what it claims is an attack on a military position in Arghandab, a district in Zabul province, 100 miles northeast of the southern city of Kandahar.

The narrator, who sounds like the American al-Qaida member Adam Gadahn, claims that the position is "liberated" by the insurgents. However, the film does not show the insurgents capturing the target — a compound of mud-plastered buildings in a valley — during the night-time battle. It only shows the insurgents walking through the compound in daylight.

When asked about the video, the district chief of Arghandab, Fazel Bari, told The Associated Press that the only recent clash in that area was last month when NATO-led troops and Afghan forces were ambushed by suspected Taliban militants on the road between Arghandab and Qalat, the provincial capital.

Bari said the NATO and Afghan troops suffered no casualties, but they detained one man after the battle, which ended with the Taliban retreating.

The authenticity of the scenes shown could not be verified. The video carried the logo of the al-Qaida media production company, as-Sahab, and it was posted on an Islamic Web site known for hosting extremist material.

Al-Qaida appeared to have issued the tape on Thursday with the title "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate: Capture of an American post, Arghandab." The name Khorasan refers to Afghanistan.

The video shows the insurgents firing at the alleged post but their weapons cannot be discerned because it is night. Tracer bullets cross the sky, fire is returned and one sees explosions of what are said to be rocket-propelled grenades.

"After a fierce battle, the mujahideen (holy warriors) begin their retreat from the zone of operations," the narrator says in English. The tape quotes a fighter as saying: "We retreated after about 45 minutes of fighting."

In the day time footage, the video shows a dusty compound of single-story buildings which were once occupied by Americans soldiers. Scrawled on the walls are words such as: "Scalp Hunters," "CPT ASHWOKTH UTAH. N6 '06 ETT," and "Spc Smith Commo US Army 2006."

ETT stands for Embedded Training Teams — the U.S. and other Western soldiers who serve as mentors to the Afghan security forces.

The English-speaking narrator says the camera is going around "the liberated area to bring us pictures from inside the cleansed military bases."

An empty packet of Lay's potato chips is found and the camera focuses on the name of the Saudi manufacturer, Saudi Snack Food Co. Ltd, as the narrator says: "As is always the case in our tours of liberated bases, we find evidence that the primary financiers of this crusade are the puppet regimes of the Gulf."

The video shows a beige, battle-wrecked pickup truck that has the number RTS323 on its hood. A small crowd of men stone the vehicle, as the narrator says: "The mujahideen and local residents celebrate the victory in their own special way."

An Afghan with a white beard and black turban, purportedly a resident of the nearby village, tells the camera what the foreigners were like: "The people suffered a lot because of these devils. No one could leave his house, not even for absolutions and prayers. We couldn't even light a lamp at night. Thanks to Allah, the infidels have left.

"The people are very happy about the coming of the Taliban," he says.

Bills Would Let Military Death Benefit Go To Guardian (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Lawmakers introduced companion bills in the House and Senate yesterday that would allow grandparents and other relatives raising children of fallen troops to be designated as beneficiaries of a $100,000 "death gratuity."

The bills, by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Rep. Tom Latham (R-Iowa), followed a story yesterday in The Washington Post that profiled Susan Jaenke, an Iowa woman who is raising a 9-year-old granddaughter after Jaenke's 29-year-old daughter, Petty Officer 2nd Class Jaime S. Jaenke, was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq.

Susan Jaenke could not collect the $100,000 benefit her daughter thought she had assigned to her because of strict next-of-kin regulations. Of the proposed change in law, she said yesterday: "To us, this would have made all the difference in the world."

The House bill leaves an opening for courts to resolve retroactive cases such as the Jaenkes', in which the fallen service member "left a clear expression of intent."

A Giant Doom Magnet (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

So I was sitting around watching “Oprah” yesterday afternoon when I realized how I could stop W. and Crazy Dick from blowing up any more stuff.

All I needed to do was Unleash my Unfathomable Magnetic Power into the Universe!

Energy flows where intention goes. Or maybe it’s the other way around.

Anyhow, Oprah taught me how to stop abusing myself and learn The Secret. I finally get it: because the Law of Attraction dictates that like attracts like, my negativity toward the president and vice president is attracting their negativity and multiplying the negative vibrations in the cosmos, creating some sort of giant doom magnet.

I need to examine my unforgiving stance toward them and use my power of visualization to let them know that in my consciousness and awareness, they cannot determine my destiny. I am severing those emotional and vibratory tonalities that keep me tied to their toxic energy, causing me to repeat the same old pattern of bemoaning in the newspaper their same old pattern of blundering in the Middle East.

Oprah did her second show in eight days on “The Secret,” the self-help book (and DVD) by Rhonda Byrne, an Australian reality-TV producer. The book hit No. 1 on the USA Today best-seller list this week.

At first glance, “The Secret” might seem like inane piffle, a psychobabble cross between Dr. Phil and “The Da Vinci Code,” a new-age spin on Norman Vincent Peale’s 1952 classic, “The Power of Positive Thinking” and the Beach Boys’ “Good Vibrations.” But that’s a negative way of thinking.

James Arthur Ray, a teacher of The Secret method, who talked to Oprah, says it’s “very, very scientific.”

“If you think you’re this meat suit running around, you know, you have to think again,” he said. “You’re a field of energy in a larger field of energy.”

Oprah enthused that The Secret “really is touching a nerve around the world” because “so many people are hungry for guidance and meaning.” Ms. Byrne claims it improved her eyesight; others say it works on everything from weight loss to panic attacks to getting rich to snagging the mate of your dreams or a good parking space.

“We create our own circumstances by the choices that we make, and the choices that we make are fueled by our thoughts,” Oprah explained in her first show. “So our thoughts are the most powerful thing that we have here on earth. And based upon what we think — and [what] we think determines who we are — we attract who we are into our lives.”

Or as the book so eloquently puts it, “You must feel good about You.”

If it works on eyesight, can't it work on foresight? Can't we use The Secret on the secretive Bush White House to prevent a calamity in Iran?

According to the Sacred Principles set out by the Law of Attraction Specialists, the universe responds to your thoughts. So if I want certified chuckleheads to stop mucking up American foreign policy, all I have to do is let the universe know. I forgive the president for being a goose and the vice president for being a snake, and I start thinking about the sort of amazing, or even mildly competent, leaders I deserve to have in my life.

Maybe W. should read the book. He likes things biblical, and "The Secret" says it takes its Creative Process from the New Testament.

He would learn, as Mr. Ray said, that "trying is failing with honor," adding: "Take the word 'try' out of your vocabulary. You either do it or you don't."

W. could have applied that to Iraq, where he has always done only enough to fail, including with the Surge.

A main tenet of The Secret is learning to avoid the chain reaction of churlishness, which begins with a single thought: "The one bad thought attracted more bad thoughts, the frequency locked in, and eventually something went wrong. Then as you reacted to that one thing going wrong, you attracted more things going wrong."

It's an apt description of Iraq policy. A bad thought that led to more bad thoughts, and the negative frequency is now locked in on Iran, which is responding with its own negative frequency.

With The Secret, W. will realize that all he needs to do to change his current reality is admit that it's fake. (Similar to the wisdom of Dorothy clicking her shoes three times.)

Once he stops his chain reaction of negative thought, I can stop my chain reaction of negative thought. And then there will be peace on earth and parking spaces for everyone.

Interim Ark. U.S. Attorney Won't Seek Job (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Former Rove Aide Says Senate Democrats Would Block Permanent Nomination

Tim Griffin, the former White House aide who has been at the center of a political storm over U.S. attorneys' firings, said yesterday that he will not seek the nomination to be chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock.

Griffin, 38, a military lawyer who previously worked for presidential adviser Karl Rove and for the Republican National Committee, was appointed interim U.S. attorney in Little Rock in December on the White House's recommendation. The Justice Department said it intended to nominate Griffin for the job permanently.

But Griffin said yesterday that he would be unlikely to be confirmed for the job because of opposition from key Democratic senators, including Mark Pryor (Ark.) and Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.).

"I'm not going to get fair consideration from Senator Pryor, my home-state senator, or the Judiciary Committee, particularly under Leahy," Griffin said in an interview. "I decided that there was nothing to gain by submitting myself to that circus."

Griffin's decision, which was reported by the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, is the latest development in the controversy over the abrupt firings of seven U.S. attorneys. The dismissals angered lawmakers of both parties and have prompted a battle over the attorney general's power to name replacements.

Under a little-noticed provision of the USA Patriot Act reauthorization law approved last year, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales may appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely.

Senate Republicans on Thursday blocked a bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee to return to the previous system, which allows district courts to name an interim prosecutor if a permanent U.S. attorney is not chosen within 120 days of a vacancy.

Griffin said he will remain in the job for "as long as they need me."

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said in a statement that "the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation. We are pleased that he is willing to serve as interim United States Attorney until a candidate is nominated and confirmed."

The Little Rock job has been a focus of the debate over the fired prosecutors because Griffin's predecessor, Bud Cummins, was specifically asked to resign to make way for Griffin.

DOJ_NMG_0134229

Congressional aides who were briefed on the issue this week said that Griffin was recommended for the job by Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, who called a Gonzales aide to push for his appointment. Miers told Pryor in December that Griffin was "our person" for the Little Rock job, said Michael Teague, a Pryor spokesman.

Teague said Griffin's sharp comments about Pryor and other Democrats underscore the need for a confirmation process to ensure U.S. attorneys are not overly partisan.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a Judiciary Committee member, said in an interview that "Mr. Griffin is proving to be the partisan he always seemed to be."

Griffin said it is "ridiculous" for senators to complain about White House involvement in his hiring and that complaints about his experience are unfair, after 10 years in the U.S. Army Reserve Judge Advocate General Corps and a short stint at the Justice Department.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty and other Justice officials have sought to distance the Arkansas dismissal from the other prosecutors' firings, which they have said were prompted by "performance-related" problems. Those six were all asked to resign in telephone calls Dec. 7.

Gonzales told senators in January that he "would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons."

After Criticism Of Dismissal, Justice Dept. Shifts Course (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — The prosecutor whose appointment as an interim United States attorney in Arkansas has ignited a furor in Congress will not be nominated for the job permanently, the Justice Department said on Friday.

The appointment of the prosecutor, J. Timothy Griffin, as the temporary successor to H. E. Cummins III as United States attorney prompted Democrats to complain that Mr. Cummins and several other United States attorneys had been removed for political motives.

The withdrawal of Mr. Griffin as the probable candidate to succeed Mr. Cummins permanently was a setback for the Justice Department, which had sought to portray the dismissals as a routine personnel matter.

Mr. Griffin is a military and civilian prosecutor, but Democrats said he was better known for his political ties to the Bush administration. He had been a political director for the Republican National Committee and, more recently, a deputy to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser, working on personnel matters.

On Thursday evening, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called several Arkansas lawmakers to advise them that Mr. Griffin's name would be withdrawn, Congressional aides said. The calls came after several weeks of increasingly vocal criticism about the appointment from Democrats, including the two Democratic senators from Arkansas, Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln.

"Tim Griffin is a talented and experienced lawyer and prosecutor who has a deep commitment to public service," said Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

Ms. Talamona added: "Given Tim's strong qualifications, the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation. We are pleased that he is willing to serve as interim United States attorney until a candidate is nominated and confirmed."

Asked to comment on the withdrawal of Mr. Griffin's candidacy, aides to Mr. Pryor and Ms. Lincoln pointed on Friday to earlier statements each had made expressing concern about Mr. Cummins's departure and Mr. Griffin's selection.

In the end, Mr. Griffin withdrew his name from contention, but his chances seemed to decline last week when Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that Mr. Cummins's removal was not based on any flaw in his performance, but rather to make room for Mr. Griffin.

At that hearing, Mr. Pryor testified as a witness, saying he would not support Mr. Griffin if President Bush nominated him for the job permanently.

Mr. Cummins is among 7 to 10 United States attorneys who have recently been removed by the Justice Department. Officials there have said the dismissals were largely intended to replace poorly performing United States attorneys and were not an effort to interfere with any prosecutions.

But several ousted prosecutors have said that they had received highly positive evaluations when their performance was reviewed by the Justice Department, and Democrats have said they may hold further hearings to explore the dismissals.

Rove Associate Won't Seek U.S. Attorney Post Permanently (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON - A former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove who replaced one of the recently ousted U.S. attorneys has decided not to seek the job permanently after concluding that the Senate would block his confirmation.

Tim Griffin, the U.S. attorney in Little Rock, said Friday that he wasn't asked to step aside by the administration, despite the controversy sparked by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' unexpected firings of seven Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys.

Griffin, 38, said he would be willing to remain interim U.S. attorney until a replacement is named. Under a change in the law last year, that means he could stay in office until the end of President Bush's term.

"I will be here as long as the White House and Department of Justice wants me here," he said. "Under the law, I could be here, hypothetically, until end of 2008 or early 2009."

Justice Department officials described Griffin as a talented and experienced lawyer, and accused Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., of trying to block Griffin from becoming a permanent U.S. attorney. Justice Department officials said Friday that the administration would work with the Arkansas delegation to find a replacement. Gonzales has told senators that he'll submit all U.S. attorney candidates for Senate confirmation.

"Given Tim's strong qualifications, the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation," Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said.

Administration officials have been forced to defend the firings in recent weeks after critics raised concerns that well-respected U.S. attorneys were being removed to make way for handpicked candidates who would be less likely to buck the White House.

Griffin took office after the Justice Department asked longtime U.S. attorney Bud Cummins to step aside. Justice Department officials later acknowledged that Cummins was removed to make way for Griffin and not for any "performance-related" reasons. The department cited unspecified performance issues as justification for firing the other six prosecutors.

Griffin, a former spokesman for the Republican National Committee, was criticized as having more impressive political credentials than courtroom experience. Former White House counsel Harriet Miers had asked the Justice Department to appoint him. Griffin, a former military attorney, was a prosecutor in Little Rock for about a year and an independent counsel for three years.

Gonzales called Pryor on Thursday night to tell him that the Justice Department would not ask the Senate to confirm Griffin.

Gonzales promised that the administration would seek confirmation for another candidate, but he didn't say when an announcement would be made, said Michael Teague, Pryor's spokesman.

Teague said Pryor hadn't made up his mind about Griffin, but simply wanted him to come before the Senate for confirmation.

Pryor was concerned that a change in the Patriot Act last March meant that Griffin could stay in office indefinitely without confirmation.

"It's not about Tim Griffin," Teague said. "It's about restoring legitimacy to the process."

Cozy At The Beach (WP)

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

A Justice Department lawyer invests with a lobbyist, settles with his company -- and is told there's no ethics problem.

IT'S THE KIND of story that seems to confirm everything people believe is sleazy about the way Washington works. Last March, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then the head of the Justice Department's environmental division, bought a $1 million vacation home with Don R. Duncan, the top lobbyist for oil company ConocoPhillips. Nine months later, Ms. Wooldridge signed off on a settlement agreement that let ConocoPhillips delay the installation of pollution-control equipment and the payment of fines.

Just to make matters cozier, the third owner of the beach house is J. Steven Griles, the former No. 2 official at the Interior Department who's now the target of a Justice Department criminal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Oh, and Ms. Wooldridge, who lives with Mr. Griles, once worked with him at Interior, where she gave Mr. Griles ethics advice and defended his actions during an inspector general investigation.

Justice officials and Ms. Wooldridge's lawyer say she checked with a department ethics lawyer and got the go-ahead to buy the home. "There was no need to recuse herself from ConocoPhillips since she was advised by the appropriate ethics officials that there was not a conflict," her lawyer, Stephen Grafman, told the Associated Press. We'd like to understand more about the basis for that advice; Mr. Grafman says he has a written ethics opinion from Justice but declined to release it, saying that should be left to the department. Given Mr. Duncan's key position as the head of the company's Washington office, and Ms. Wooldridge's similarly key role as assistant attorney general, the assertion that Duncan didn't lobby Wooldridge doesn't give much comfort. The entanglements -- an investment with a senior employee of a company whose interests she's involved with overseeing -- look just terrible. Recusal should have been a no-brainer.

Ms. Wooldridge has left the department, but Justice, responding to inquiries from Reps. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), said yesterday that its Office of Professional Responsibility was looking into the matter. In the meantime, here's an ethics tip: If you have to ask the ethics folks for advice about whether you can do something, you probably shouldn't do it.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Case Could Avoid Trial (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 17, 2007

Defense wants civil resolution to the charges

Three former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives whose 2004 fraud and conspiracy convictions in an Enron case were overturned last year may avoid facing another jury.

Upon informing U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein on Friday that the government wanted to retry the case "sooner rather than later," Assistant U.S. Attorney Arnold Spencer said prosecutors also would "continue our conversations" with defense attorneys to resolve it without a second trial.

Spencer declined to elaborate, as did attorneys for two of the defendants. But one of the defense attorneys, Dan Cogdell, said he was "looking for a civil resolution, not a criminal resolution," such as a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Werlein, who presided over the first trial, encouraged some sort of nontrial resolution. He said prosecutors should "at least ponder" where the government's time, money and energy is best spent.

"So I wish you well in your conversations. I hope you will be able to be successful," the judge said.

Friday's hearing came nearly six months after a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals threw out most jury convictions of Daniel Bayly, James Brown, Robert Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs.

The case involves a year-end 1999 deal in which the government contends the brokerage pretended to buy three power plants on barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have met quarterly earnings targets. The defendants claimed the deal was proper.

Jurors acquitted in-house Enron accountant Sheila Kahanek while convicting the four Merrill defendants and Dan Boyle, a former Enron finance executive.

Brown lawyer Cogdell represented Kahanek, who called him "my hero" upon her acquittal. He said Friday he "can't wait to revisit this case."

The appeals panel erased Fuhs' convictions for lack of evidence, and he cannot be retried. Boyle did not appeal and is serving a three-year, 10-month prison term.

The panel also upheld Brown's convictions of perjury and obstruction of justice for lying to a grand jury about the nature of the deal. Cogdell and Sidney Powell, another of Brown's new attorneys, are seeking to appeal that decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

But regarding the reversals, the panel's 2-1 ruling said the original prosecutors improperly presented a theory to win the fraud and conspiracy convictions. The opinion said the government wrongly claimed the men deprived Enron of their honest services because their actions were in line with corporate goals and didn't rob the energy company or shareholders of money or property.

The opinion also said it "should not be read to suggest that no dishonest, fraudulent, wrongful or criminal act has occurred."

Gary Brown, who probed the barge deal as special counsel for the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, said Friday that even with the reversals, the case sent a message to Wall Street that investment bankers shouldn't help companies fudge their financial results.

"I think people have gotten that message loud and clear, but there needs to be some resolution that's clear these people are guilty of some wrongdoing," said Brown, who is not related to defendant James Brown. He said a civil settlement would suffice, "given the fact that they've also served some time."

Powell said James Brown "wants to be vindicated."

Bayly, former head of investment banking for Merrill, and Furst, the brokerage's former liaison with Enron, served nearly a year in prison when they and Fuhs were released in June 2006 pending their appeals.

Federal Probe Floods Statehouse With Subpoenas (NSL)

By Ted Sherman And Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), February 17, 2007

Democratic, Republican leaders served as inquiry into Trenton budget process grows

New Jersey legislative officials were hit with a volley of federal subpoenas yesterday, in a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

The subpoenas were served on both the Democratic and Republican leadership in the Senate and the Assembly -- seeking information on how millions in public funds were handed out over the last three years.

It was the latest development in a federal probe that began last April with an investigation into state Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden), who was accused by a federal monitor of using his position to steer funding to the state's medical university after he received a "no-work" job there. The matter has now expanded into an inquiry into how lawmakers divvy up public funds.

The subpoenas, delivered by FBI agents late Friday afternoon as lawmakers were heading home, left many in Trenton thunderstruck.

"Trenton is on fire," declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole (R-Essex), as news of the subpoenas broke. "This is equivalent to Rome burning."

Lawmakers and other Statehouse veterans could not recall a federal probe ever going as deeply into the state's budget process.

Among those who received subpoenas were Senate President Richard Codey (D-Essex); Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance (R-Hunterdon); Senate Majority Leader Bernard Kenny (D-Hudson); Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts (D-Camden); Assembly Minority Leader Alex DeCroce (R-Morris), and Assembly Majority Leader Bonnie Watson Coleman (D-Mercer), legislative officials confirmed.

All planned to comply, said officials for both sides.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, had no comment and would neither confirm nor deny the issuance of subpoenas.

The subpoenas came after Christie's ongoing, behind-the-scenes fight for records from the Office of Legislative Services, which has been resisting his demand for information.

The Sunday Star-Ledger first reported the secret court showdown over those records last week, and the expanding inquiry by the U.S. Attorney into the Legislature.

Leaders of the Democratic-controlled Legislature have maintained that the scope of that earlier subpoena was narrowly focused -- and not necessarily indicative of a broader investigation into the Legislature itself. Yesterday's wide-ranging requests, however, made it clear that Christie was looking deeply into how the Legislature divvies up public funding.

Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether some lawmakers have sought, through the state budget process, to steer money to nonprofit organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families.

Yesterday's subpoenas requested documents and communications from 2004 to present -- including e-mails, letters, memos and faxes -- regarding "property-tax assistance and community development grants and any other grants or assistance, commonly referred to as Christmas tree items," according to three legislative sources who saw them.

Republicans were quick to point out that Democrats have controlled the Legislature, and the budget process, during that period.

The Legislature each year awards millions in state grants with little public scrutiny or oversight. Spending for these legislative initiatives -- known in New Jersey as Christmas tree items -- more than doubled in the past five years, to nearly $350 million. Most of the money, in the form of community development grants, has historically gone to the party in power in Trenton, under a largely secretive process.

Codey said they would provide the information being sought.

"We will comply 100 percent, in every way, shape and form," he said.

Lance, confirming that his office received a subpoena, said the Republican Senate Office would also comply "completely and expeditiously" with the subpoenas.

"We have been in no way involved in the dead of night budget additions of recent years," he said. "There needs to be total transparency with regard to legislative additions to the annual state budget."

DOJ_NMG_0134233

Assembly Republican Communications Director Bill Guhl, confirming the Assembly Republican Office had been served with a subpoena requesting information related to grants and budget items, said they have been clear that the Legislature should comply with the U.S. Attorney.

"We are fully cooperating with all requests from the U.S. Attorney's Office," said Guhl.

Roberts also pledged cooperation.

"Corruption is not a partisan issue. If the U.S. Attorney is going to conduct an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing, it's an inquiry that we welcome and will assist in," he said.

Roberts has already been directly questioned by FBI agents in connection with the Bryant investigation, as has several other legislators and legislative budget officials.

"I have tried to be as helpful as possible about the federal government's questions about Senator Bryant," Roberts said in a written statement late yesterday. "Federal officials spoke to me for about a half hour in December. ... I can't discuss specifics but the conversation was brief and professional."

Bryant has been a focal point of the U.S. Attorney since last year, after a federal monitor said the former chairman of the powerful appropriations committee used his position to steer state funding to the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey.

The monitor said Bryant funneled more than $12.5 million to the university's School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, after he was hired to a "no-work" job that boosted his pension credits.

Federal authorities subsequently subpoenaed records about Bryant from the state Legislature, Gloucester County and Rutgers University -- where Bryant also held jobs -- and Bryant later resigned from his seat as Senate budget chairman.

Three subpoenas were served in October on the Office of Legislative Services, the state Senate and the state Treasury Department in connection with the Bryant investigation.

The Senate and the Treasury Department quickly complied with the request for information last fall. OLS, however, would not respond to the subpoena -- citing attorney-client privilege, sources have said.

In addition to serving as the nonpartisan research and operations arm of the Legislature, OLS acts as counsel to the Legislature and its members.

That led to a closed door hearing in U.S. District Court on Wednesday, as Christie sought to compel the legislative office to comply.

The stalemate turned into a politically charged debate this week spearheaded by Republicans, who accused the Democrats of a cover-up.

The Democrats on Thursday responded with charges that there was no broad investigation of the Legislature, and complained of "sensationalized media accounts based on false information about this investigation."

Payment After Mayor's Affair Is Questioned (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 16 — In the latest development in a lingering political scandal, the city attorney here is investigating whether any laws were broken in a payment to a married woman who had an affair with Mayor Gavin Newsom.

The woman, Ruby Rippey-Tourk, worked full time in City Hall as the mayor's appointments secretary until last May, when she took a three-month unpaid leave to seek treatment for a substance abuse problem.

While she was on leave, several unidentified city employees donated their sick time to Ms. Rippey-Tourk under a program that allows city employees to transfer sick time to other city employees. After she returned from leave, Ms. Rippey-Tourk formally resigned, and was paid out the cash equivalent of that accumulated time, a little more than $10,000.

Sam Singer, a spokesman for Ms. Rippey-Tourk, said he was not at liberty to say who had transferred their time, but that the mayor had not. Mr. Singer added that the payment was "acceptable and legal."

But on Thursday, the city attorney, Dennis Herrera, said he would examine the payment to make sure it had been "done properly under city laws and procedures."

Peter Ragone, a spokesman for the mayor, said his office welcomed the review. "We are confident the matter was handled appropriately and humanely," Mr. Ragone said.

The inquiry comes as Mr. Newsom is trying to shake off the damage from his admission last month that he had a brief sexual relationship with Ms. Rippey-Tourk in late 2005, when he was in the process of getting a divorce. Ms. Rippey-Tourk is married to Alex Tourk, who had been managing Mr. Newsom's campaign for a second term until the affair prompted his resignation.

Payments to Mr. Tourk have also been examined during the fallout from the scandal. The mayor initially promised to pay him a salary from campaign funds until he could find a new job.

After city lawyers suggested that such payments might raise ethical or legal issues, Mr. Newsom pledged to pay Mr. Tourk personally out of his own fortune, which he made from a wine and restaurant business.

Shortly after news of his affair broke, Mr. Newsom acknowledged an alcohol problem and has sought continuing treatment at an out-patient rehabilitation program here. Since then, one member of the city's board of supervisors has called for the mayor's resignation, and several prospective mayoral candidates have suggested that the popular Mr. Newsom may be vulnerable in November.

Lawyer Accused Of Destroying Evidence In Connecticut Pornography Case (NYT)

By Matthew J. Malone

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

GREENWICH, Conn., Feb. 16 — A well-known lawyer was indicted on Friday on charges that he obstructed justice and destroyed evidence in the investigation of a former church choir director whose laptop computer contained images of naked boys.

The lawyer, Philip D. Russell, 48, of Stamford, appeared in United States District Court in Bridgeport and pleaded not guilty. He was released on $100,000 bail.

Mr. Russell is accused of destroying a laptop computer containing pornography that was owned by Robert F. Tate, the longtime music director at Christ Church here. Mr. Tate pleaded guilty in January to possessing 150 to 300 images of naked boys and faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison.

The indictment said that two unidentified church officials and Mr. Russell, who was acting as a lawyer for the church, confronted Mr. Tate in October after a church employee who had been using the laptop discovered the pornographic images. Mr. Tate admitted that the images were his and promptly resigned.

Mr. Russell then took the laptop and dismantled it, the indictment said.

Prosecutors said Mr. Russell and the church officials allowed Mr. Tate to remove his possessions from his church apartment and arranged for him to fly from Connecticut to California. He was later arrested in Los Angeles.

Many parishioners have supported Mr. Tate, who ran the church's renowned choir for three decades. Some helped him pay his bond.

It is unclear whether there will be other indictments. Several people affiliated with the church have hired lawyers, and the Rev. Jeffrey Walker, the church's rector, has been called before the grand jury at least twice. Prosecutors did not return calls seeking comment.

Christ Church, an Episcopal congregation of 1,500, has many prominent parishioners. It was the boyhood church of former President George H. W. Bush.

Mr. Russell's lawyer, Thomas J. Williams, said Mr. Russell was optimistic that if his case was not dismissed, a jury would find his actions lawful.

Mark Phillips, a lawyer who has worked with Mr. Russell for 17 years, said, "I have no doubt that whatever Phil may have done, that in no way did he think he was violating any law or any ethical guideline."

Some legal observers say Mr. Russell's case could be a test of a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law that places greater responsibility on lawyers to preserve evidence in situations that may become the subject of criminal prosecutions.

Congress passed the law to tighten oversight of corporations in the aftermath of the Enron debacle and other corporate fraud cases. Some of those scandals involved allegations that files and e-mail messages were destroyed before criminal charges could be brought.

Mark A. Dubois, the chief disciplinary counsel for the Connecticut Judicial Branch, said he had spoken to local bar associations in recent months to educate lawyers on the provision. He said lawyers were taken aback by the news.

"You could hear a pin drop," Mr. Dubois said.

California: Warrant Issued In Attack On Elie Wiesel (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

The San Francisco Police Department issued an arrest warrant for a man suspected of attacking Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize. The man, Eric Hunt, 22, of Sussex County, N.J., is accused of assaulting Mr. Wiesel, 78, on Feb. 1, as he was attending an interfaith conference. Mr. Hunt, who is not yet in custody but has been located, will be charged with a hate crime, the police said in a statement. He was identified as a suspect, the police said, after claiming to be the attacker in an Internet posting.

House Dems Back Federal Shield Law (SFC)

By Zachary Coile, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 2007

It would protect reporters from revealing their sources to government prosecutors

Washington -- House lawmakers, with the support of top Democratic leaders, are preparing to fast-track long-stalled legislation that would shield reporters in most cases from having to reveal their sources to federal prosecutors.

The move follows the Justice Department's decision this week to withdraw a subpoena for two Chronicle reporters after a defense lawyer pleaded guilty to leaking grand jury transcripts in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative investigation, in which top athletes testified they had used illegal steroids.

Reps. Mike Pence, R-Ind., and Rick Boucher, D-Va., plan to reintroduce their federal media shield legislation next month with the support of House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich. Conyers has pledged to move the bill through his committee quickly and to the House floor.

Sens. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., and Richard Lugar, R-Ind., are preparing to reintroduce a similar bill in the Senate, although proponents suggest it may be tougher to get a filibuster-proof 60-vote majority in the Senate, given the Bush administration's opposition.

The Chronicle case has been used by the bill's supporters as Exhibit A for why Congress should pass a law protecting journalists from having to name their sources or turn over materials to the government.

Pence, who met last month with Chronicle reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada in his Capitol Hill office, said even though the journalists were spared a threatened 18-month prison sentence, their case exposed the lack of protections for journalists and their confidential sources in federal courts.

"While these reporters won't go to jail, in many respects the First Amendment is still behind bars," Pence said in an interview. "This case stands as a stark testament to the need for Congress to adopt a federal media shield statute."

Thirty-two states, including California, and the District of Columbia have media shield laws, and 17 other states have recognized some form of privilege of confidentiality between reporters and their sources. But the protections do not cover reporters in cases in federal court.

The shield law debate comes as high-profile journalists have testified under subpoena in the Washington trial of former White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who is charged with lying about the disclosure of a CIA agent's name.

Lawmakers also are watching the case of blogger Josh Wolf, who set a record last week for a journalist imprisoned for contempt after spending his 169th day in prison for refusing to hand over a videotape of an anarchist protest in San Francisco.

The Chronicle subpoenas were withdrawn after attorney Troy Ellerman, who once represented the founder and another executive of BALCO, pleaded guilty to four felony charges in federal court this week. He faces a sentence of up to two years in prison after acknowledging that he allowed Fainaru-Wada to take notes from the transcripts of testimony in the BALCO case.

Williams and Fainaru-Wada came to Washington last month to discuss their case and lobby for a shield law. Top lawmakers -- including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and Conyers -- sent letters to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales urging him to withdraw the subpoenas.

"Lance and Mark were very effective when they were here a few weeks ago. People are now paying attention," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

"Do I think they would pay more attention if (the reporters) were sitting in jail? Yeah," she said. "But this situation was egregious enough I think it's still going to be a very useful example for us to use up on Capitol Hill."

Lawmakers said they still believe the subpoenas to Chronicle reporters and the looming sentence of the leaker have sent an alarming message to both journalists and their sources.

"I don't know who put pressure on the source to reveal his identity, but I can say there is a chilling effect with respect to journalists, who are now going to be less willing to engage in investigative reporting where a confidential source may be involved," Boucher said.

"And the greater harm is the willingness of sources generally to come forward when they realize that ... a reporter can be threatened with jail time."

Sponsors of the House bill say they have redrafted it to include three major exceptions where reporters would be required to reveal information: in cases where disclosure could prevent imminent harm to national security; in cases where journalists were first-hand observers to a crime; and in cases where a corporation's trade secret was revealed.

Even though the Chronicle subpoenas have been withdrawn, Boucher said he believes the case remains one of the most compelling arguments for a federal shield law.

"This was probably the most egregious use of the prosecutorial power of the federal government to extract a confidential source from a reporter that we have seen to date. Because the subject matter did not involve national security, it did not involve imminent harm to anyone. This was a matter of finding out information about steroid use by a professional athlete."

Doolittle Defends Bribery Case Figure (SACBEE)

By David Whitney, Bee Washington Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, February 17, 2007

He doubts his friend is guilty of charges tied to ex-Rep. Cunningham.

Rep. John Doolittle, R-Roseville, said Friday that he believes in the innocence of a close friend and political supporter indicted this week on charges related to the bribery of former San Diego-area Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Brent Wilkes, a Poway defense contractor whose business Doolittle had helped land a $37 million contract, was indicted on corruption charges, including paying bribes and providing prostitutes for Cunningham, who's now in prison.

Wilkes entered a not guilty plea to the charges, handed up by a federal grand jury, in a federal court in San Diego on Wednesday. He later sent out an e-mail proclaiming his innocence.

"The investigation and its accompanying deliberate leaks of false rumors has destroyed my reputation and inflicted critical wounds on all of my business interests," Wilkes said. "Let me say loud and clear: I never bribed Duke Cunningham or anyone else."

Doolittle said in an earlier interview that he befriended Wilkes though Ed Buckham, a former staff member for then-Rep. Tom DeLay who became a lobbyist for the Alexandria Strategy Group and was a close associate of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Doolittle also has described Abramoff as a close friend.

Over the course of their relationship, Wilkes and his wife, Regina, together with his companies and associates, contributed tens of thousands of dollars to Doolittle's re-election committee and political action committee.

In April 2005, Wilkes' corporate jet was used to fly DeLay to Las Vegas for a fundraiser at the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino for Doolittle's PAC, the Superior California Federal Leadership Fund. Wilkes contributed $10,000 to Doolittle at that event.

Later, Doolittle acknowledged he included a $37 million item in the Defense Department's budget to pay for a contract to one of Wilkes' companies, PerfectWave. He also said he tried to win a House contract for another Wilkes company, ADCS.

Asked about Wilkes' indictment during a telephone news conference Friday, Doolittle said he has read his friend's statement, and believes him.

"That's the Brent Wilkes I know," Doolittle said. But in an apparent reference to Abramoff, the congressman said that "I must admit that there are other examples of these people who turned out to be different than I imagined.

"But I've always said I don't believe Brent Wilkes could be involved in something like this," Doolittle said. "The behavior they've alleged about Brent Wilkes is inconsistent with everything I know about the man. I'll be shocked if it turns out differently."

In his own dealings with the Justice Department with regard to the ongoing Abramoff political corruption scandal, Doolittle said his attorneys have reported no progress in their efforts to clear his name in connection with any allegations of wrongdoing.

Doolittle has spent more than $100,000 in legal fees in that effort. He said Friday that he is not aware of any new legal fees charged to his re-election campaign recently, but added that "the bills just keep rolling in."

Doolittle was re-elected to a ninth term last November by a narrow three-point margin. He attributed the close vote in part to publicity about his association with Abramoff. Doolittle recently announced a 10-point plan to reconnect with voters, a key part of which begins next week with a series of town hall meetings throughout his congressional district. State Awaits Changes In Sex Offender Registry (LANSSJ)

By Erik Adams, Capital News Service

Lansing (MI) State Journal, February 17, 2007

Feds working on standardization, assigning duties

A Senate bill would amend the state's 1994 sex offender registry law to follow federal registry requirements.

But unfortunately, federal officials haven't revealed those requirements.

The bill would expand information about ex-cons on the State Police public sex offender registry to include details about vehicles they own, their places of employment and convictions for other crimes.

Advertisement

2006 mandate

That would comply with a 2006 federal mandate that requires standardization of information in state registries so they can be integrated into the National Sex Offender Registry.

However, the U.S. Justice Department hasn't announced what standardization would entail. It's up to that department to read what Congress ordered and determine exactly what it means, said Sgt. Matt Bolger, legislative liaison for the State Police.

"Federal law is nowhere near as easy to read as state law is," he said.

"We're kind of waiting on that determination from the Department of Justice on what our duties are going to be."

Once those duties have been determined, Michigan lawmakers can amend state law to comply, Bolger said.

Sen. Wayne Kuipers, R-Holland, is the bill's sponsor. Darin Ackerman, Kuipers' chief of staff, said the legislation is intended to get a jump on the federal regulations.

Changes anticipated

The Senate Judiciary Committee won't take action on the bill until the regulations are announced, at which point any necessary changes will be made, he said.

In January, the State Police launched a new version of the Michigan registry that features the anticipated changes.

Bolger said offenders are not yet required to provide the additional information and that his agency hasn't been collecting it.

'Coming soon'

"There are some data on there, like registration details - last verification date, date of initial registration, date of registration expiration - those all show 'coming soon,' " Bolger said.

Shelli Weisberg, legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan, said the additional information could create problems for individuals other than those in the registry, such as employers.

"It would be unfortunate if an employer chose to hire someone who's on the registry - because there are so many people who are on the registry who are not dangerous and would be fabulous employees - because having the employer's place of business connected to that registry would most likely cause hardship to the employer," she said.

What The CIA Leak Case Is About (WP)

By Byron York

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

At the end of each witness's testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, after prosecutors and defense attorneys examined and cross-examined, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton asked jurors to write down any questions they had. Walton would then look through the papers, decide which questions were appropriate and pose them to the witness.

Now, as the case heads to the jury, those queries are our best hints about what jurors are thinking.

But last week there was a moment when we got a hint not from a question that Walton asked, but from one he refused to ask. After the testimony of star prosecution witness Tim Russert, Walton scanned the jurors' queries and announced, "There is going to be one question I'm not going to ask. I've concluded that that question is not appropriate and therefore you should not speculate as to what the response would have been."

What was he talking about? A moment later, Walton told the jurors: "What Mrs. Wilson's status was at the CIA, whether it was covert or not covert, is not something that you're going to hear any evidence presented to you on in this trial."

"Whether she was, or whether she was not, covert is not relevant to the issues you have to decide in this case," he said.

It is The Thing That Cannot Be Spoken at the Libby trial.

From the first day, Walton has said that jurors will not be allowed to know, or even ask, about the status -- covert, classified or otherwise -- of Valerie Plame Wilson, the woman at the heart of the CIA leak case. "You must not consider these matters in your deliberations or speculate or guess about them," he told jurors in his opening instructions.

A few days later, on Jan. 29, Walton told everyone in the courtroom that the jurors are not the only ones in the dark about Mrs. Wilson's status. "I don't know, based on what has been presented to me in this case, what her status was," Walton said. Two days later, he added, "I to this day don't know what her actual status was."

Walton's reasoning is this: The trial is about whether Libby lied to the grand jury in the CIA leak investigation. Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald never charged anyone with leaking the identity of a covert or classified agent. Libby isn't on trial for that, so jurors -- and judge -- don't need to know.

The problem is, the entire case stems from accusations that the Bush White House illegally leaked Mrs. Wilson's identity in an effort to get back at her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, for his high-profile criticism of the administration's case for war in Iraq. That's why the CIA leak investigation began, and it's why Libby appeared before a grand jury, leading to the perjury charges against him. It's what the CIA leak case is about. Yet Walton has told jurors to put it out of their minds.

However well-intentioned, the prohibition isn't working; the question of Mrs. Wilson's status came up in court virtually every day. Take, for example, the time prosecutors played tapes of all eight hours of Libby's grand jury testimony.

And what was Libby asked about?

"Did you have any sense that if you revealed the person's identity out at the CIA you may be compromising the identity of a covert person?" Fitzgerald was recorded as asking Libby.

"No, sir," Libby responded. "I mean, my, my understanding is that most of the people at the CIA are not covert . . ."

"You didn't consider that there might be a risk that a person working at the CIA might be overt to other CIA employees and even sometimes to the government, but may be operating undercover -- or might otherwise be a covert person?"

"I had no sense that it was something classified."

The jury heard it all, aided by their own copies of the transcript and exhibits. Of course, if they thought about Mrs. Wilson's status, they would have been violating Judge Walton's order.

Then there was the argument Fitzgerald had with defense lawyer Ted Wells over Fitzgerald's theory that Libby lied because he was afraid for his job after President Bush announced that anyone who leaked classified information about a CIA agent would be fired.

Wait a minute, said Wells. "The jury has been instructed that the issue of whether it was classified or whether she was covert will not be presented in this case."

"I'm not going to tell the jury the information was classified," Fitzgerald responded. "I will tell the jury that there was an investigation into whether the law was violated."

Of course, we all knew -- and the jury knew too, since it was discussed in Libby's grand jury testimony -- that the law to which Fitzgerald referred was the one barring disclosure of a covert agent's identity.

Outside the courtroom, Fitzgerald has said that Mrs. Wilson's status was in fact classified. The Libby indictment says that, too. But the judge has not allowed the jury to see the indictment, either.

The result is that jurors have heard constant suggestions that some sort of crime, committed by the administration and perhaps by Libby himself, lies at the bottom of the case. An air of accusation hangs over the courtroom.

But the accusation can't be discussed.

Maybe in the end, jurors will be able to make sense of it all. But it's more likely that even after the trial ends, they'll still have one question they want answered.

CIVIL LAW:

GE To Record $115 Million Expense For Asbestos Claims (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

General Electric Co. said it will record a $115 million after-tax expense in the first quarter after losing a decade-long battle with its insurers over payments for thousands of asbestos-related claims.

In a decision released this week, the New York State Court of Appeals upheld lower-court rulings preventing GE from tapping secondary insurance to cover claims brought mostly by individuals exposed to asbestos-insulated turbines. The Court of Appeals is the state's highest court.

To date, GE, based in Fairfield, Conn., has paid more than $500 million to settle asbestos-related cases, according to court documents. GE said 509,000 asbestos-related claims were filed against the company through 2006; 40,000 are pending. GE said claims settled to date have mostly been covered by both GE's primary and secondary carriers; the rest are being covered by GE. GE didn't make the asbestos but used it to insulate turbines.

GE spokesman Gary Sheffer said, in a statement, GE was "disappointed in the decision, which is contrary to how the majority of courts have ruled." Mr. Sheffer said GE is reviewing its options.

Mr. Sheffer said the expense, amounting to about one cent per share, would have no impact on GE's financial forecast for the first quarter. GE has said it expects net income of between $4.5 billion and $4.6 billion, or 43 cents to 45 cents a share.

The lawsuit centered on whether GE's asbestos-related claims should be treated as one incident under its insurance policies issued between 1965 and 1985 or whether each claim should be treated individually.

GE was responsible for the first $5 million in coverage on each occurrence. After the first $5 million, GE could access more than $2 billion in secondary insurance.

GE argued that the claims were one occurrence, allowing it to tap the excess insurance. However, the court ruled that each claim was a single occurrence, limiting GE's access to the insurance, since few individual claims exceed $5 million. GE's primary insurer, Electric Mutual Liability Insurance Co., a GE affiliate, became insolvent in 1995.

"GE was attempting to change a longstanding New York law on how the number of occurrences is decided in this context," said Michael Balch, of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP, who represented one of the insurers. He said GE wanted to consider as one occurrence "400,000-plus cases arising at thousands of sites across the country dating back 70 to 80 years."

Mr. Sheffer said the number of cases being filed each year is declining, down to 7,000 last year, compared with 61,000 in 2002. He said more cases are also being resolved without payment. More than 80% of the pending cases are for claimants who aren't sick, Mr. Sheffer said.

GE hopes "courts around the nation will follow the lead of many jurisdictions and dismiss such cases or place them on a deferred docket," he said.

Federal Appeals Court Probes Validity Of Lawsuit Over Tire-pressure Monitors (DEN)

By David Shepardson, Detroit News Washington Bureau

Detroit News, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON --A three-judge federal appeals court panel today expressed skepticism toward tire makers and an auto safety group who say federal regulators have watered down rules requiring tire pressure monitoring systems in all new vehicles starting this fall.

Tire makers and Public Citizen argue the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's regulation, aimed at making automakers install tire-pressure warning systems, falls far short of what Congress intended when it passed a 2000 law requiring that all vehicles be equipped with such monitors by Sept 1.

The legislation came in the wake of a recall of 13 million tires on Ford Explorers and other vehicles that were linked to nearly 280 deaths.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia heard the challenge to the NHTSA rule today, more than three years after another appeals court threw out NHTSA's first tire pressure regulation, issued in 2002.

Judges David Sentelle, Brett Kavanaugh and A. Raymond Randolph questioned whether the tire makers and Public Citizen had the legal right or "standing" to file the suit.

Marc Machlin, a lawyer for Public Citizen, noted that more than 78,000 accidents yearly are caused by under inflated tires. "It's a very serious issue," Machlin said, but was quickly cut off by Sentelle.

The plaintiffs must overcome several hurdles: one is showing that there is a "non-trivial" higher risk from the rule NHTSA imposed versus the type of tire monitoring rules they are seeking. They also must show they have a legal right to file the suit.

Sentelle said if there is only a general risk for everyone, the matter is best decided by "the political branches" -- i.e. Congress and the White House. Sentelle said under the Public Citizen theory, drivers, passengers and pedestrians -- basically everyone in the United States -- would have a right to sue.

"If everyone has standing, than no one has standing," he said.

"What has the (Transportation) department done to prevent the companies from making safer tires?" Sentelle asked. He questioned how federal regulators could be held to account by tire makers.

But Kavanaugh also asked some tough questions of Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III. He said it was "odd" that NHTSA could "water down" or effectively eliminate some of the requirements that Congress set in its statute.

Byron said Congress couldn't have meant to mandate an "impossible" requirement, namely that automakers certify that their systems work with all replacement tires.

NHTSA acknowledges that up to 1 percent of replacement tires would make tire pressure systems inoperative -- or 2.25 million of the 225 million replacement tires sold annually in the United States, a figure Byron sought to downplay. "That's still a lot," Kavanaugh said.Public Citizen, along with tire makers Goodyear Tire & Rubber, Bridgestone/Firestone North America, Cooper Tire & Rubber and Pirelli Tire, and the industry trade group Tire Industry Association, filed the suit against the U.S. Transportation Department and NHTSA.

"NHTSA's watered-down standards will cause more tire failures, leading to more deaths, injuries and property damage than standards meeting statutory requirements," lawyers for Public Citizen, the safety advocacy group, wrote in a legal brief filed late last month.

It has been estimated that the requirements will cost automakers up to $1.2 billion annually to fully implement, beginning in the 2008 model year. Car manufacturers argue that the lawsuit is an attempt by the tire industry to shift their warranty costs onto them.

Tire makers say NHTSA's regulation puts drivers and passengers at risk because it fails to provide for warning drivers of low tire pressure soon enough, doesn't require the systems to work with replacement tires and allows the monitors to be tested under conditions that don't take into account cold weather extremes, which can alter tire performance.

The regulation being challenged mandates that tire pressure monitoring systems alert drivers within 20 minutes if any tire is 25 percent or more below the recommended inflation level. NHTSA's prior proposal had set the figure at 10 minutes.

When the systems are in place, a radio transmitter sends a signal to an onboard computer that lights a warning signal on the dashboard.

The rule under challenge also says all testing on the system would be done on a test track in San Angelo, Texas, which critics said would not take into account cold weather.

The regulation was issued in April 2005, after an appeals court ruled in August 2003 that NHTSA's original 2002 regulation, which set the alert level at 30 percent below recommended inflation, adopted "a standard that permits plainly inferior systems" and that was "arbitrary and capricious."

The April 2005 rule was weakened from several earlier NHTSA proposals. NHTSA rejected calls from Public Citizen and the American Automobile Association to set the alert level at 20 percent below the recommended inflation. The agency also relaxed other requirements, including that the monitoring systems work with replacement tires or spares, saying "we expect a typical vehicle will outlast its original set of tires."

Tire companies acknowledge that they are concerned about higher warranty costs, lawsuits and customer dissatisfaction.

"Tire manufacturers and the government should strive in developing standards … to make tires safer and should not adopt a less safer alternative," wrote James Stroble, manager of product analysis at Goodyear Tire & Rubber, in a court filing.

"Minimizing tire failures is a very important goal of my company."

NHTSA says it was within its authority to write the regulation and honored the intent of Congress.

It also emphasized that drivers "subject to repeated warnings when a tire is only slightly under-inflated would quickly become frustrated by the frequent exercise of re-inflating a tire by only a small amount."

NHTSA said the systems aren't designed to "warn the driver of extremely rapid pressure losses that could accompany a vehicle encounter with a road hazard."

Automakers say the burden belongs on tire makers.

"Their own products will fail if more stringent regulations are not imposed on someone else -- in this case, the vehicle manufacturers," wrote Erika Jones, who represents the automakers, in a court brief. "But the product failure that the tire manufacturers cite -- failure due to severe under-inflation -- is preventable by the tire manufacturers themselves."

NHTSA estimates the system will cost as much as $65 per vehicle and save 120 lives annually and prevent about 8,400 injuries. Public Citizen argues imposing a tougher tire pressure standard that it says could save more than 150 lives and 10,000 injuries annually, while NHTSA said it would save just 4 lives a year.

In November 2000 -- in response to the Ford Firestone recalls -- Congress required the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration within 1 year to complete a rulemaking "to require a warning system in new motor vehicles to indicate to the operator when a tire is significantly under inflated."

The widely publicized tire recalls in 2000 and 2001 were sparked by a spate of rollover accidents that killed an estimated 270 people. Ford spent more than $3 billion and more than 14 million Firestone tires were recalled.

One key problem is that many drivers rarely check their tire pressure. A 2001 NHTSA survey found just 33 percent check tire pressure on a regular basis Another study found that more than a quarter of all cars and SUVs on the road have under inflated tires.

Spokesmen for Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler said 70 percent of 2007 model vehicles under 10,000 pounds have the tire pressure monitoring systems, and they will be in all 2008 models, as required.

Justice Department Backs Sober House Suit (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134241

The U.S. Department of Justice filed a legal brief Friday contending that a Boca Raton ordinance banning so-called sober houses from residential neighborhoods clearly violates federal housing law.

The Justice Department brief was filed in a lawsuit by a sober house operator against the city that went to trial last month. It asks a federal judge to declare the ordinance invalid and prevent the city from enforcing it. The ordinance, passed by the City Council in May 2002, would require the sober houses to move into areas of the city zoned for medical centers and hotels.

The ordinance has never been enforced because of the threat of litigation. Steve Manko, the owner of two large sober house apartment complexes -- Boca House for men and Awakenings for women -- sued the city in March 2003. The American Civil Liberties Union, representing former and current Boca House clients, also was involved in the case.

Manko's attorney, William Hill of Miami, said he was encouraged by the Justice Department filing because it supports the plaintiffs' position. The plaintiffs contend that the ordinance violates the federal Fair Housing Act and also the Americans with Disabilities Act. Under those federal provisions, people who are in recovery from alcohol or drug addiction are considered to be disabled or handicapped, providing them with housing protections.

"I'm ecstatic," Hill said. "It could not be clearer. The Department of Justice is saying what we have been saying all along: This ordinance violates the Fair Housing Act on its face. The city should have realized this was wrong years ago and not put us through this. Instead, the city has been putting forth a defense that is not legal under the Fair Housing Act."

The city maintains that Manko's sober houses are commercial and medical operations -- involving on-site drug testing, counseling and other services -- that are inappropriate for a residential neighborhood.

Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the Justice Department filing did not raise any new issues.

"We believe the medical and commercial activities taking place in a residential area are inappropriate. There was no evidence in the trial that on-site activities such as these were necessary," Cole said. "If Boca House would change their operations and not do these medical-commercial operations, we would have no problem with them housing recovering substance abusers."

The Justice Department filed a separate suit against the city over the alleged housing violations in September. That case is pending. The judge hearing Manko's suit invited the Justice Department to file Friday's brief.

During the trial, U.S. District Judge Donald Middlebrooks expressed concerns about the breadth of the ordinance relegating the sober houses to commercial districts, as well as the commercial aspect of the sober house operations. He said he would rule as quickly as he could after receiving briefs from the plaintiffs, the city and the Justice Department.

Justice Department attorney Nancy Langworthy wrote that the city's ordinance "singles out for regulation housing for disabled persons and is discriminatory on its face." Langworthy asked the judge to award damages to several former and current residents of Boca House and to impose a fine on the city "to vindicate the public interest."

Attorneys for the city asked the judge to order Boca House to stop providing on-site drug testing, counseling and Alcoholics Anonymous meetings.

Manko's attorney asked the judge to award about $925,000 to Manko for lost profits, but the judge said that was a tenuous claim. Jim Green, an attorney hired by the ACLU to represent the Boca House clients, asked the judge to award them $5,000 to $20,000 apiece.

"These are people in recovery trying to make a new life. Being told they are not welcome in residential neighborhoods hurts," Green said.

If the judge finds the ordinance violates housing laws, the plaintiffs could be entitled to attorneys' fees. If the city wins, its attorneys could collect fees from the plaintiffs. The city estimated the case would cost $600,000 in fees, while the plaintiffs estimated their costs would be $850,000.

Smile, You're On N.Y.P.D. Camera (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

The New York Police Department has generally had the public on its side when it comes to securing the city since the Sept. 11 attacks. For their part, New Yorkers seem perfectly willing to put up with inconveniences, including traffic stops and bag searches. But the police have more and more overstepped their bounds by routinely and indiscriminately videotaping demonstrations of every kind, even peaceful ones. A federal judge was right this week to order the police to curb this conduct.

The practical effect of the order is to compel law-enforcement officers to obey guidelines that require them to state a reason to suspect unlawful activity before they videotape demonstrators. They must also get department authorization. That's a modest requirement. The city contends the current practice is not strictly unconstitutional, but the prospect of being photographed by police while merely protesting can have a chilling effect on free speech.

The city agreed in 1985 to abide by guidelines for police tactics as part of a settlement of a lawsuit by Vietnam-era political activists. Four years ago, after the 9/11 attacks, a judge agreed to give the police greater powers to investigate political groups. Unfortunately, the cops ignored the part about having a rationale for video surveillance.

This week, the same district court judge, Charles Haight Jr., rebuked the city for that failure. He said it was fine for the police to videotape the hundreds of bike riders who take to the streets on the last Friday of every month as an environmental protest, because the riders have a history of traffic violations. But taping a peaceful demonstration by activists for the homeless in front of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's home, as was done in 2005, was pointless because the group posed no security threat.

Judge Haight's lyrical opinion alluded to Longfellow, Greek mythology and even The New Yorker. We hope none of it goes over the heads of the city government, which should now move quickly to ensure the court, and the public, that it will protect New Yorkers' civil liberties.

ANTITRUST:

GM, DaimlerChrysler Deny Buyout Talks (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The Big Two?

The world's largest automaker is set to expand further, as General Motors Corp. is negotiating to buy the struggling Chrysler division from its German parent, DaimlerChrysler AG, sources with knowledge of the talks said.

GM and DaimlerChrysler officials have denied the existence of any talks.

"We're not going to comment on speculations concerning [any] discussions between [DaimlerChrysler] and GM," GM spokesman Tom Wilkinson said yesterday. "As we've said in the past, we've frequently discussed areas of mutual interest with other carmakers, and in a lot of cases, these discussions don't lead anywhere."

Nevertheless, Detroit and Wall Street were buzzing after the German business publication Manager Magazin reported Wednesday that GM and DaimlerChrysler were negotiating a buyout of Chrysler.

Speculation of a buyout intensified yesterday after the U.S. trade publication Automotive News reported that "high level talks" of a buyout between DaimlerChrysler and GM executives are being held.

DaimlerChrysler Chief Executive Officer Dieter Zetsche, when announcing plans Wednesday to cut 13,000 jobs at assembly plants throughout the United States, didn't rule out the possibility of spinning off the Chrysler Group.

"We don't know if any of this is true or not, but the fact that both [companies] are not commenting and the stock market is going crazy indicates that maybe there is something," said John Wolkonowicz, senior analyst with Global Insight of a Lexington, Mass., who tracks the auto industry.

"You can come up with scenarios where this makes good sense for GM. It's not necessarily a silly thing for them to do at all."

DaimlerChrysler's U.S. shares rose $3.08, or 4.4 percent, to close at $73.33 on the New York Stock Exchange. It was the shares' highest closing price since January 2000. GM shares fell 10 cents to $36.34.

Some industry experts say DaimlerChrysler executives in Germany have given up on Chrysler and want to sell the U.S. division.

"So GM could end up getting a good deal here," Mr. Wolkonowicz said.

Chrysler has bounced between losses and profits since Daimler-Benz AG purchased the U.S. automaker in 1998.

Yet aside from a poor third quarter last year, Chrysler vehicles reported strong sales for much of 2005 and 2006.

"Nobody in Germany was saying [in 2005 and 2006] let's get rid of Chrysler while we lose all this money on Mercedes-Benz," said auto analyst Charlie Hughes, former head of North American operations for Land Rover and Mazda. "So now, all of a sudden, this isn't a good marriage?

"Attitudes have changed rather abruptly [at DaimlerChrysler], which tells me basically those were the underlying attitudes all the time."

GM also may be pursuing Chrysler simply to keep Chrysler out of the hands of competitors, some analysts say.

"GM is in an aggressive mood, quietly confident that they have a lot of their house in order," said Jim Sanfilippo, an analyst at Automotive Marketing Consultants in Bloomfield Hills, Mich. "Both of these companies are North American-based; there is a common work force."

Still, many industry experts say they are skeptical.

DOJ_NMG_0134243

Chrysler is cutting jobs and closing its Newark, Del., plant after a $1.5 billion loss last year. GM is reducing employment and shutting factories in North America after sales declines in the United States.

"GM isn't that flush with cash, so I don't know what they would bring to the party to buy [Chrysler] with," Mr. Hughes said.

Erich Merkle of IRN Inc., a Michigan automotive consulting firm, said GM has too many brands and plants to consider buying Chrysler.

GM "has got far too many plants that are underutilized," Mr. Merkle said. "They need to close their own plants."

Both companies have a "full plate" of issues they need to resolve, said David Healy, a Burnham Securities analyst in Sierra Vista, Ariz., who owns GM shares.

"I see no synergies at the corporate level" between GM and DaimlerChrysler," he said. "They have matching product lines and are trying to fix capacity and labor issues."

GM Reportedly In Talks With Daimler To Buy Chrysler Unit (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Shares of DaimlerChrysler climbed yesterday after media reports that General Motors was in talks to buy the German firm's Chrysler division.

Chrysler officials in Germany played down the reports, saying the primary focus now for Chrysler was a restructuring aimed at returning it to profitability. And U.S. industry executives struggled yesterday to assess how GM would benefit from an alliance with Chrysler. GM is in the process of shrinking its operations in an attempt to increase its profit.

Other potential Chrysler suitors include European or Asian carmakers seeking a bigger foothold in North America. Renault-Nissan Motor chief executive Carlos Ghosn, who unsuccessfully sought to enter into an alliance with General Motors last year, has said he is open to new partners. He has not, however, publicly expressed interest in Chrysler.

Adding Chrysler to his alliance could help Ghosn build up his clout in the United States, the world's largest and most profitable auto market. Another key player is China's Chery Automotive, which has been trying to establish a presence here over the past few years.

The trade publication Automotive News, echoing reports in the German media, cited unidentified sources say saying GM had entered into high-level talks to buy Chrysler. Other reports have said two companies were discussing the possibility of entering into a joint-development project to build sport-utility vehicles.

DaimlerChrysler's shares gained more than $9 this week, including $3.08 yesterday, to close at $73.33 on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares were up 4.4 percent yesterday and 14 percent for the week.

In a statement yesterday, GM said: "We are not going to comment on the speculation concerning discussions between DaimlerChrysler and GM related to Chrysler."

Some industry executives suggested that GM could be interested in one or more pieces of Chrysler, rather than trying to absorb the whole company. Already, GM and DaimlerChrysler collaborate on gas-electric hybrid systems for big trucks in a consortium that includes the German automaker BMW.

An industry executive said that buying all of Chrysler could give GM additional volume and allow it to remain the world's largest automaker. Toyota is on track to supplant GM at the top this year.

Under pressure from German shareholders, DaimlerChrysler Chairman Dieter Zetsche said Thursday that he was open to all options related to Chrysler's future, including a spinoff or a sale. DaimlerChrysler also announced a recovery plan for Chrysler that includes laying off 13,000 workers and slowing production at plants that produce pickups and minivans.

DaimlerChrysler officials have said they expect Chrysler to lose money in 2007 but to achieve a profit margin of 2.5 percent by 2008. Analysts say DaimlerChrysler's other divisions, including the Mercedes-Benz car group, would offset Chrysler's losses.

The reaction in German publications yesterday to a possible spinoff was summed up by the word befreiungsschlag, which means a kind of liberation.

Until now, a separation of the two automakers had been a taboo subject, particularly when DaimlerChrysler was controlled by Juergen E. Schrempp, its former chairman. Schrempp was the main force behind the merger. Analysts said that Zetsche has now opened the path to a separation. Zetsche spent five years in Auburn Hills, Mich., as chief executive of Chrysler, leading a campaign to improve profitability.

GM And DaimlerChrysler Cozy Up, But A Merger Would Be Tricky (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134244

Shares in DaimlerChrysler AG jumped to a seven-year high on renewed speculation that General Motors Corp. could buy the company's Chrysler Group unit, a further sign that a spinoff of Chrysler has strong backing among investors.

Several people familiar with the situation said it is unlikely GM would buy Chrysler, although one person with knowledge of the matter said such a deal has been touched on in recent discussions between the two auto makers.

Detroit, New York Abuzz

The rumors created a hullabaloo in Detroit and on Wall Street. Their variety -- touching on everything from acquisition theories to a possible production alliance -- speaks to the difficulty that Daimler may have in managing the process.

GM and Chrysler are discussing joining forces to develop a large sport-utility vehicle and possibly a small car made in Korea, several people familiar with the matter said, adding that a "production deal" is the most likely scenario.

On Wall Street, the focus also turned to Detroit's labor negotiations with the United Auto Workers. As so much of the industry's future is based around this contract, the issue presents a chicken-and-egg paradox for potential buyers.

Many people discounted the idea of a spinoff, saying that it would do little to fix Chrylser's main problems of cost structure and product appeal. That said, these people pointed out that what is best for the remaining Daimler side of the company may not be best for Chrysler's side.

DaimlerChrysler investors clearly favor the idea of selling Chrysler, long the smallest of Detroit's Big Three and now even smaller than Toyota Motor Corp. in the U.S. market.

On Friday, buyers snapped up DaimlerChrysler shares, pushing them up $3.08, or 4.4%, to $73.33 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading (see chart below with Abreast of the Market). The stock last closed above $73 on Jan. 19, 2000, about two years after the merger that created the German-American auto maker and only months before Chrysler's first major earnings breakdown.

GM investors were less enthusiastic. GM shares, which recently hit a 52-week high, closed at $36.34, down 10 cents in Big Board trading.

A deal linking GM, the world's largest auto maker, and Chrysler would likely face many hurdles, including antitrust questions, integration challenges and opposition from workers.

The head of the GM European Employee Forum, which represents GM workers in Europe, said Friday he doesn't believe GM would or should buy Chrysler. "Chrysler doesn't have the right products for the U.S. customer," Klaus Franz said in a telephone interview.

Billions Lost

DaimlerChrysler in the past week reported a 40% drop in fourth quarter earnings because of a $1.5 billion loss at Chrysler. GM has its own problems. After posting a $10.6 billion loss in 2005, GM lost $3 billion over the first nine months of last year as it booked restructuring charges.

Friday's speculation was sparked by a report in Automotive News that cited unnamed sources in Germany and the U.S. A similar article had been reported a day earlier by a German business magazine, Manager Magazin.

GM In Exploratory Talks With Chrysler (FT)

By John Reed In London, Richard Milne In Frankfurt And Bernard Simon In Toronto

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

General Motors is in exploratory talks with Chrysler after DaimlerChrysler, its German parent, this week said it might sell the struggling US unit.

Other potential suitors for Chrysler, including car companies and private equity groups, have also expressed preliminary interest, insiders told the Financial Times on Friday.

Daimler's US shares rose as much as 6.1 per cent as rumours of the talks emerged.

The Stuttgart-based German-US company made the approach to GM through its bankers after saying it was considering "all options" for Chrysler, which lost €1.1bn ($1.4bn) last year. "Yes, we are in talks," a GM insider told the FT. "They started on Wednesday."

The talks were preliminary, and it remained unclear whether they might result in an offer to buy Chrysler, joint ventures in specific areas, or any deal at all. "We are in a very early stage," the GM official said.

People close to Daimler said there had been "lots of conversations" with several carmakers since the announcement.

"Everyone you can imagine is going to kick the tyres here," said one.

The head of a US investment bank in Germany said a number of private equity firms were in discussion with DaimlerChrysler.

It has hired JPMorgan to advise it on its options. A person involved in the talks said no substantive discussions with any potential buyer had taken place but that a range of carmakers and private equity houses were likely to be interested.

Daimler declined to comment. However, there was a feeling at the company that it did not want to be rushed into anything, and wanted to study all options in detail, from an outright sale to a Chrysler spin-off.

GM said: "We do have discussions with other carmakers with issues of mutual interest, but we won't comment on any speculation of discussions."

GM, which this year is expected to be overtaken by Japan's Toyota as the world's biggest carmaker, last year explored then rejected the possibility of an alliance with Renault and Nissan.

Analysts expressed scepticism on Friday that GM's shareholders would support the idea of a tie-up with Chrysler, the most focused of Detroit's Big Three, at a time when both face declining sales in the world's biggest car market.

GM has not made a full car-company acquisition in its recent history, although, like other groups, it forms ad hoc alliances and joint ventures.

However, "if DaimlerChrysler really want to sell Chrysler, then Rick will have to examine what the potential advantage would be", the GM official said, referring to Rick Wagoner, chief executive.

Analysts Are Skeptical Of G.M.-Chrysler Merger (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

DETROIT, Feb. 16 —The willingness by DaimlerChrysler to cut loose its Chrysler Group, ending its nine-year trans-Atlantic partnership, is drawing cheers from investors.

Shares of the German company rose nearly 14.4 percent this week, capped by a climb on Friday that was fueled by speculation that General Motors and Chrysler were holding talks. DaimlerChrysler ended the week at $73.33, up $3.08.

The talk is doing little for G.M., however. Its shares rose less than 1 percent this week, closing Friday at $36.34, down 10 cents.

On Wednesday, DaimlerChrysler said it was keeping all its options open for Chrysler, refusing to rule out a sale or a strategic partner for its American unit.

That same day, the German magazine Manager reported that high-level talks were taking place about the possible purchase of Chrysler by G.M., a report echoed on Friday by news organizations including Automotive News.

Officials at G.M. and Chrysler refused to comment.

Senior automobile executives meet frequently to discuss issues of mutual interest, so any talks between G.M. and Chrysler would not be that unusual.

Three weeks ago, Ford's chairman, William Clay Ford Jr.; G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner; and Chrysler's chief executive, Thomas W. LaSorda, were all on hand for an Economic Club of Detroit luncheon, where the topic was the nation's health care problems.

But Wall Street analysts were skeptical of an outright sale of Chrysler to G.M.

"We see a deal as possible, but by no means certain," Jonathan Steinmetz, an automobile analyst with Morgan Stanley, said in a research report Friday.

Efraim Levy, an analyst with Standard & Poor's Equity Research, added: "We see no rationale for G.M. to purchase its struggling competitor." Mr. Levy reiterated on Friday his sell rating on G.M. shares.

Indeed, G.M. has plenty on its plate, an important reason it ultimately decided not to pursue a global alliance last year with Nissan of Japan and Renault of France, despite the urging of the billionaire Kirk Kerkorian, who was then G.M.'s largest shareholder.

The primary thing that Chrysler would bring G.M. is a return to its size 20 years ago, before it set out on a series of painful revampings that have eliminated more than 100,000 blue-collar jobs and led to the closing of more than three dozen factories.

G.M. ended 2006 with 24.3 percent of the American car market, while Chrysler held 13 percent.

So if it bought Chrysler outright, and kept all its operations intact, G.M. would again control over just a third of the American car market.

That would easily allow it to fend off a challenge from Toyota, which passed Chrysler last year to rank as the third-biggest player in the American car market, with 15.4 percent.

Toyota is on track this year to unseat Ford for the second spot, given that it is opening new factories as Ford is shutting them under its own reorganization plan.

But in recent months, G.M. said it was willing to give up several more points of market share to return to solid profits. Further job cuts and plant closings are scheduled to continue through 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0134246

Taking on Chrysler now would only take attention away from the task at hand, Mr. Levy said. "G.M. has little to gain and should not be distracted from its own turnaround plans," he wrote.

By contrast, Daimler investors are seeing long-awaited gains.

At Friday's close, DaimlerChrysler stock was within $1.20 of a 52-week high, prompting some analysts to predict it could be headed much higher, to levels rarely seen since the heady days after the 1998 merger.

That alone is reason enough to keep the rumors swirling a little longer, analysts said, giving DaimlerChrysler time to see whether any potential suitors come forward for Chrysler. It has hired JPMorgan as a strategic adviser.

Doubtless, there may be such suitors, Mr. Steinmetz said, if only out of curiosity. Automakers rarely get a chance to see internal data that become available when a company goes on the market.

Banco Bilbao To Expand U.S. Presence By Buying Compass Bancshares (NYT)

By Julia Werdigier

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 16 — Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria, Spain's second-largest bank, after Santander, agreed to buy Compass Bancshares of the United States for $9.6 billion, making its biggest acquisition abroad in a market where it seeks to strengthen its foothold.

Banco Bilbao, or BBVA, said Friday that Compass shareholders can choose to receive either $71.80 in cash or 2.8 new BBVA shares for each of their current Compass shares. The offer represents a premium of about 16 percent to the average Compass share price during the last 10 days and 8 percent above Friday's closing price.

Spain's banks have profited from significant growth in the Spanish economy and a sharp increase in mortgage lending, even to foreigners who are buying holiday homes in the country. BBVA, based in Bilbao, in northern Spain, and Banco Santander Central Hispano, the country's largest bank, have used their profits to expand into Latin America, where economic growth has spurred demand for banking services.

BBVA owns BBVA Bancomer, the largest bank in Mexico by assets, while Santander has spent a total of $17 billion on various Latin American acquisitions since 1996. Santander now owns Mexico's No. 3 bank, Serfin, and Brazil's seventh-largest lender, Banespa.

Last year, BBVA agreed to buy State National Bancshares and Texas Regional Bancshares for 2.1 billion euros. With the acquisition of Compass, based in Birmingham, Ala., BBVA will generate about 10 percent of its earnings in the United States. It will have 622 branches in Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Florida, New Mexico and Texas, holding a total of $47 billion of assets.

"Even though we can see the rationale behind expanding in the region, the price is very full," said Andy Lynch, who manages about 3 billion euros in European equities at Schroders in London. BBVA is paying about four times the book value of Compass and as much as 20 times its forecast 2007 earnings, according to Mr. Lynch.

Shares in BBVA dropped to 19.49 euros, down 2.4 percent, on the stock exchange in Madrid. The shares have risen 17 percent in the last year, giving it a market value of 69 billion euros ($90.6 billion).

Spain's banks have had strong growth. BBVA generated 1.8 billion euros in profit from Mexico and the United States in 2006 after building a franchise that taps the cross-border market among the Hispanic community in the United States. Santander, which paid £8.3 billion for Abbey National of Britain in 2004, said this month that higher revenue from Latin America helped raise fourth-quarter profit 13 percent.

Their growth and strong management have made Spain's banks a possible target for acquisitions by Europe's giant banks. But BBVA's acquisition of Compass may actually now make it less of a potential takeover target.

Francisco Gonzalo, BBVA's chairman, said last September that the bank received approaches from European and non-European rivals. BBVA's shares have gained after speculation that it could be of interest to the London-based HSBC Holdings or to Société Générale of France.

Mr. Gonzalo expansion plans were set back last year when he was outbid by BNP Paribas of France in an effort to buy the Italian lender BNL. The acquisition would have been BBVA's biggest since it paid 10.5 billion euros for Argentaria in 2000.

Spanish Banks Become Major Global Players (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

BBVA-Compass Deal Is Just the Latest; Target: U.S. Market

MADRID -- The Spaniards are coming, the Spaniards are coming -- and they want your deposits.

Spain's two main retail banks have moved from the bush leagues to become among the largest, most efficient, most profitable in the world. And one of them just made a big play to take on two U.S. giants in a lucrative American market.

DOJ_NMG_0134247

Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's agreement to buy Alabama-based Compass Bancshares Inc. for $9.6 billion, announced Friday, would give it hundreds of branches in the South and West, including 163 in Texas, a fast-growing market. That would pit Madrid-based BBVA against Bank of America Corp. and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., the Lone Star State's two biggest banks.

That deal follows Spain-based Banco Santander Central Hispano SA's acquisition last year of a 25% stake in Philadelphia-based Sovereign Bancorp, which has almost 800 branches in nine states.

BBVA was all bluster in announcing the deal. BBVA "is much more advanced than the Citis or the J.P. Morgans" at nuts-and-bolts retail banking, said Chairman and Chief Executive Francisco González.

The U.S. rivals are expected to put up a fight. "They're competing against some of our best retail banks," said Jefferson L. Harralson, a bank analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods. "It's going to be hard for them to move market share, and it's going to be hard for them keep market share."

The deal follows a string of acquisitions that have turned BBVA and Santander into the world's 15th-largest and ninth-largest banks respectively by stock-market value. Both reported record full-year profits this month.

Santander increased its assets eightfold over the past decade, thanks to massive expansion in Latin America and the United Kingdom. Despite the growth, the bank has boosted its return on equity, a key profitability measure, to about 21%, up from about 14% in 1996. BBVA is slightly smaller but even more profitable, with a return on equity of about 24%. On that score, both Spanish banks outperform Citigroup Inc., Bank of America and HSBC Holdings PLC, the big British bank.

Shares in BBVA and Santander have trailed their more sedate peers because the market expects them to keep making pricey acquisitions. The Compass deal sent BBVA's stock on Friday down 2.4% in Madrid and its American depositary shares down 2.5% on the New York Stock Exchange. Compass shares rallied 6.5% on the Nasdaq Stock Market (see chart on page B3).

The Compass purchase was BBVA's biggest ever, and Mr. González says he wants it to be one of the world's biggest banks by the end of 2008. Santander swore off acquisitions after the Sovereign deal, but it stoked deal fears anew this month by taking a 2% stake in Capitalia SpA, Italy's No. 3 lender.

The Spanish banks' efficiency stems from stiff home-market competition. To survive, they overhauled their businesses. Both invested heavily in new computer systems in the early 1990s that are just now being fully implemented. The new systems offer advantages over the traditional databases that scatter information on customers into various business "silos."

That helps BBVA and Santander sell more products to each customer than European and U.S. peers. BBVA sells almost five products to each customer, compared with about three products per customer at Compass.

As a result, for every €100, or about $130, of income, BBVA and Santander spend €43 and €48, respectively -- compared with €50 at HSBC and €55 for Compass, considered one of the Sunbelt's best-run banks. Both banks also have invested heavily in other areas, especially risk management. Both have impressive nonperforming-loan rates of less than 1%, even including their Latin American operations.

BBVA is using its computer system to change banking in Mexico, where it has attracted four million customers in the past two years. Recovering from the economic shocks of the 1990s, banking services there are trickling down to the broader population. BBVA has two million low-income "virtual" Mexican customers who deposit paychecks and spend money via credit accounts. Maintenance costs for such accounts are low, widening profit margins.

The bank originally entered the U.S. with acquisitions of Valley Bank, Laredo National Bancshares and Texas National Bancshares over the past two years, hoping to funnel money from Mexican immigrants in the U.S. to relatives' BBVA accounts in Mexico.

Now Mr. González wants to expand to more affluent American customers in Texas. The state has no major hometown player, making it one of the most competitive markets in the country. Several banks are buying and building branches there, including Capital One Financial Corp., of McLean, Va.; Wachovia Corp., of Charlotte, N.C.; and Washington Mutual Inc., of Seattle.

BBVA has taken on considerable risk with the Compass deal, which was put together by BBVA's advisers at Morgan Stanley, its lawyers at Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP, Compass's advisers at Sandler O'Neill & Partners, and its lawyers at Balch & Bingham and Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. The deal increases BBVA's exposure to dollar earnings, which could fall against the euro, the bank's home currency. Mr. González says it is a long-term play.

"If we can successfully introduce our model there, we will have reached an enormous milestone," he says.

BBVA Expands In US With $9.6bn Deal (FT)

By Mark Mulligan In Madrid

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

BBVA, Spain's second-largest bank, on Friday stepped up its push into the US by unveiling an agreed $9.6bn (€7.3bn) acquisition of Compass Bancshares, a franchise covering six states.

News of the deal drew a cool reception from investors, who drove BBVA shares down 5 per cent in early trading. However, by the close on the Madrid stock exchange they had recovered ground, and finished down 2.7 per cent at €19.49.

Analysts voiced concerns about the dilutive effect of the planned €4bn capital increase to part-fund the deal, which comes just three months after a €3bn share issue aimed at improving the balance sheet.

There were also worries about the erosion of BBVA's core capital ratios. "History shows investors should be wary of acquisitive companies," UBS said.

However, Standard & Poor's affirmed the bank's credit ratings, highlighting BBVA's "healthy asset quality, conservative risk management and a benign economic environment in most markets".

Shareholders in the US retail bank, which is present in Alabama, New Mexico, Arizona, Florida, Colorado and Texas, will be offered 2.8 American Depositary Shares of BBVA per Compass share, or $71.82 in cash.

The Spanish bank said the offer represented a 16 per cent premium over Compass's average trading price over the past 10 days. It will finance the purchase through the capital increase, supplemented with the proceeds of planned asset sales. Among these is the disposal of its 5 per cent stake in Iberdrola, Spain's second-largest power group.

BBVA, described the deal as a "decisive step" in its US campaign, which until now has involved the purchase of small banking franchises in Texas.

In 2005 it paid $850m for Laredo National Bancshares and last year acquired State National Bancshares and Texas Regional Bancshares for $2.7bn.

Although its strategy was built on linking Mexican immigrants in Texas with its Bancomer operation in Mexico, chief executive Francisco González said on Friday BBVA saw scope for exporting the "universal" Spanish banking model to the US. "When it comes to offering full financial services, we are ahead of the pack, compared with our American peers," he told the FT.

With $34.2bn in assets, 417 branches and profits last year of $460m, Compass is by far BBVA's most important US – and global – purchase to date. The deal confirms its growing frustration with Europe, where in 2005 it abandoned plans to buy Banca Nazionale de Lavoro of Italy.

Newspapers Tribune Moves Closer To A Corporate Rewrite (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

As the auction for Tribune Co. limps to a close, it is becoming clear that newspaper publishers can't sell their way out of their current woes.

Tribune's board of directors is scheduled to meet late this coming week, and while it is uncertain they will emerge from the meeting with an announcement, company management and advisers are casting aside outside offers and working on what is being billed as a "self-help" plan.

That is another way of saying that nobody came to Tribune's rescue.

Typically, if a company avoids a takeover, employees and management breathe a sigh of relief and go back to business as usual. But if this auction ends as many expect, Tribune will have to self-inflict the kinds of harsh changes that normally come from an outside buyer. That will mean even steeper cost cutting and asset sales.

That is partly because Tribune, along with many other newspaper players, waited too long to take the dramatic action that now is being thrust upon them. Tribune was forced into the auction process by its largest shareholder, the Chandler family, which pushed for action just as panic was building about the industry's prospects. The irony is that the Chandlers were too late. They are angling to remove themselves from the newspaper business they should have gotten out of years ago, when they sold Times Mirror Co. to Tribune in 2000. Today, the options are much more limited.

John Rogers, chairman and chief executive of Ariel Capital Management, one of Tribune's biggest holders, says the market's fear of newspaper companies is a result of "group think."

"We may be looking back on things in the long term and say that this was the bottom of the cycle," he says. By that rationale, it is a good time to buy into the industry. But timing the comeback of the industry is a risky bet, and one that few investors are willing to take.

Under the current plan, at least Tribune's fate is all in the Chicago family. Sam Zell, a Windy City real-estate mogul, and the Chandlers are still circling Tribune, though any chance of either party making a successful offer is unlikely. Tribune isn't comfortable with either proposal being proffered, and neither party seems willing to increase the terms.

Under the structure being considered, the company would spin off its television stations and pay out a dividend to its shareholders. Then, one possibility is that the McCormick Tribune Foundation -- Tribune's second-largest shareholder behind the Chandler family -- would help buy out part of the Chandlers' stake in the company.

That would solve two problems for Tribune. It would reduce the Chandlers' influence -- possibly booting them off the board -- and increase control for the management-friendly foundation, which is controlled by two former Tribune executives. The three other foundation board members are current Tribune executives who have recused themselves from decision making while the sale process is under way.

The foundation is adamant that it acts independently from the company. But in the past 50 years, the foundation has had only 20 directors, all of whom have been current or former Tribune officials. Foundation offices sit just floors away from Tribune management in Chicago's Tribune Tower.

It is hard to see how buying up more newspaper stock is good for the McCormick Tribune Foundation. If most shareholders are trying to get out of the newspaper business, why wouldn't the McCormick Tribune Foundation want the same?

Vt., N.H. Ski Areas To Be Sold (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 17, 2007

Missouri's Peak Resorts to pay $73.5 million for Mount Snow, Attitash

Two New England ski resorts, Mount Snow in Vermont and Attitash in New Hampshire, are set to be sold for $73.5 million.

American Skiing Co. of Utah said yesterday it has entered into an accord to sell Mount Snow and Attitash to Peak Resorts Inc. of Missouri.

Included in the proposed sale of Mount Snow and Attitash are the commercial cores of the Grand Summit Hotels at both locations, said American Skiing, which added that the buyer will assume $2 million in debt and other liabilities.

Saying that the sale is expected to close on or before April 30, American Skiing said it plans to use the proceeds to reduce existing debt and for working capital.

The deal will give Eureka, Mo.-based Peak Resorts its first major ski areas. That company operates half a dozen tiny ski areas in Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, and New Hampshire.

The sale will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah.

American Skiing already has agreed to sell Colorado's Steamboat Springs resort to Canadian resort operator Intrawest Corp. for $265 million. David Hirasawa, the company's investor-relations manager, said Steamboat is expected to change hands by March.

American Skiing has been investing heavily in The Canyons, its flagship 3,700-acre resort in Park City, which added terrain and lifts this winter. It also owns Killington and Pico, neighbors in central Vermont, and Maine's Sunday River and Sugarloaf/USA.

The company said Mount Snow, the closest major Vermont resort to the New York City metro area, is the fifth most popular eastern US ski area. It has an 18-hole golf course.

Attitash is a smaller, 280-acre ski hill in the heart of New Hampshire's Mount Washington Valley. It has a water park and alpine slide.

Both resorts sit partly on national forest land, and the sale will require the consent of the US Forest Service. Stockholder approval also will be required.

Hirasawa said the sale also is subject to an antitrust review by the US Justice Department.

Executives at Peak Resorts Inc. didn't immediately return a phone message seeking comment.

Vermont Resort Sold To Missouri Company (AP)

SALT LAKE CITY -- American Skiing Co. said Friday it agreed to sell Vermont's Mount Snow and New Hampshire's Attitash ski areas to Peak Resorts Inc. of Missouri.

American Skiing will sell the two resorts along with Grand Summit Hotels at both locations for $73.5 million, said David Hirasawa, the company's investor-relations manager.

Peak Resorts also will assume $2 million in debt and other liabilities at Mount Snow and Attitash, the company said.

The company planned to keep the management team at Mount Snow but had not made decisions about other staffing, said Tim Boyd, Peak's chief executive officer.

Interior Ethics Lapses Rarely Punished (BOS)

By John Donnelly, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 17, 2007

IG: Royalty loss could cost US tens of billions

WASHINGTON -- Officials at the US Interior Department received free golf outings, dinners, hunting trips, and box seats at sporting events from companies they monitored, but were rarely punished for the ethics violations, other than being ordered to attend two-hour ethics courses, the department's inspector general told a House panel yesterday.

Testifying before the House Natural Resources Committee, Earl E. Devaney said the ethical lapses were part of a department-wide culture "replete with a lack of accountability."

Devaney, who for seven years has been the independent overseer of a department that manages oil leases, national parks, and Native American affairs, has been in charge of numerous investigations inside the Interior Department, including one probe that has drawn intense scrutiny: What was behind the omission of royalty payments to the government in oil and gas contracts from 1998 to 1999.

He said the loss of the payments, which kick in when oil and gas prices reached certain levels, could cost taxpayers "tens of billions of dollars" over the lifetime of the contracts. Six criminal investigations were now under way by the Justice Department relating to unethical behavior in the department, Devaney said.

Asked why the Interior Department has had so many ethical and management problems, Devaney suggested it was simply greed.

"Outside of the money at the Treasury Department, everything else [of value] that someone would want is at Interior -- oil, gas, mines, land, and water," he said. "It's been my experience that when a lot of money is at stake, bad people will show up eventually."

Still, he told the committee that "99.9 percent" of department employees were dedicated and ethical and that Dirk A. Kempthorne , the current department secretary, has in the past year tried to tackle a multitude of serious problems.

"In fairness to him, I have discerned a dramatic shift in attitude since his arrival," Devaney said.

Shane Wolfe , a department spokesman, said he was "heartened" by Devaney's statements noting the change at the department. "There is, of course, room for improvement in any organization," Wolfe added, "and we welcome the work of the inspector general in highlighting the areas that may need improvement."

Congress and Devaney's office have been investigating the broader issue of whether the Interior Department has been properly collecting money from its oil and gas contracts with energy companies. The New York Times first reported the omission of royalty payments during the late 1990s; Devaney said yesterday that he believed Kempthorne first learned of the omissions because of the Times story.

Devaney, 59, said the department's problems were deep and wide, including ineffective law enforcement , notably in Native American detention facilities; inadequate protection of some national parks' resources; a failure to follow funding and procurement laws; and an unethically cozy relationship among senior officials and companies seeking government contracts.

He also said that the Minerals Management Service rarely audited its major contracts and that the organization never reviewed the smaller ones even though they totaled millions of dollars.

"Throughout the department, the appearance of preferential treatment in awarding contracts and procurements has come to our attention far too frequently, and the failure of department officials to remain at arm ' s length from prohibited sources is pervasive," said Devaney, a Boston native who was a police officer in Dennis, Mass., in the late 1960s.

He said senior officials caught in ethical lapses were treated more leniently than junior employees. From 2003 to 2006, he said, his investigators identified 71 employees whose actions triggered ethics probes. The vast majority of those penalized were low- to mid-ranking employees.

Of the 21 senior officials whose ethical behavior was reviewed, more than half were not disciplined, Devaney said. The remainder received a reprimand that often involved a two-hour course on ethics, a transfer, or the option to resign, he said.

Representative Edward J. Markey , a Massachusetts Democrat and a member of the committee, said the findings shows "an upside-down system that punishes junior employees while rewarding or giving a pass to senior officials who have been responsible for horrendous errors in judgment, potentially criminal activities, and the loss of billions in taxpayer revenues."

Robin M. Nazzaro , director of the Government Accountability Office's Natural Resources and Environmental department , told the House panel that the royalty mismanagement could cost taxpayers as much as $10 billion for 576 active leases granted during 1998 and 1999 under the Clinton administration. Another $60 billion in royalties could be at risk because of a lawsuit filed by an oil company challenging the government's right to charge it royalties, she said.

Nazzaro also identified a separate set of problems in addition to Devaney's investigations, including the Interior Department's poor strategy in dealing with the growing number of wildfires, its inadequate land appraisals that have led to the "loss of millions" of dollars, and its failure to collect fees from tourist operations in at least three national parks.

But the committee seemed most interested in the loss of billions of dollars in oil and gas royalty contracts in the late 1990s that inadvertently allowed companies to avoid payments. Devaney characterized it as a mistake; he said he found no criminal intent.

Representative Steve Pearce , a Republican from New Mexico, countered that it must have been a "deliberate omission" and called Devaney's report a "great disservice." Devaney said he stood by the accuracy of his report.

Six companies have agreed to pay royalties on the leases for production . But 50 other companies have refused to sign any agreement, contending that the US government is legally bound to the contract.

In Energy Conservation, Calif. Sees Light (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Progressive Policy Makes It a Model in Global Warming Fight

At the height of the 1973 energy crisis, Arthur H. Rosenfeld had a revelation.

Disturbed about having to spend half an hour in line at a gas station one Friday night, the particle physicist calculated that keeping his floor of offices brightly lit all weekend as usual would consume the equivalent of five gallons of gasoline. So Rosenfeld took what then seemed like a bold step: He turned off the lights.

For 30 years, Rosenfeld has been one of the forces guiding California on a mission of conservation. And today the state uses less energy per capita than any other state in the country, defying the international image of American energy gluttony. Since 1974, California has held its per capita energy consumption essentially constant, while energy use per person for the United States overall has jumped 50 percent.

California has managed that feat through a mixture of mandates, regulations and high prices. The state has been able to cut greenhouse-gas emissions, keep utility companies happy and maintain economic growth. And in the wake of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change report on global warming, California serves as a model for other states seeking a similar path to energy reduction. Now California is pushing further in its effort to cut automobile pollution, spur use of solar energy and cap greenhouse gases.

"California really represents what the rest of the country could do if it paid a bit more attention to energy efficiency," says Greg Kats, managing principal at Capital E, an energy and clean-technology advisory firm. "California is the best argument we have about how to very cost-effectively both reduce energy consumption and cut greenhouse gases. And they've made money doing it." Kats estimates that the average Californian family spends about $800 a year less on energy than it would have without efficiency improvements over the past 20 years.

Today, as an energy consumer, California is more like thrifty Denmark than the rest of the energy-guzzling United States. While the average American burns 12,000 kilowatt-hours a year of electricity, the average Californian burns less than 7,000 -- and that's counting renewable energy sources.

California has managed to cut its contributions to global warming, too. Carbon dioxide emissions per capita in California have fallen by 30 percent since 1975, while U.S. per capita carbon dioxide emissions have remained essentially level.

"If we're going to delay global warming, what we can do in a big hurry is energy efficiency: better cars, better buildings, better industry," says Rosenfeld, who is now a member of the California Energy Commission and who last year won the Energy Department's $375,000 Enrico Fermi Award for his contributions to national energy efficiency. "It's not the whole story. But I think it's at least half the story."

California does have natural advantages. The climate is mild in much of the state, and its high-tech and service sectors are less energy-intensive than older, heavy industry in some other states. However, even accounting for those differences, California has vastly improved its energy efficiency. The growing population and economy are still driving up electricity demand about 1 percent a year, enough to require a new power-generating station every couple of years. But if the state had not changed its pre-1974 trend of electricity consumption, by today it would have needed the equivalent of one nuclear plant every eight miles between San Diego and San Francisco, Rosenfeld says.

The reason for California's success is no secret: Electricity there is expensive, so people use less of it. Thanks to its use of pricey renewables and natural gas and its spurning of cheap coal, California's rates are almost 13 cents a kilowatt hour, according to the Energy Information Administration. The other most-energy-frugal states, such as New Jersey and New Hampshire, charge about 12 cents and 14 cents a kilowatt hour, respectively. Hawaii, which relies on oil-fired plants, tops EIA's list at about 21 cents.

"If the history of energy consumption in the U.S. has taught us anything, it is that cost drives conservation," says Chris Cooper, executive director of the Network for New Energy Choices.

Three of the nation's most profligate users of energy -- Wyoming, Kentucky and Alabama -- have one thing in common: low prices. Their electricity prices range from 5.25 cents a kilowatt hour to 7.06 cents, according to the EIA.

"What's dirt cheap tends to get treated like dirt," Rosenfeld says.

The District, also a wasteful user of energy, has a rate of 10.70 cents a kilowatt hour, only after recent rate increases. Virginia charges average 6.78 cents, and Maryland is at 10.03 cents.

Besides high prices, California has long-standing mandates. In 1974, the state enacted its first building standards for energy efficiency.

In 1976, the governor, Jerry Brown, was looking for a way to make good on his pledge to stop the construction of the proposed one gigawatt Sundesert nuclear plant in Southern California. The answer turned out to be refrigerators -- more efficient refrigerators.

Brown learned, in a meeting with Rosenfeld, who by that time had turned his full attention toward promoting energy efficiency, that California's refrigerators were using the equivalent of five Sundesert plants. A modest improvement in their efficiency would more than offset the need for new power plants, Rosenfeld told him. So the state adopted stringent appliance standards -- before the federal government did -- and staved off construction of the Sundesert plant. The change in California's refrigerators has saved energy equal to all the hydroelectric power produced nationwide, Rosenfeld says.

Next, California adopted an innovative approach to utility regulation called decoupling so that the utilities' profits were no longer linked to simply increasing sales.

Before then, electric utilities made more money when people bought more electricity. So a Midwest utility gave away energy guzzling light bulbs; in California and elsewhere, electric utilities promoted electric stoves or electric water heaters, appliances that run more cleanly and efficiently on natural gas. In December 1973, Rosenfeld had called Pacific Gas & Electric to challenge a newspaper ad the utility was running that said: "Don't mess with the thermostat. You'll use more gas heating your house in the morning than you'll save overnight." Rosenfeld asked the company's research head if he kept his coffee on the stove all night to avoid reheating it in the morning.

In 1982, the state Public Utilities Commission came up with the decoupling idea that would allow utility profits to grow while sales declined. It set separate targets for utility revenue and electricity usage; excess revenue would be returned to consumers; a shortfall in revenue would be added to the next year's consumer bills. Greater efficiency could boost profit margins. Rates are now reviewed every six to 12 months instead of every three years. (A similar approach for natural gas utilities had been adopted in 1978.)

The power companies quickly altered their focus. Now, Rosenfeld says, the state and the utilities spend $700 million a year to promote energy efficiency. "It's cheaper than building power plants," he says. At the moment, the program has expired but is up for renewal.

California remains the only state to have adopted decoupling, though proposals are pending in seven states.

"There's an element of stability of revenues that is very attractive," said Steve Kline, a vice president at Pacific Gas & Electric. "We don't have those huge swings that other companies do if there is an incredibly cold or hot winter." And that, he added, "is viewed favorably in the financial community."

Some utilities that favor decoupling are getting support from their traditional foes: environmentalists. Ralph Cavanagh, senior attorney for the Natural Resources Defense Council in California, has filed written testimony on behalf of Idaho Power Co., which is asking that state's Public Utilities Commission to implement the practice.

"We have to break the link between their financial health and their electricity and natural gas sales," says Cavanagh. "If their financial health is tied to increasing sales, they're unlikely to be efficiency partners."

Energy-efficiency targets are also built into California's solar promotion program. To qualify for a $2,000 rebate, homeowners must show that their homes beat building standards for energy efficiency by 15 percent or more. Often, a change in the color of a home's roof from black to white can save as much electricity as the new solar panels generate, Rosenfeld says.

Many of these techniques grow out of work Rosenfeld did at the Center for Building Science at the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory, which he founded in 1975. Over 20 years, the lab developed a variety of energy-efficiency technologies, including electronic ballasts that led to compact fluorescent lamps and a coating for glass that allows light in but blocks heat from either entering (during summer) or escaping (during winter).

But much of the motivation remains economic. The state's disastrous experiment in electricity deregulation -- deregulating supplies while capping retail prices -- led to a supply crisis and rolling blackouts in 2001. Soon, prices rose; PG&E sought bankruptcy protection.

Many manufacturers complain that the high electricity prices make the state an unappealing place to do business. Since 2001, California has lost 375,000 manufacturing jobs, a 19.9 percent drop that slightly exceeded the nationwide decline of 17 percent. Some firms -- such as Buck Knives, with 250 jobs, or bottle manufacturer Bomatic, with 100 jobs -- moved to states such as Idaho or Utah, where they said expenses, including energy, were lower.

Gino DiCaro, a spokesman for the California Manufacturers and Technology Association, says manufacturing investment is also "stalled" because of uncertainty about how the new legislation authorizing limits on greenhouse gases will affect energy costs.

"We've lost a lot of manufacturing jobs and we can't replace them," says DiCaro. While it's hard to blame the state's high energy costs alone, he says, "we know that . . . energy is one of the largest portions of a manufacturer's operating budget."

But for those homeowners and businesses staying in California, the high prices have provided a big incentive for greater efficiency.

Laura Scher, chief executive of Working Assets, a wireless, long distance and credit card company that donates part of its revenue to socially progressive organizations, said she checked her home's meter every week during the electricity crisis in the summer of 2001 and unplugged her family's second refrigerator. "Part of it is our prices got really high," she said. But she added that California's habits go back much further. "It's sort of a culture to be an energy conserver here," she said.

The Future Of Farming (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Six months ago, it was an even bet whether there would be a new farm bill in 2007. The big commodity farmers, and the interest groups that represent them, were hoping that Congress would simply extend the 2002 Farm Bill, a regressive grab bag for big agriculture. These hopes have now been disappointed. Mike Johanns, the secretary of agriculture, has unveiled his proposals for a new farm bill, which on the whole seems remarkably promising.

Mr. Johanns seems to have little desire to protect entrenched subsidies and a very strong desire to improve the environment. The question is whether Congress will listen to him or to the lobbyists.

The problems with the current farm subsidy system are legion. At home, it drives small farmers out of business and compromises the environment. Abroad, it penalizes third-world farmers and jeopardizes international trade talks.

Mr. Johanns aims to change much of that, first by ending payments to farmers with an adjusted gross income above $200,000. There will also be money for small farmers and growers of specialty crops, loans and grants to poor rural communities and help for young farmers who want to get started in an industry that has grown gray with age.

The bill also calls for $7.8 billion over 10 years to help protect the environment — which makes it the most generous conservation program the Bush administration has offered in the last six years. The bill would make it easier for farmers to enroll in conservation programs and protect conservation acreage from the urge to plow it up when prices skyrocket. The bill could also turn out to be one of the administration's more innovative energy initiatives. Implicitly recognizing that corn ethanol needs no more subsidies, it offers incentives to grow grasses that could be turned into another fuel called cellulosic ethanol.

There is much to applaud in this bill. Then again, there was much to like about the last farm bill, and we know what happened to that. Congress left many of the old subsidies intact, and failed to nourish the conservation programs. We are hoping the new Congress will have the good sense to reverse the policies that have done so much damage to rural America, and in doing so offer hope to its small farmers.

Stronger CAFE (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Competing bills to increase auto fuel standards are gaining traction, although some are better than others.

REPUBLICAN SEN. Ted Stevens' resistance to fighting climate change is melting faster than his home state's glaciers. The senior senator from Alaska proposed a bill last month aimed at raising automotive fuel economy standards, in some ways higher than a competing bill backed by such traditional environmentalists as Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.)

Stevens' about-face on fuel economy (he voted against a bill two years ago similar to the one he just introduced) is welcome, even if many of his proposal's details aren't. Across-the-aisle initiatives like his are part of the reason this Congress stands a good chance of making the most meaningful improvements to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards since they were created during the last fuel crisis in the 1970s.

There are several competing fuel economy packages percolating in Congress. Stevens' bill is the least helpful; it calls for a 40 miles per gallon minimum for all passenger cars by 2017 — higher even than the plan by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) — but it doesn't apply to pickups and SUVs, which are most in need of improvement. It also overreaches by creating a sweeping national trading system for greenhouse gas emissions.

Feinstein's bill, backed by Boxer, calls for automakers' entire fleets to average 35 mpg by 2019 (the current standard is 27.5 mpg for cars, 22.2 for pickups and SUVs, based on the averages of each vehicle sold). Feinstein's bill would do away with the separate light truck standard, which no longer makes sense. Pickups and SUVs were given a pass in the 1970s because at the time they were mostly commercial vehicles and relatively scarce; now that SUVs are commonplace passenger vehicles, there's no reason to give them special breaks.

Improving fuel economy would both reduce the carbon emissions that are warming the globe and lessen U.S. reliance on foreign oil. But would it prove financially unfeasible for Detroit? That's hard to predict, though a University of Michigan study last fall argued that improving fuel economy would actually boost automakers' financial health.

Such conclusions are highly speculative, but it doesn't take a PhD to see that Japanese automakers are growing U.S. market share while their American competitors shrink, at least partly because Japanese cars get better mileage. Japanese automakers would suffer less than Detroit because their lineups already tend not to be as heavily focused on gas guzzlers.

Of the bills on the table, Feinstein's looks to be the most sensible. But any of them would be better than the toothless mandate proposed last month by President Bush in his State of the Union address. Congress is giving Bush's CAFE proposals the attention they deserve: none at all.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI: No Role In Staging March (ORS)

By Henry Pierson Curtis, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, February 17, 2007

But use of informant at neo-Nazi rally doesn't surprise some

The FBI played no role in staging a neo-Nazi rally last year in Orlando, a statement released Friday says.

Questions about the bureau's possible involvement were raised earlier this week when a hearing in federal court disclosed that a paid FBI informant and member of the National Socialist Movement organized the white supremacist march.

"In no way did the FBI initiate, organize, or sponsor the NSM rally," the statement from the agency's Orlando office says.

The Orlando march, through a predominantly black neighborhood last February, came just months after neo-Nazi marches in Toledo, Ohio, erupted into violence.

The identity of the informant and march organizer, David Gletty of Orlando, came out in a hearing Wednesday concerning the arrests of two white supremacists charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

The suspects were arrested by the FBI with the help of Gletty, 39, who wore a recording device when he agreed to help John Rock, 35, and Tom Martin, 23, impersonate police officers in a scheme to rob black drug dealers, according to testimony.

Rock and Martin remain held without bail in the Seminole County Jail.

DOJ_NMG_0134255

Word that there was an FBI informant at the Orlando march came as no surprise to neo-Nazis, the ACLU or anyone involved with law enforcement.

Many agencies use informants, and in its statement Friday, the FBI explained some of the benefits.

"By the nature of its investigative mission, the FBI . . . must aggressively pursue intelligence avenues that bring it into contact with individuals and/or organizations in unsavory and/or illegal activity," the statement says.

In fact, snitches are so common in the underworld and fringe political movements that almost everyone is suspect.

"If someone starts talking about building bombs, we know right away they're a government agent or an idiot. We don't want either," said Jeff Schoep, head of the National Socialist Movement, in a telephone call from headquarters in Minneapolis. "We have a strict policy with our members to remain 100 percent legal."

Glen Katron, a spokesman for the American Civil Liberties Union's Orlando office, said it would have objected to the FBI's involvement only had the agency tried to restrict the marchers' constitutional rights.

Quite simply, observers say, the world of cops and robbers revolves around often dangerous characters willing to sell out their friends, family and enemies.

"It's kind of a delicate balance," said Boston College Law School Professor Robert M. Bloom. "How much do you allow an informant to do certain things?"

Law enforcement agencies often help informants avoid jail time on minor or nonviolent crimes in return for making cases against more dangerous criminals, Bloom said.

That type of arrangement came out in federal court Wednesday when an FBI agent detailed the bureau's work with its informant, who a defense lawyer identified as Gletty.

FBI Agent Kevin Farrington and Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Bodnar did not name their informant during that hearing.

But without naming him, Farrington testified under cross-examination that Gletty had been picked up in Alabama last year on a charge of impersonating a police officer. That charge was dropped after Alabama authorities contacted the FBI, even though the FBI did not request special treatment, Farrington said.

Gletty could not be reached for comment Friday.

The FBI has a long history of using informants and occasionally getting burned by them.

One of the most notorious examples was James "Whitey" Bulger, still on the 10 Most-Wanted List in connection with 18 murders alleged to have been committed while Bulger was working as an FBI informant in Boston.

"The costs outweighed the benefits," in that case, Bloom said.

Law enforcement agencies in Orange County spend more than $100,000 a year to buy information, primarily in drug cases, according to interviews Friday.

"All the good stories you get about busts going down are based on informants," said Bill Lutz, head of the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, which has used 1,100 informants since 1978.

"Here's the problem: As one of our lawyers once said, 'In order to catch fish you've got to use stinky bait.' They're the bait that allows us to catch the bigger fish."

Legal Sideshow, Not Home Run Hoopla, Follows Bonds (NYT)

By Murray Chass

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

When Babe Ruth broke Roger Connor's career home run record, no one paid much attention. Connor had hit 138 home runs in the 1880s and 1890s, and Ruth passed him in 1921 with little or no fanfare. Much was made of Henry Aaron eclipsing Ruth's record in 1974, but even then probably the most notable thing that happened was that Aaron shoved a box of strawberries in a reporter's face.

But Barry Bonds's threat to Aaron's record of 755 couldn't generate more of a sideshow.

Bonds's pursuit of the record — he needs 22 home runs to break it — is entwined with the issue of steroids. Did he or did he not use them to slug 213 home runs in a four-season span from 2000 through 2003? Or did he just use a good grade of flaxseed oil?

One act of the sideshow was written out of the script when Bonds signed his $15.8 million contract for the 2007 season the other day, 10 weeks after he and the Giants agreed to its terms and two weeks after he first signed it.

A second version of the contract became necessary when the commissioner's office struck an appearance clause from the original version. Bonds became upset by another clause in the contract after it leaked out. That clause says the Giants can void the contract if Bonds is indicted.

Any indictment would be put together by the United States attorney's office in San Francisco, which has a new interim head, Scott N. Schools, who replaced Kevin V. Ryan. Schools is a career federal prosecutor who previously served as a general counsel in the Justice Department. For now, he will run a San Francisco office that was apparently divided last summer over whether to push right then and there for an indictment of Bonds.

The term of the federal grand jury that was meeting at that point was about to expire, and lawyers involved in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid-distribution case say there was a split among assistant United States attorneys about seeking an indictment before that jury was dismissed. The lawyers said their understanding was that Ryan decided not to go forward.

Luke Macaulay, the spokesman for the San Francisco office, said Ryan would not comment. Jeffrey Nedrow and Matthew Parrella, assistant United States attorneys in that office who have been involved in the Balco case, declined to comment on the issue of division in the office. Attempts to interview Schools through requests submitted to the public affairs office of the Justice Department and to Macaulay were unsuccessful.

But a federal law enforcement official with knowledge of the San Francisco office, who was not authorized to speak publicly on the matter, did not dispute the notion that an indictment was debated last summer. In addition, Major League Baseball officials said they were told there was at least some sentiment within Ryan's staff to indict Bonds, but that Ryan was not ready to do so.

Michael Rains, a lawyer for Bonds, said he was given the same information.

"It was Ryan who had to pull back," Rains said, "because they didn't have the evidence and they made the decision to try and get additional evidence from Greg Anderson."

Anderson, Bonds's former trainer, has been jailed three times in connection with the Balco case. He served three months after pleading guilty to steroids distribution, and he is now in his second prison term for refusing to testify before grand juries seeking to determine if Bonds lied under oath about steroids use.

Anderson served 57 days on a civil-contempt charge last year and has been in prison for three months, since last Nov. 20, on another contempt charge. This sentence could run for another year, until the term of the current grand jury expires.

Based on Anderson's continued incarceration, the perception is that Ryan felt Anderson's testimony was essential to building a solid case that Bonds perjured himself before the initial grand jury.

Ryan, however, is gone, and it's not known how Schools will view the case.

Will he find that the case against Bonds is strong enough to proceed without Anderson? Will he keep Anderson in jail, hoping he will end his silence? Or will he abandon any effort to indict Bonds?

Asked how the office might proceed, Parrella said: "Without addressing the issue of whether there's a case or a grand jury investigation, typically the new U. S. attorney is the person who ultimately makes decisions on cases."

Mark Geragos, Anderson's lawyer, offered his own idea.

"Any reasonable, rational person at this point would realize that Greg Anderson isn't going to talk," Geragos said in a telephone interview. "Keeping him in there is punitive. They should take a page from the administration letting Ryan go. They should let Greg go."

Bonds also faces possible charges of money laundering, income-tax evasion and violation of banking laws, but Rains said: "This has never had the footprints of a tax case. This has always been about trying to nail Barry for perjury."

Anderson's willingness to remain in jail has prompted speculation that Bonds will take care of him financially. "There's no truth to that," said Geragos, adding that anyone who said that would be accusing Bonds of obstruction of justice.

The grand jury that is sitting in San Francisco, with its term expected to end next February, is the third in the Balco/Bonds investigation. The Bonds indictment debate would have come toward the end of the second grand jury's term last July.

A debate on whether to indict is not uncommon in a United States attorney's office, said Jerry Johnson, who as the United States attorney in Pittsburgh prosecuted the baseball cocaine cases in 1985.

"That kind of thing happens in U. S. attorneys' offices," he said in a telephone interview earlier this week. Then he explained the philosophy of the man in charge: "My name is on the door, and I will make the final decision. Whether it's declining or going forward on a case, if the U. S. attorney isn't making the final decision, that person wouldn't be doing his job. It's the U. S. attorney's decision, no one else's."

Johnson added, "Oftentimes, it takes as much or more courage to decline a case as it does to bring an indictment."

IMMIGRATION:

Support Swells For Agents Who Shot Drug Smuggler (WP)

By Darryl Fears, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Conservatives Lead Movement to Free Ex-Border Patrolmen

Early this week, the Bush administration urged angry conservatives to remain calm over the convictions of two former Border Patrol agents who shot an unarmed Mexican drug smuggler, but petitions for their release continued to flood the White House.

It did not help that one the lawmen, Ignacio Ramos, was attacked by Latino gang members in his cell at the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi and beaten bloody. Days after prison officials confirmed the beating on Feb. 8, Department of Homeland Security officials admitted that an inspector general's report erroneously quoted Border Patrol agents as saying Ramos and his partner, Jose Compean, intended to kill Mexicans.

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), founder of the House Immigration Reform Caucus and a presidential candidate, visited Ramos in prison and told him of the movement against his incarceration, including candlelight vigils, rallies, and a storm of criticism on conservative talk radio and television. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) threatened to call for impeachment proceedings against President Bush if the agents were harmed in prison, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) promised to look into the matter.

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said that the 700 people who will attend the organization's annual convention in Washington on Feb. 25 will "speak with one voice" against the prosecution and conviction of the agents. The union, which represents Border Patrol agents and other federal workers, implored Bush in a letter this month to pardon Ramos and Compean.

"We think this thing has been mishandled from the start," Gage said. "We're meeting . . . with the head of the Bureau of Prisons. I'm going to raise some hell there to find out why these guys are in that particular institution."

According to a report by the DHS inspector general's office, the incident that landed the agents in trouble started on Feb. 17, 2005, when Asvaldo Aldrete-Davila, an admitted Mexican drug smuggler, drove across the border into Texas with 740 pounds of marijuana. He saw Border Patrol agents trailing him, panicked, and drove into a ditch.

During the chase that followed, Aldrete-Davila scuffled with Compean after the agent tried to smack him with the butt of a shotgun. The agents said they saw something in the suspect's hand and feared for their lives, according to the report and court testimony.

A fuselage of bullets from Compean and Ramos missed. Finally, Ramos took careful aim as Aldrete-Davila neared the border and hit him in the buttocks.

After the shooting, the agents collected all shell casings at the scene, threw them away and did not mention the shooting to superiors, a violation of Border Patrol procedures that call for an oral report after a weapon is discharged, according to the report and court records.

Investigators granted immunity to Aldrete-Davila to lure him back across the border. The story he told was corroborated by other officers at the scene, the report said.

In March last year, Ramos and Compean were found guilty of multiple charges, including assault with a dangerous weapon, discharge of a firearm in commission of a crime, and tampering with a crime scene. Judge Kathleen Cardone issued an 11-year prison sentence to Ramos and a 12-year sentence to Compean in October. The agents appealed to a higher court, and their conservative supporters started to pressure Bush to release them.

Since the convictions, a group called Grassfire.org has collected 40,000 signatures on a "Pardon the Agents" petition. Angry congressional Republicans -- including Rep. Ted Poe (Tex.), Rep. Phil Gingrey (Ga.) and Rep. Walter B. Jones (N.C.) -- also wrote Bush to say they are flummoxed over why the government accepted the word of an illegal-immigrant drug dealer over that of government agents.

"There's clearly a lot of interest in this issue," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said. She said the Bush administration has a policy against revealing the number of letters, petitions and requests it receives on any given matter.

"The president has urged everyone to look at the facts of the case, as they were convicted by a jury of their peers," Perino said. "There is a legal process that every defendant is entitled to, and we should let that play out."

Mexico: U.S. Security Chief In First Visit (NYT)

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Advances Minimum Wage Hike (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

The House yesterday overwhelmingly approved a modest package of tax breaks for restaurants and small businesses, moving Congress one step closer to approving the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nearly a decade.

On a vote of 360 to 45, the House agreed to extend and expand credits and deductions to save taxpayers $1.3 billion over 10 years. It would adjust the tax code to increase collections by a similar amount. The measure would also guarantee that restaurant owners could keep a tax credit worth an estimated $500 million over 10 years.

The measure now moves to the Senate, which passed a far more generous $8.3 billion tax package this month under pressure from Republicans who refused to support a higher minimum wage unless it included tax relief for small businesses. Leaders in both chambers were optimistic yesterday that their differences could be resolved after Congress returns at the end of the month from its first break of the session.

"The House tax relief package aimed at the small businesses most affected by the increase in the minimum wage is a good first step, but we can do much better," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said in a written statement. "While I support the more robust Senate package, I know we can create a stronger bipartisan package that provides meaningful benefits to both those who earn the minimum wage and those who pay it."

Both chambers have agreed to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, from $5.15, over two years. The minimum wage now is the lowest in 50 years when adjusted for inflation, and a raise for the nation's lowest-paid workers is among the top priorities of the new Democratic congressional majority.

At first, House leaders insisted that the Senate approve the minimum-wage increase without adding small-business tax breaks. But that push failed in the Senate, and House leaders quickly reconsidered their position. Leadership aides were uncertain yesterday whether negotiations over the tax packages would take place in a conference committee or by some other method.

The two packages offer similar forms of tax relief, though the Senate bill is far more generous. For example, both packages would extend tax credits for employers who hire former welfare recipients, at-risk youth and other targeted groups, as well as a law that allows small businesses to quickly deduct $112,000 for equipment purchases. However, the House bill would raise the deduction amount to $125,000. And both packages contain specific breaks for restaurants, which employ a large number of the nation's minimum-wage workers.

The bigger difference is in how the each chamber would pay for the tax breaks. The House would close a loophole that permits wealthy taxpayers to shelter income by shifting it to their children. It would also create an accounting gimmick that would get more money from businesses with assets of more than $1 billion in 2012 and then reduce their taxes by the same amount in 2013.

The Senate package, in contrast, squarely targets corporations, executives and other highly paid workers by closing tax shelters, eliminating the deduction for fines and penalties paid in connection with lawsuits and barring executives from placing more than $1 million a year in deferred compensation plans.

Business lobbyists have already chosen sides, with the National Federation of Independent Business and small-business groups supporting the Senate package. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, meanwhile, is lobbying for the House bill in hopes of killing Senate provisions that it finds objectionable, including the limit on deferred compensation, one of the most popular perks in corporate America.

Tax Breaks Sweeten House Wage Measure (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House overwhelmingly approved more than $1 billion in small-business tax breaks to be attached to an increase in the minimum wage, paving the way for compromise talks with the Senate over lifting the hourly pay floor for the first time in a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0134259

For the minimum-wage increase to become law, the chambers must meld the House small-business tax breaks with a bigger Senate-passed tax package valued at $8 billion in breaks in 10 years. The challenge: to settle on a tax package that is substantial enough to persuade a sufficient number of Senate Republicans to support a pay raise they say will hurt small employers, yet small enough to appease House Democrats, who initially balked at attaching any tax breaks to the minimum-wage bill.

On top of that, the House and Senate have agreed to work under a budgeting constraint that requires any tax breaks to be offset by revenue increases, so as not to increase the deficit. The Senate's larger tax-break package required an array of offsets that would restrict corporate tax shelters and loopholes and limit executive deferred-compensation plans, among other changes.

Some of those items have been criticized in the House, as well as by some business groups. In fact, many business groups have backed the House version of the wage measure because it avoids some of the more painful offsets, even though it means fewer tax breaks.

To get to the compromise on the size of the tax breaks, the House would likely have to agree to move closer to the Senate's view. Friday, just before the House's 360-45 passage of its small-business bill, Republican Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, the ranking member of the Finance Committee, called the House package "puny."

There is common ground on the substance of some breaks. Both the House and Senate bills would extend a credit for businesses that employ disadvantaged workers and a deduction for small companies' equipment expenses.

"I know there are differences between the bills, but I'm confident they'll be worked out," said Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. The bill would raise the minimum wage by $2.10 an hour -- from $5.15 to $7.25 -- over two years.

Even if the House and Senate meet in the middle on the amount of tax breaks, it could be challenging to find $4 billion in offsets that are agreeable to both sides. Key members of the House have criticized some of the larger offsets in the Senate bill: limits on "sale-in, lease-out" tax shelters (SILOs) and "corporate inversions," in which companies reincorporate in a foreign country to avoid paying U.S. taxes on foreign income.

The deferred-compensation provisions have prompted an outcry from business groups much larger than the revenue the measures are estimated to raise, making some in the House question whether it is worth including them.

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, a New York Democrat, has said the SILO and inversion provisions are problematic because they are retroactive.

Specifically, the Senate bill would move back the effective date of existing limits and bar companies who used such arrangements from getting tax benefits in the future.

Familiar Problem Stalls Minimum Wage Bill (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — When Democrats campaigned last fall to recapture control of Congress, few domestic issues seemed to have as much winning potential as raising the minimum wage.

Democrats ostentatiously signed pledges to block any pay increase for Congress until it raised the minimum wage. They organized ballot initiatives to raise the state minimum wage. And when they did recapture the House and the Senate, Democrats made it a top priority.

Yet after six weeks in power, the Democratic-led House and Senate have yet to agree on a final bill. The obstacle is the same one that stymied Republicans time after time when they had control: paralyzingly thin margins in the Senate.

On Friday, the House voted 360 to 45 to pass a $1.3 billion tax cut for small business, which will be linked to a bill that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15. But the Senate, where Democrats need Republican votes to prevent a filibuster, has coupled the minimum wage bill with $8.3 billion in tax cuts for small business.

Lawmakers are not expected to reconcile the difference until after their “Presidents’ Day District Work Period” next week, and it remains unclear how difficult those negotiations will be. Further muddying the outlook is a split between small-business groups and big-business groups over which bill to support.

“I would not say we’re surprised at the delay,” said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan. “But I would say we are chagrined.”

Few lawmakers doubt that Congress will eventually approve the higher minimum wage, which was last raised 10 years ago. The battle is over how much business groups and Republicans can demand in return.

Republican lawmakers have demanded that Congress link an increase in the minimum wage, which business groups have long opposed, to tax cuts that they say would ease the burden for small businesses. House Democrats initially ignored those demands, passing a “clean” minimum-wage bill with no tax cuts last month.

But Senate Democrats, who needed Republican votes to attain a 60-vote majority to cut off debate, agreed to include $8.3 billion in tax cuts over the next five years.

The Senate tax cuts included a one-year extension of a tax cut that lets small companies write off up to $100,000 a year in equipment spending as well as extensions of tax breaks that allow restaurants and small shops to write off property improvements more quickly.

Those measures have strong support from small-business groups, led by the National Federation of Independent Business. But the Senate bill provoked strong opposition from the United States Chamber of Commerce, which objected to revenue-raising provisions that would have eliminated tax deductions on certain forms of executive compensation and for the cost of settling lawsuits.

The Chamber, which represents both small and large companies, supported the House bill with its smaller tax cut and provided enough political cover for 141 Republicans to join 219 Democrats in voting for passage.

"Bipartisanship is alive and well in the House of Representatives," Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, declared after the vote on Friday.

Some Republicans were far less enthusiastic than their votes suggested, taking comfort in the fact that they had exacted at least some price for their cooperation.

"The simplest argument in favor of this is that it's got the Chamber's support," said Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California, who voted aye but complained that the bill was not a "real tax cut" at all.

"They're giving a tax cut to small business but raising taxes on the rich," Mr. Issa said.

One provision, for example, would eliminate a tax break that allows wealthy families to reduce capital gains taxes by shifting some of their income to their children.

Mr. Levin, a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee, said he and most other House Democrats would have preferred to avoid the whole issue of tax cuts.

"It's all about getting 60 votes in the Senate," he said wearily.

Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said lawmakers were within weeks of reaching their goal. "I know there are differences between the bills," he said, "but I'm confident they'll be worked out."

Even if the House and the Senate come to agreement, the skirmish over comparatively small tax cuts tied to the minimum-wage bill is likely to be a harbinger of far more vexing battles later this year.

House Passes Minimum Wage Bill With Tax Breaks (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The House overwhelmingly approved business tax breaks worth $1.8 billion over 10 years yesterday, a key step toward forging a congressional compromise on increasing the minimum wage.

The vote on the tax cuts was 360-45.

Passage of a wage increase for the lowest-paid workers now depends on how quickly the House and Senate work out differences between their tax packages. The Senate tax breaks -- worth $8.3 billion -- are more than four times bigger than the ones passed in the House.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, Montana Democrat, said House and Senate negotiators could reconcile differences in the bills within two or three weeks.

"The minimum wage provision is going to trump all of this and is going to drive us to get this thing done pretty quickly," Mr. Baucus said.

Under the House bill, small businesses would see an extension in some tax write-offs that are scheduled to expire and would be able to continue to claim a tax credit for hiring disadvantaged workers. The legislation also would ensure that restaurants, which can deduct Social Security taxes paid on tips above the minimum wage, would not be hurt by the wage rise.

The House bill also would raise revenue by closing a loophole that permits wealthy taxpayers to shift income to their children and avoid higher taxes on capital gains and dividends.

The House vote displayed the influence the Senate's Republican minority can have on congressional legislation. House Democrats had demanded a minimum wage bill without any tax provisions. Senate Democrats insisted that without some tax relief, the minimum wage would lose necessary Republican backing.

Senate Republican officials predicted the final tax package would be closer to the House version than the Senate's. Small-business groups have sided with the Senate, but the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is lobbying for the House version.

The bipartisan agreement behind the House tax package was in stark contrast to the largely partisan debate on Iraq that consumed the House for most of the week. Lawmakers held up the House bill as a model for legislative cooperation. Still, some Republicans complained that Democrats prevented them from offering amendments on the House floor.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the House tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said the legislation "should set the tone for the rest of the Congress as we search for common ground and solutions to tough issues."

The minimum wage bill had become the new Democratic majority's first legislative challenge. The $2.10 an hour increase -- from $5.15 to $7.25 over two years -- was a Democratic campaign issue last year and was at the top of the party's legislative agenda. But the bill faltered when House and Senate Democrats disagreed on the need for tax cuts.

With its $8.3 billion tax package, the Senate would extend tax credits and tax write-offs and provide new tax preferences to certain companies. It also would eliminate some tax shelters and add new taxes on lawsuit settlements and punitive damage payments and on deferred compensation packages for higher-paid executives.

"The House package is puny," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee. He called for a compromise that would close tax loopholes, raise more revenue and "help small businesses that sometimes are hurt by an increase in the minimum wage."

Groups representing small businesses, such as the National Federation of Independent Business, prefer the larger Senate bill. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce supports the House bill because it objects to the Senate's revenue provisions, particularly the plan to eliminate deductions for payments in lawsuits.

President Has 2 Moles Removed From His Face (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

President Bush had two moles removed from his left temple yesterday. His doctors say they expect tests on the skin growths to show that they are noncancerous.

The five-minute procedure, called a shave biopsy, was performed in the White House office of Bush's official physician, Richard J. Tubb.

Stephen Krivda, a dermatologist from Walter Reed Army Medical Center, performed the procedure, for which only a local anesthetic was required.

Bush will have a one-inch scab on his temple, spokesman Scott Stanzel said. Test results will be available by the middle of next week.

"The doctors expect that both moles are benign," Stanzel said.

Bush has had several lesions removed before: a precancerous lesion on his left arm in August, a noncancerous skin growth on his neck in July 2005, small lesions from his left shoulder and face in 2004, and others from his face in December 2001. None has been cancerous, but the president has regular checkups to guard against any lesions advancing to a more dangerous stage.

The procedure came about at the president's initiation. On Monday, he showed one mole he noticed to Tubb, who noticed another and recommended that both be removed, Stanzel said.

Controversy Likely To Follow Cheney To Asia (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Recent events haven't been kind to the vice president, but ex-aides aren't counting him out.

WASHINGTON — Vice President Dick Cheney is set to depart Monday for a weeklong trip to Asia, and many in Washington are wondering whether he might be grateful for an excuse to high-tail it out of town. The past few weeks have not been kind to the vice president — or at least to his public image.

Last week, a close ally was dressed down by the Pentagon inspector general for skewing intelligence before the Iraq war. The trial of his former chief of staff has depicted the vice president's office as a center of underhanded intrigue. And this week's announcement of a nuclear agreement with North Korea appears to be a repudiation of Cheney's long-term opposition to a deal.

Those events, culminating months of bad news for the conservative wing of the Republican Party, have prompted speculation that the once-formidable vice president — the most powerful in American history — has become a spent force.

But while Cheney's public standing and his approval ratings appear to have suffered, he remains a highly visible presence when it comes to administration policy, both foreign and domestic. And the ultimate source of Cheney's influence, his seemingly unique relationship with President Bush, shows no visible sign of change.

Mary Matalin, the former senior Cheney aide who still serves as an informal advisor, acknowledged that it might look as if he has lost a few battles in the recent past; but, she said, such public perceptions matter little.

"He doesn't operate in the realm of winner-loser. He's got an audience of one," Matalin said. "The notion that he's lost or gained relative to the audience of one is backed up by not one scintilla of evidence."

Former aides and defenders say that Cheney was never as powerful as his critics feared, and that he is not as diminished now as critics might hope.

"Yes, there has been some ebb in his influence, but that's part of the normal life cycle of an administration," said Stephen Yates, a former member of the vice president's national security staff who now works as an international business consultant. "He wasn't 12 feet tall before, and he's not 2 feet tall now."

For a vice president who put a high value in keeping his profile low and his advice to the president private, Cheney has been anything but invisible.

He has long been — and remains still — the keeper of the conservative faith in the White House. He continues to be an outspoken defender of an administration struggling to fix the centerpiece of its foreign policy, the war in Iraq. And he seems undaunted by a public that expresses dissatisfaction with the overall direction of the country.

Several of those roles were on display Wednesday when the vice president delivered an address to the National Assn. of Manufacturers. He told the largely conservative audience that the president would veto a bill that would set rules for how workers vote for union representation — a bill the group opposes.

Cheney also tossed a bit of conservative red meat to the crowd, noting that a snowstorm overnight had shuttered much of the city. "The good news is, the federal government's shut down today. So everybody's safe," the vice president said. Cheney has held positions in the federal government for most of his adult life, but the audience laughed anyway.

To some extent, Cheney suffers from circumstances of the political calendar: He said long ago that he would not run for president, and the president he serves is a lame duck.

"Political history would say that vice presidents who have no [political] ambition become lame ducks even earlier" than their presidents, said Paul C. Light, a New York University professor who has long studied the vice presidency.

Moreover, many of Cheney's administration soul mates are no longer on the job.

Former Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was forced to resign last fall. Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, stepped down after he was indicted on charges of lying to investigators probing a leak of classified information. Former Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton has left the administration after serving as temporary, unconfirmed U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Several former Cheney aides said the vice president's staff had lost influence within the White House. His current chief of staff, David S. Addington, does not have the same status as Libby, who held multiple positions including "assistant to the president," which gave him a seat in more White House meetings.

And on Capitol Hill, congressional Republicans lament the departure of Cheney's former legislative aide, Brenda Becker.

"His personal influence hasn't diminished, but at the staff level, the office of the vice president isn't as influential as it was," said one former aide who was not authorized to speak about the vice president on the record.

Cheney is scheduled to visit U.S. troops stationed on the Pacific island of Guam and to pay a visit to two allies who have contributed to operations in Iraq: Japan and Australia. The White House announcement said that "the president has asked the vice president to thank these two allies for their efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan."

But already there are complications. News reports from Tokyo have said Cheney would not meet with Japan's minister of defense, who has publicly criticized U.S. policy in Iraq. And in Australia, the visit may turn out to be a liability for Prime Minister John Howard, who is running for reelection. Australian polls show a strong majority disapproves of the war and Australia's contribution to it.

In short, Cheney is unlikely to flee controversy just by leaving Washington. "He's going to Australia. He's going to Japan. He's the go-to guy on the Hill," said Matalin. "And he's taking a lot of incoming."

Cheney Tours With Bush's Confidence (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney has lost his chief of staff and confidant, who now faces an imminent verdict in a federal courtroom for alleged perjury. And Cheney's party has lost control of Congress, with midterm elections widely viewed as a repudiation of the Bush administration's Iraq war policy.

Yet Cheney has not lost his influence with President Bush, who often has counted on his sharp-tongued No. 2 to launch the most searing offensives against political and administration critics. And, since the retirement of former Defense Secretary

Donald Rumsfeld and a recasting of the administration, Bush has counted even more on the hardest of his hard-liners to hold the White House line.

Now, with the administration besieged by congressional critics of the war in Iraq yet boasting of sudden progress in a nuclear standoff with North Korea, Cheney will make a weeklong tour of the Pacific. He will offer a nod of thanks to Bush's supporters in the "war on terror," but also pointed reminders of the risks still posed by powers intent on undermining Western democracy.

Delivering speeches throughout the region, Cheney will arrive Tuesday in Japan, which has supported the U.S. effort in Iraq but whose defense minister recently criticized the invasion of Iraq as "wrong." He will close the trip Sunday in Australia, whose prime minister is one of Bush's staunchest allies in the war.

The vice president plans a rally for U.S. troops and a speech aboard the USS Kitty Hawk based at Yokosuka, Japan, the only American aircraft carrier "permanently forward-deployed" and the oldest U.S. Navy ship still in service. He will have another rally for troops at Andersen Air Force Base in Guam en route to Australia.

Japan and Australia "are probably two of the best allies we have anywhere in the world," said one senior administration official, calling Cheney's diplomatic mission a cementing of cherished friendships. Despite some of Cheney's predictions about the American mission in Iraq proving wrong—most notably his assertion in May 2005 that the insurgency was in its "last throes"—he has retained his stature in an administration whose most powerful players have moved, moved on or lost stature. With the movement of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice from the White House to Foggy Bottom, the demotion of political adviser Karl Rove from his policy role at the White House and the replacement of Rumsfeld after the midterm elections, Cheney has held on to a powerful role.

He has have served four presidents—Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, and the two George Bushes. But his influence with the current president may be unmatched historically.

"The vice president has always had easy access to the Oval Office in a way that no other vice president ever had," said Mike Green, former director of Asian affairs for the president's National Security Council. And, Green said, Cheney holds a singular role since Rumsfeld's departure.

"He is the president's close confidant and has an opportunity to weigh in on all sorts of issues on ways that the rest of the government never sees… and that hasn't changed," Green said.

When the campaigning president has required attack tactics, Cheney has stepped to the plate. When the wartime president has required someone to confront his critics, Cheney has stood ready with bruising words for the "defeatism" of Democrats willing to retreat in the face of terrorism. "The president and I cannot prevent certain politicians from losing their memory, or their backbone," Cheney said during the 2006 campaign, but "we're going to continue throwing their own words back at them."

Asked in a recent interview with Newsweek magazine if he takes personally the criticism that some have leveled at him, Cheney said, "Well, I'm vice president, and they're not."

In the midst of casual speculation around Washington that Cheney, 66, might not serve out his term, Bush made a point of laying that to rest during an address to the American Enterprise Institute last week. Noting that more than 20 scholars of the conservative think tank have served in his administration, including Cheney, he also noted that "a few have returned to the fold." But, Bush said, "You'll have to wait two more years to get another one to return to the fold. Dick Cheney is occupied."

The vice president has not only enjoyed unprecedented influence with this president, but also has asserted in new and broadening ways the powers of his own office.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale has complained: "One of the problems now is that this vice president… seems to have stepped across a line that we thought was important at the time…. This vice presidency is troubling to me because time and time again we have seen the establishment of almost a parallel national security council" with Cheney filtering information flowing to the president.

Cheney has operated his own national security team, which retired Army Col. Larry Wilkerson, chief of staff to former Secretary of State Colin Powell, has accused of spying on the president's own National Security Council. And Cheney has not only exercised his authority to classify secret information, but also has refused to account for how much information he is classifying. He has asserted an exemption from the annual reporting that the president has demanded all executive agencies make to the National Archives because his role is not merely as an executive officer, but a legislative one as well, serving as president of the Senate.

If predecessors tended to focus on narrow missions, Wilkerson said in an interview with the Tribune, "Along came Dick Cheney, and it's everything. He's got a staff that can stick its nose in anything."

Still, Cheney has lost the trusted aide who once oversaw his national security operation, former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby. He is standing trial on charges of lying to federal authorities investigating the leak of a CIA agent's identity—the wife of a former ambassador who challenged some of the White House's rationale for the run-up to the war and accused the White House of manipulating intelligence.

Libby, who initially had said he learned of the relationship from news reporters in the summer of 2003, later testified that the first to tell him of the connection was his boss: Cheney. The trial has shown that others in the administration leaked the information to reporters.

Even with loss of Libby from his office, one knowledgeable insider requesting anonymity said Cheney is his own staff and counsel where it counts most, inside the Oval Office of the Bush White House.

"Yes, there was a separate [national security] staff set up by the vice president, and yes they created a certain mystique," the source said. "But the real power of the vice president was that he could go in and talk to the president about whatever he wanted, and staff didn't always know what he was saying."

An Awkward Plea (NYT)

By Ann Althouse

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

It's hard to ask for a raise, especially when you're a judge. Look at poor Justice Anthony Kennedy supplicating before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Valentine's Day. With stilted locutions — "it's frankly most awkward for me" — he staked out pedantic points about the constitutional scheme of separation of powers, and lumbered toward a conclusion that federal judges need to make more money.

His theory worked the theme of "excellence": unless the pay is good, excellent judges will leave the bench, excellent lawyers and law professors will not accept appointments, and if the judges aren't excellent, they won't be independent, as the Constitution contemplates. (Unfortunately, the Constitution also contemplates the justices' having to beg Congress for a raise, or Justice Kennedy wouldn't have found himself straining through that theory.)

Senator Arlen Specter acted as though he found this all very enlightening. When you come before us, you appear on television, and you're educating the public, he said. But I don't think Kennedy's excellence theory had actually impressed him. It was more that he perceived a segue to the subject he wanted to drag onto center stage.

He had just reintroduced his bill to require the Supreme Court to televise its oral arguments, and he wanted to talk about cameras in the courtroom: think of the profound educational effect of showing the oral arguments; you justices are already going on TV all the time to explain your notions; people get their information through TV, so you ought to let them see the room, see how you operate.

Earlier, Justice Kennedy had brushed off Senator Patrick Leahy, who had convened the hearing by going on about those terrible hotheads who denounce the judiciary, call for impeachment and even threaten violence against judges. Justice Kennedy sounded unperturbed: there should be a public debate about what the Constitution means — it's the people's Constitution — and it might be nice if everyone were rational and respectful, but we're used to the "hurly-burly, rough and tumble" of democracy.

For Justice Kennedy, the real threat to the judiciary is the low pay.

But Senator Specter's Congressionally imposed cameras stirred up the justice. It would change the "collegial dynamic." Justice Kennedy portrayed the justices' interaction with the attorney at oral argument as almost a private undertaking. The justices, who haven't yet talked with each other about the case, "are using the attorney to have a conversation with ourselves," he said. He quickly added: "And with the attorney."

He took a stern tone: "This is a dynamic that works." He pinched his fingers together as if he could forcibly squeeze the Congress out of the Supreme Court's domain. He paused a long time, trying, it seemed, to contain his emotion and find the proper attitude.

He went with abject pleading: "Please, Senator, don't introduce into the dynamics that I have with my colleagues the temptation — the insidious temptation — to think that one of my colleagues is trying to get a sound bite for the television. We don't want that." He had come to beg for more money to reach some idealized form of independence understood as a matter of excellence. And now, here he was fending off the intrusion of the dreaded cameras into his precious collegial conversation. Isn't part of this independence deciding when to let everyone watch them?

Needing to present himself as an excellent judge, Justice Kennedy couldn't say anything intemperate. Think of what he didn't say.

If the pay is low, the judges will be the kind of people who don't care that much about money. They might be monkish scholars, or they might be ideologues who see in the law whatever it is they think is good for us. Justice Kennedy could say that judicial work is satisfying in ways that have nothing to do with money. He couldn't say that we can't trust people who don't care enough about money.

DOJ_NMG_0134265

We need judges who are the kind of solid, common-sense lawyers who factor money into their decisions. These are the same people who take the kind of conventional law-firm jobs that pay a good salary and require the greatest sacrifice to leave.

Low judicial pay should trouble us not because the judges will somehow lack “excellence.” It should trouble us because the law will be articulated by ideologues and recluses.

Rep. Jefferson To Get Homeland Security Seat (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who yanked embattled Rep. William J. Jefferson off a powerful tax committee last year, has decided to put him on the Homeland Security panel, aides to the Louisiana Democrat confirmed yesterday.

The move infuriated some Republicans, who accuse him of being a potential security risk.

Jefferson has been the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation related to a telecommunications deal in Africa. His Capitol Hill office and his homes in Washington and New Orleans have been raided by the FBI, and he was kicked off the Ways and Means Committee last June after affidavits and evidence seized in the raids became public.

Nevertheless, Jefferson won reelection in December to a ninth term, and he has been an outspoken critic of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina. Pelosi's decision to appoint Jefferson to the committee must still be formally approved by House Democrats.

"It sends a terrible message," said Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the committee's ranking Republican. "They couldn't trust him to write tax policy, so why should he be given access to our nation's top secrets or making policy for national defense?

"Members of the committee have access to intelligence secrets, plots here in the country, overseas, and people under suspicion. This shows how unimportant the Democrats think homeland security is," King said.

Jefferson's chief of staff, Eugene Green, called King's criticism "ridiculous and just politics."

"Representing New Orleans as he does, we're very concerned as to what happened in the wake of Hurricane Katrina," Green said. "It's just natural for the congressman to serve his constituents on a committee of this nature."

New Push Grows For FDA Regulation Of Tobacco (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

After years of falling short, advocates of requiring the Food and Drug Administration to regulate tobacco are again waging that fight in Congress -- and this time, they say, the odds are in their favor. Really.

A bipartisan group of lawmakers introduced legislation last week to grant the FDA authority over the manufacturing, marketing and sale of tobacco products, including the power to restrict advertising, require stronger warning labels, and regulate the amount of nicotine and other ingredients. The agency would not be able to ban tobacco.

"Congress cannot in good conscience allow the federal agency most responsible for protecting the public health to remain powerless to deal with the enormous risks of tobacco, the most deadly of all consumer products," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the lead sponsor and chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

"This bill is long overdue," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee and the lead sponsor in the House. "Despite the fact that cigarettes kill over 400,000 Americans each year, and despite the fact this is the most toxic substance that is sold legally and when used as intended has the potential to kill, there is virtually no regulation of tobacco by the federal government."

Rhetoric like this has been flying around Capitol Hill for years. The FDA claimed the authority to regulate tobacco in the mid-1990s during the Clinton administration, but the effort was challenged by tobacco companies and overturned by the Supreme Court in 2000. What followed were several attempts to pass legislation in Congress, many of which attracted broad-based support -- including from cigarette maker Philip Morris USA. But invariably the bills hit an impasse and died. Legislation to regulate tobacco won approval in the Senate in 2004, but GOP leaders never allowed a vote on it in the House, the bill's supporters say.

Now, with Democrats in control of Congress for the first time since 1994, proponents say the legislation has a far better chance.

"This is the year when we can pass meaningful legislation," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, the lead GOP sponsor in the House, whose father died of emphysema.

Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the top Republican sponsor in the Senate, said 54 percent of smokers take up the habit before age 18. The legislation "is the best way to address the public health concerns and the marketing concerns we have about children being targeted and addicted to a drug like nicotine," he said.

The FDA would have the power to end vending-machine and self-service sales, prohibit tobacco advertising near schools and playgrounds, ban fruit- or candy-flavored cigarettes and stop cigarette makers from using claims such as "light" or "low-tar" unless they are scientifically proven.

The White House, generally no fan of expanding government regulation, referred calls to the Department of Health and Human Services, where a spokeswoman said officials were still reviewing the legislation. It is supported by groups such as the American Heart Association and the Campaign for Tobacco Free Kids, and it once again has the backing of market leader Philip Morris USA, maker of Marlboro cigarettes.

"In the long term, it's good for our business if fewer people get sick and die from smoking," said Steven C. Parrish, a senior vice president of Altria Group Inc., Philip Morris's parent company.

But R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. plans to fight the legislation, saying it would help entrench Philip Morris's dominant position by limiting advertising opportunities, something Philip Morris denies.

"If you eliminate ways for competition to communicate with an audience, common sense and logic tells you that the primary beneficiary of that is the marketplace leader," said Reynolds spokesman David Howard, who added that the company was open to discussing "reasonable" regulation.

Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) has said he opposes the bill. Another potential roadblock is Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), whose state is also home to many tobacco growers.

"I am concerned that giving the FDA the authority to regulate tobacco will have a major impact our farmers, therefore, I will closely review the legislation . . . to ensure that it not only protects our children but also the farmers, their families and the communities they support," McConnell said in a statement.

Daniel E. Smith, president of the American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network, a lobbying group, predicted "a heck of a fight with Senator McConnell." But Smith said Cornyn's support should help garner the 60 votes needed to avoid a filibuster in the Senate.

Matthew L. Myers, president of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, said, "This will be a dogfight because the opposition is well funded and will stop at no end, but it appears there is now a broad bipartisan consensus to push it over the top."

GSA Defends Administrator In Hill Inquiry (WP)

By Scott Higham, Robert O'Harrow, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Agency Says Chief Takes Responsibility For No-Bid Order

The U.S. General Services Administration has responded to a congressional inquiry by saying its chief, Lurita Alexis Doan, did nothing improper last summer when she tried to arrange for a study by a company run by a woman with whom she had a "close professional relationship."

In a Feb. 2 response to Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the agency said Doan was trying to promote diversity when she signed a "service order" for the $20,000 project. That July 25 document was intended to authorize a company, Diversity Best Practices, run by Edie Fraser, to write a 24-page report and analysis concerning the GSA's use of businesses owned by minorities or women.

At the time, GSA contracts worth more than $2,500 had to be competitively bid. The proposed project was terminated in August because it "did not meet government contract requirements," the agency said in its six-page response.

In the response, GSA Associate Administrator Kevin Messner rejected "the implication that her intentions were improper" and said the project was stopped before any money changed hands.

"A procedural mistake was made, discovered and corrected," Messner wrote. "In an initial attempt as new Administrator to champion the cause of small minority, women, and disabled veteran-owned businesses, the Administrator recognized and took responsibility for the mistake."

Waxman, chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, which oversees the GSA, sent a letter to the agency raising questions about the events following a Jan. 19 story in The Washington Post. Waxman asked the agency to produce e-mails and other documents relating to the no-bid order and disputes between Doan and her inspector general's office.

A spokeswoman for Waxman said the committee is reviewing the GSA's response and declined to comment further.

Shortly after she became GSA administrator in May, Doan clashed with the agency's inspector general over budget matters. Last year, the inspector general's office launched its own investigation of the attempted project with Diversity Best Practices.

Doan told The Post in a taped interview last month that she took over the agency in a time of falling revenue and morale. In its response to Waxman, the GSA noted that Doan wanted the inspector general's office to rely on its $43 million budget appropriated by Congress and no longer depend on an extra $5 million that came from other GSA divisions. That additional money had been mandated by the White House Office of Management and Budget to help bolster contract audits in 2003.

"What started out as yesterday's benefit to help them out with their budget has turned into today's entitlement," Doan said in the interview.

The GSA's response said that the inspector general refused to identify any areas for possible cuts in its budget, despite an agency-wide push by Doan to reduce spending. Instead, the inspector general's office "demanded a substantial increase in spending" in its budget, according to the response. The $5 million in extra funding is included in the 2008 budget submitted by President Bush, along with an increase of about $4 million for the inspector general's overall budget.

In September, the inspector general's office notified Doan and Fraser of its investigation into the circumstances surrounding the $20,000 no-bid project, issuing subpoenas for e-mails and other documents.

The budget dispute drew a questioning letter on Oct. 20 from Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. He urged Doan to maintain the inspector general's independence. He said money used to fund contract audits had "saved the taxpayers more than $1 billion over the past two years." Grassley sent a letter yesterday to the Senate Appropriations Committee requesting that money to fund contract audits become a permanent part of the inspector general's budget.

The GSA released a statement yesterday: "The Administrator has only opposed unaccountable and undisciplined spending, not increased oversight. Any characterization of pre-decisional budget discussions that suggests otherwise is simply inaccurate."

After the Post story about the diversity study, Waxman sent Doan a letter requesting further information about possible "procurement irregularities." In its response to Waxman, the GSA said The Post's article was "characterized by inaccuracy and prejudice" and a "mischaracterization of the facts."

A lawyer hired by Doan, John J. Walsh, said in a Feb. 5 letter to The Post that Doan has been a victim of a "push back" by the inspector general's office against her attempt to "reduce wasteful spending throughout the agency, including the OIG."

The GSA called Fraser "the recognized leader" in the diversity field and said Doan reached out to Fraser about the "need for a very short and inexpensive report." Doan said in the interview that she authorized the report to promote GSA's diversity initiatives at the request of Felipe Mendoza, who runs the agency's Office of Small Business Utilization.

The GSA's response said that Doan signed a service order to authorize the work but that no contract was "ever executed."

Walsh said Doan was not "sidestepping" procurement rules but instead had submitted the no-bid order "into the contracting process."

Doan told The Post: "I handed this off, and then that was the last that I worried about it."

GSA staff, including legal counsel, determined that the arrangement did not comply with federal contracting rules.

On Aug. 4, GSA contracting officer Donna C. Hughes wrote to Fraser: "The U.S. General Services Administration (GSA) hereby notifies you that the contract, evidenced by the enclosed Confirmation of Service Order Prepared for GSA, signed and dated July 25, 2006, is terminated in its entirety."

Fraser is president and chief executive of Public Affairs Group Inc., the umbrella company of Business Women's Network and Diversity Best Practices, the division that was to have written the report. At the time of the proposal, Public Affairs Group was owned by iVillage Inc., a subsidiary of NBC Universal Inc.

The GSA response said Doan has a "close professional relationship" but "no personal contractual arrangement with Edie Fraser or Diversity Best Practices of any kind."

The GSA also responded to a question about whether Doan had intervened in the suspension process involving five large government contractors who had paid $66 million to settle fraud allegations that they kept travel rebates that should have gone back to the GSA.

The Post reported that a GSA official had issued letters to the five firms asking them to explain why they should not be suspended or debarred. Under the process, companies can avoid being suspended from government work by accepting responsibility, paying restitution and putting in place remediation plans.

Doan said in the interview that she had not been briefed on what she viewed as an important issue. Doan wrote in a Nov. 10 e-mail to top GSA officials: "If these letters can be stopped until cooler heads can prevail and discuss what the appropriate mechanism is to obtain the information that CAO [chief acquisition officer] requires, that would be best."

The GSA said that Doan was told that a decision had already been made to debar the firms. The GSA said Doan requested a briefing and took no further action.

"It is a distortion to equate a desire to be informed promptly when such decisions are pending with interference in this process," the GSA said in its response to Waxman.

The companies eventually avoided suspension or debarment by agreeing to return travel rebates in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0134268

In addition to Walsh, Doan has personally retained Washington lawyer Reginald J. Brown and media consultant Mark Corallo. A third lawyer for Doan, retired Maj. Gen. Michael J. Nardotti Jr., has requested that the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency open an investigation into whether the GSA inspector general's office leaked confidential information and documents.

A spokesman for the GSA's inspector general's office declined to comment yesterday.

VA Suspends Some Medical Research (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson has suspended activities at seven specialized research centers across the country after an unprotected computer hard drive disappeared from one of the facilities in Alabama last month.

In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, Nicholson called the department's latest data breach "tragic" and ordered the VA's Research Enhancement Award Programs to shut down until they are certified as meeting security standards.

The research centers focus on studies involving large amounts of data. The center in Birmingham, called the Deep South Center on Effectiveness, collects data for improving quality of care.

Writing to VA's top management on Thursday, Nicholson also said the department would begin unannounced inspections at VA sites nationwide.

"It is now clear to me that there are still too many VA employees, both in senior positions and elsewhere, who either still do not comprehend the seriousness of this issue, or who consciously disregard its seriousness," he wrote.

Nicholson has come under sharp criticism on Capitol Hill in the past year over a series of computer security failures that put sensitive personal information for millions of veterans at risk.

In the latest incident, a backup hard drive containing data such as Social Security numbers for up to 1.8 million veterans and physicians was reported missing Jan. 22 from a research site in Birmingham, Ala.

As a federal investigation proceeds, officials have remained tightlipped about the case. But in the letter, Nicholson wrote that the employee was a research assistant and the hard drive may have been stolen. The VA acknowledged earlier this week that the hard drive was not encrypted, a violation of the department's policy.

"This represents a failure of leadership in overseeing data security at Birmingham _ a failure that may be widespread throughout our Department," Nicholson wrote.

VA officials have said the data on the missing hard drive, including for some 1.3 million non-VA physicians across the country, was being used for a study.

Similar sites are in Portland, Ore.; Denver, Colo.; East Orange, N.J.; San Francisco, Calif.; White River Junction, Vt.; and San Antonio, Texas.

VA spokesman Matt Burns confirmed the letter Friday. He said the security reviews would be expedited but that it is unclear how long the research would be interrupted.

"The benefits of any research must be weighed against the importance of protecting the information that's being used," he said.

The Birmingham disclosure comes after a string of similar incidents recently, including the theft last spring of data on 26.5 million veterans from a VA employee's home in Maryland.

In auditing the department's security procedures last year, federal investigators found weak management and lax rules.

Nicholson said in August the agency would upgrade its computers with encryption technology, making data unreadable for unauthorized users. The department also recently hired an outside firm to improve employee practices.

House Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Bob Filner, D-Calif., said this week he plans to hold a hearing on the Birmingham incident later this month.

Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., called Nicholson's actions "good steps" but said the memo underscores the need for legislation strengthening data requirements at government agencies.

Earmarked For Death (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

You know the culture of spending on Capitol Hill is in bad repute when even legendary appropriator Robert Byrd of West Virginia is condemning earmarks. This week Mr. Byrd proclaimed on the Senate floor that the just-completed 2007 budget "does not, does not, N-O-T, include earmarks. We eliminate over 9,300 earmarks."

We're about to find out if he and his comrades really mean it. On Thursday, White House budget director Rob Portman issued little-noticed guidance to all federal departments and agencies that no Congressional requests for spending should be accommodated unless they are "specifically identified in statutory text" -- which is to say, the law.

This may sound like it ought to be regular practice, but it's a revolution in the Beltway. That's because, in order to dodge the legislative earmark limits that Mr. Byrd has been bragging about, Members have been speed-dialing executive branch officials and asking them to fund their specific earmark requests out of agency budgets even though they were purged from the larger budget bill. This Congressional lobbying can be hard for the average federal bureaucrat to refuse, since he doesn't want to offend those on Capitol Hill who control his budget. Mr. Portman's directive is intended to stiffen these backbones against such Congressional extortion.

If the attempt succeeds in reducing earmarks, this means the Fiscal 2007 federal budget could have the fewest number of these pork-barrel projects in many a year. By the way, thanks to efforts late last year by GOP Senators Jim DeMint of South Carolina and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma to block a last-minute bipartisan spending splurge, the 2007 budget holds overall federal appropriated spending to the rate of inflation; recent years have often seen three times that.

The budget does still contain a few spending tricks. For example, it moves $3.1 billion to finance obsolete military base closings in order to pay for such Democratic priorities as Pell grants and global AIDS funding. Closing bases would save money in the long run and the money is supposed to finance the Base Realignment and Closure process that Congress approved.

But all told, the Fiscal 2007 is a change for the better. If the executive branch follows the new White House guidance, we could come remarkably close to the miracle of an "earmark-free" year. We assume Senator Byrd will applaud.

Sharp Drop In Housing Starts Adds To Fear Of Wider Economic Impact (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater, Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

A sharp drop-off in new-home construction is adding to concerns that the housing downturn's impact could linger well into this year and eventually seep into the wider economy.

Builders slashed construction of new homes last month to the lowest level in nearly a decade, a move that underscores the severity of the sector's slump and signals it will likely continue to be a drag on the economy at least through midyear. The slip in homebuilding last year subtracted more than 1 percentage point from inflation-adjusted economic growth over the second half of 2006.

Monthly home-construction readings are volatile and prone to weather-induced fluctuations, and last month's plunge may somewhat overstate the market weakness. But signs of deterioration in riskier segments of the home-mortgage market, along with stagnant or declining home prices in many parts of the country, provide additional reason for concern.

The plunge in new homebuilding activity in January -- down 14.3% from December and 37.8% from January 2006 levels -- could eventually hasten a recovery by reducing the overhang of unsold homes, however.

So far, the weakness in housing has yet to spill over significantly to consumer spending, the dominant driver of U.S. economic growth. Instead, it has slowed the pace of expansion just enough to reverse last year's inflation surge. Still, the possibility of further deterioration in the sector this year remains a primary risk to economic growth -- particularly if it is accompanied by rising loan defaults or a broad tightening of credit standards.

So far, defaults and late payments have remained very low on prime mortgages, which are made to lower-risk borrowers and account for the bulk of home loans. But late payments have risen swiftly over the past year on subprime mortgages -- those made to risky borrowers with spotty credit histories -- and on "Alt-A" mortgages, a category between prime and subprime which includes many loans for which borrowers haven't documented their income. According to trade publication Inside Mortgage Finance, 13% of mortgages outstanding are subprime.

In November, payments were at least 60 days overdue on 12.9% of subprime loans packaged into mortgage securities, up from 8.1% a year earlier, according to First American LoanPerformance, a research firm in San Francisco. For Alt-A loans, the delinquency rate jumped to 2.1% in November from 1.1% a year earlier.

The upsurge in late payments and delinquencies has created turbulence among subprime lenders, and some large banks that bought subprime loans a couple of years ago have been pressuring subprime-mortgage lenders to buy them back. In its most recent survey of senior loan officers, released last week, the U.S. Federal Reserve found that some banks are getting more stringent to guard against this threat of defaults. About 18% of domestic banks reported that they had tightened credit standards on residential-mortgage loans over the past three months, the Fed said, adding that this was "the highest net fraction posted since the early 1990s."

But Fed officials and many other economists say the problems in subprime lending aren't severe enough at this point to significantly hamper economic growth. Doug Duncan, chief economist of the Mortgage Bankers Association, a Washington-based trade group, said only 6% of homeowners have subprime, adjustable-rate mortgages. Even if one-tenth of these end up in foreclosure -- the peak hit after the 2001 recession -- Mr. Duncan said that "it's hard to see how that can be a macroeconomic event."

Concern would rise if troubles spread further among lower-risk borrowers and lead to more defaults of Alt-A mortgages.

Another risk is that many subprime loans were made to buy houses in high-priced areas, which may be more vulnerable to price declines. Any widespread delinquencies on these loans could result in lenders seizing the underlying homes and dumping them on the market. That could exacerbate the industry's inventory problem, which has already put downward pressure on prices and forced builders to increase discounts and incentives.

Torn between yesterday's housing report's implications of slower growth and diminished inflationary pressure -- which makes additional interest-rate increases less likely -- stocks were virtually unchanged yesterday. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose three points to close at 12768.

Pat Moroney, who heads the Phoenix division of Standard Pacific Homes, a California-based home builder, said sales-cancellation rates in Phoenix soared as high as 70% at times last year, and averaged 50% for the year as a whole. The company has been offering incentives to potential buyers between $15,000 and $100,000 to help move unsold homes in some markets, up from $5,000 to $10,000 in 2005.

"We worked pretty hard to get through our backlog" of unsold homes, Mr. Moroney said. "We've pushed a lot of cancellations through." In January, the cancellation rate fell to 32%, he said.

Given the stockpile of unsold homes, many industry officials and economists greeted the sharp drop in new-home construction last month as welcome news. "I think it's a positive indicator," said Ara K. Hovnanian, chief executive officer of Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., a large home builder based in Red Bank, N.J. He said the figures reflect a decrease in new-home orders over the past year and will help builders clear their inventories, paving the way for a gradual recovery to begin later this year.

Economists say the sooner builders cut back, the sooner a rebound can occur. "We look at this number, and it makes us a bit more optimistic about when we're going to see a recovery," said Todd Vencil, a housing analyst at BB&T Capital Markets in Richmond, Va.

Meanwhile, the industry's continuing supply adjustment is likely to continue to affect the broader economy. Dave Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, predicts that the cut in residential investment will shave one percentage point from the economy's inflation-adjusted growth rate in the first quarter, more than he was anticipating late last year.

"Now we're talking about a heavier hit," he said.

Job losses in the sector are also likely to mount. Zoltan Pozsar, an economist at Moody's Economy.com, said 170,000 housing-related jobs have been cut since April 2006. Luckily, the rest of the economy has added nearly 1.78 million jobs over that span, and the labor market continues to boost wages and provide support for increased consumer spending.

Separately, the Labor Department said wholesale prices fell 0.6% last month and was only 0.2% higher than a year ago, another indication of ebbing inflation concerns. And the University of Michigan said consumer sentiment slid to 93.3 in early February from 96.9 at the end of January.

January Housing Starts Dive (WP)

Lowest Figure in a Decade Sparks Concern Over Overall Growth

DOJ_NMG_0134271

Housing starts dropped to their lowest level in nearly a decade last month, and permits for new construction also declined, pointing to continued weakness in a sector of the economy that can drag down growth overall.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that the pace of home building dropped more than 14 percent in January compared with the month before, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.4 million houses. That's the slowest annual rate since the late 1990s. Permits for new construction fell to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1,568,000 -- a drop of 3 percent from the prior month and more than 28 percent from the year before.

The release of the government statistics followed a study by the National Association of Realtors showing that home prices in about half of the country's metropolitan areas fell in the last three months of 2006 compared with the year before -- the first time the group documented such a decline in the 28 years it has collected data.

The Washington area was among the losers: The average price of homes sold in the last three months of 2006 fell 2.6 percent, to $421,600, compared with the year before.

Collectively, the statistics undermined gains posted at the end of last year, when an increase in permits and housing starts and rising demand for homes led some to conclude that the housing slump was beginning to abate. With a large inventory of unsold homes on the market, however, the latest reports will likely renew concern that weakness in the housing market could cause broader problems.

While housing starts alone aren't necessarily a good predictor -- weather can drive the number up or down in deceptive ways -- a renewed decline in housing permit applications supported a "bearish" outlook for growth in coming months, said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for the High Frequency Economics consulting firm.

The housing data are positive in one sense: They are likely to reinforce the view that the risk of inflation will remain moderate in coming months, a conclusion supported by another new report showing that the wholesale prices paid to producers fell in January. Lower energy prices and a decline in auto and truck prices led that 0.6 percent decrease.

The deepening slump in housing could have broad implications for the economy. Rising home values have been an important component of economic growth in recent years, giving homeowners a sense of increased wealth and emboldening them to tap the equity in their homes to pay for improvements and renovations, and other major expenses such as college tuition.

Historically low interest rates provided an added incentive to spend.

With interest rates now higher and the real estate market stagnant, some analysts expect consumers to reverse course and clamp down.

However, David Lereah, the chief economist for the Realtors' association, said he felt the group's recent price study caught the housing market at its low point.

"This information confirms 2006 was the year of contraction, and hopefully the fourth quarter was the bottom of this current business cycle," Lereah said in a written release accompanying the report.

Housing Starts Fell Sharply In January (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

The predicted bottoming-out of the housing market appears, for now, to still be just a prediction.

The Commerce Department said yesterday that construction of new homes in January slowed to the lowest rate in almost a decade. And in a sign that the months ahead could hold further gloom for the residential real estate market, the number of building permits issued last month also declined.

The seasonally adjusted annual rate of home starts dropped 38 percent compared with a year earlier, to 1.4 million in January, meaning that builders would start construction on only 1.4 million new homes this year if that rate continued. That compares with a rate of 2.3 million in January 2006. The number of building permits authorized fell to a rate of 1.6 million, from 2.2 million a year earlier — a 29 percent decline.

Economists said that some of the decline could be attributed to the weather — January was the first month this winter that was cold enough in many regions of the country to disrupt construction. But economists seemed to agree that most of the drop-off in residential construction indicated that builders were pulling back from a market that was oversaturated with unsold homes and short on buyers.

“I don’t think this is a weather story,” said David Seiders, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders. “I think this is real stuff. The question is, Where is the real bottom for starts and permits?”

The Northeast was the only region where construction did not decline. Builders there increased construction by 9 percent, compared with December.

DOJ_NMG_0134272

The sharpest drop was in the West, where construction declined 29 percent. In the Midwest, construction fell 15 percent; in the South, it dropped 12 percent.

The sharp decline in January followed two month-to-month increases in new-home construction. Those numbers, combined with some encouraging mortgage application data and other signs of tentative improvement in housing, led some economists to conclude that the worst of the slump had passed. But the new statistics contradicted that notion.

"People started getting a little too excited," said Richard F. Moody, chief economist of Mission Residential, a real estate investment firm. "Over the longer term, the outlook for housing is fairly positive. But it's going to take us some time to unwind the excess buildup."

To help shrink the growing backlog of unsold homes, builders are increasingly paying closing costs and offering other incentives like free vacations. In January, 52 percent of builders surveyed by the home builders' association said they were paying closing costs. When the housing market was at its peak in 2003, as few as 10 percent of builders said they were doing so.

Because new homes account for only about 15 percent of all homes sold in the United States each year, some economists have pointed to signs of improvement in the market for previously owned homes as evidence that the housing downturn is stabilizing. The sales rate for existing homes rose in October and November, and was down less than 1 percent in December.

This week, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, told Congress that "some tentative signs of stabilization have recently appeared in the housing market." He also noted the rather limited impact the slump had had on the rest of the economy.

Boom In The Mountains Creates A Housing Shortage (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BIG SKY, Mont. — The Big Sky region, just north of an entrance to Yellowstone National Park, has boomed in recent years, attracting skiers and other outdoor enthusiasts and fueling a construction and employment boom.

But soaring land prices and building costs have put the price of housing far beyond the reach of many new resort and construction workers.

Faced with a severe housing shortage for its workers, at least two resorts, the Yellowstone Club and Big Sky Resorts, picked an unusual solution. Each bought a motel it intended to continue operating for travelers, as well as for housing workers and contractors.

With its purchase of the Whitewater Inn, formerly a Comfort Inn, Big Sky Resorts picked up 56 rooms.

"We're a growing resort with 900 staff, and we want to attract the best staff," said Dax Schieffer, public relations manager for Big Sky Resorts, which is owned by Boyne U.S.A. "The plan is to have the employees stay here during peak season."

The Yellowstone Club is the new owner of Buck's T-4 Lodge, a 72-room motel just up the road from the Whitewater Inn.

The owner of the Yellowstone Club, Tim Blixseth, said his company had 500 employees and 1,000 subcontractors. Using Buck's to help house them will help reduce the "couple of million" dollars a year that the company spends for buses and mileage.

"It was a good strategic buy for us," Bob Sumpter, vice president for real estate development for the company, said. "We do not plan to change the operation one iota."

Both companies said workers would receive discounts on rooms, which rent for $100 to $150 a night depending on the season. Who gets those discounts and how much they amount to depend on what a worker's "job is and how much we need them," Mr. Schieffer said.

Many workers are choosing to double or triple up to save money, which can make for lively, if cramped, quarters.

Isabella Silva of Belo Horizonte, Brazil, lives in a Whitewater Inn room with three young male co-workers from Brazil. Each pays $230 a month for the crowded living space that is mostly taken up by three beds and a mattress on the floor. Ms. Silva and her roommates do most of their cooking in microwave ovens; they have wireless Internet and access to the motel pool and waterslide.

"These boys, oh my," Ms. Silva, 21, said shaking her head and smiling. "But it's O.K. We work most of the time. So we don't spend much time in the room."

Mr. Schieffer said he did not think that guests would mind sharing space with employees.

"I'd like to think everyone can get along," he said. "You don't say, 'Employees, don't go here,' or, 'Don't go there.' "

Instead, he said: "It's self-segregating. It works itself out."

Lots that sell for more than $200,000 today were going for a fifth of that three years ago, and construction costs run $700 or more a square foot, compared with $100 to $200 in most Montana cities.

Compounding the problem is the region's location, which is awkward to accommodate the boom. Big Sky is 32 miles southwest of Bozeman.

DOJ_NMG_0134273

But the two-lane road between the two runs through a narrow canyon that is ice covered and treacherous in winter.

An estimated 1,500 cars commute back and forth each day.

"They all have to drive from Bozeman every morning and back," Cathy Gorman, a real estate broker here, said. "It's bizarre, and it's dangerous. We've had a lot of deaths on that road."

Public transportation is infrequent. The Yellowstone Club runs four or five buses a day between here and Bozeman.

Ms. Silva said she and many other workers took the ski bus to Bozeman at the end of a day and shopped all night at the Wal-Mart store there because there was no bus back until morning.

As a result, housing at the mountain resorts is the best option for many.

Kyle Zimmerman, born in Chicago, just moved from a two-bedroom condo crammed with skis, clothes and furniture that he shared with four other people.

The monthly rent was $1,300 plus utilities, and Mr. Zimmerman, who has two jobs, including one at a pizzeria, paid $200 for the right to sleep in a closet.

"To make it affordable, you have to cram people in," Mr. Zimmerman, 22, said. "It was all right for a year."

His replacement in the closet? "The guy that had the couch."

Not surprisingly, Mr. Zimmerman applauded the resorts' buying the motels.

"Every year, I hear there's going to be new employee housing, but it never happens," he said. "You've got to put them somewhere."

Humpty-Dumpty Housing (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

There is no sugarcoating the latest news on the United States housing market. The slump in home prices from the end of 2005 to the end of 2006 was the biggest year-over-year drop since the National Association of Realtors started keeping track in 1982. There are no reasons to believe that's the worst of it.

Prices fell in 73 of the nation's 149 major markets in the last quarter of 2006, compared with 45 declining markets in the third quarter, revealing a downturn that is not only deep but wide.

At the same time, the number of existing-home sales declined in 40 states, with precipitous drops in previously red-hot markets like Arizona, Florida, Nevada, California and Virginia.

On top of that, a glut of unsold homes virtually ensures that prices will fall further before sales pick up. At the end of 2006, the vacancy rate for family homes was the highest it has been since the Commerce Department started keeping records in 1956.

Yet it came as a shock to many economists yesterday when the government reported that construction of new homes fell in January by 14.3 percent. The consensus forecast had been for a drop of less than 3 percent.

The bust will slow job growth this year in construction and related industries and with it, consumer spending. The severity of these economic side effects will depend on the strength of the overall job market and the stability of interest rates — both of which are anybody's guess.

Squarely in harm's way, however, are low- and middle-income homeowners, many of whom have mortgages with rates that are due to adjust upward this year and next. With delinquencies already surging, it is inevitable that a combination of higher mortgage payments and weakening home prices will cause many homeowners to default.

Lenders and regulators should prepare to do all they can to help. During the housing bubble, regulators stood by as mortgages were extended to borrowers with poor or no credit and little or no money for a down payment. Now that delinquencies and defaults are rising, lending standards are being tightened dramatically. That will make it harder for many existing homeowners to refinance their loans, thus hastening defaults. Lenders and regulators must use the utmost flexibility in applying the new standards. They got marginal buyers into the homes in the first place. They should now make every effort to keep them there.

Stocks End Week Mixed On Weak Economic Data (WSJ)

By Joanna L. Ossinger

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Stocks took a breather after three straight days of gains, lagging most of the day, but pulled a quick move higher in the last hour to virtually break even.

Weaker-than-expected economic data and comments from Microsoft's chief executive indicating some revenue expectations were too high hurt the major indexes.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 2.56 to 12767.57, hitting a record for a third straight day with its late move into the black. The S&P 500 lost 1.27 to 1455.54, and the Nasdaq Composite Index was off 0.79 to 2496.31.

DOJ_NMG_0134274

Small stocks and the broader market showed their strength. The Russell 2000 added 2.72 points to close at a record 818.15, and the DJ Wilshire 5000 ended at 14733.61, up 1.71 to a fresh seven-year closing high.

The major indexes all finished the week with gains of more than 1%. The Dow's weekly advance was its biggest in three months, and the index is up 2.4% year-to-date. The Nasdaq is up 3.4% on the year, and is 6.51 points off its six-year high, which was clocked on Jan. 12. The S&P 500 has advanced 2.6% so far this year.

Markets were rattled early Friday, after the Commerce Department said January housing starts plunged by 14.3% to a seasonally adjusted 1.408 million annual rate, the lowest point in nearly 10 years. Wall Street expected a 2.6% decline.

Timothy Rogers, chief economist at Briefing.com, said investors shouldn't make too much of the decline. "The volatility is expected," he said, particularly with weather turning worse in January after a mild start to the winter. Mr. Rogers said he was "looking for a stronger pace come the spring buying season."

The preliminary University of Michigan consumer-sentiment index declined to 93.3 in mid-February, from 96.9 in January. Economists had expected a smaller drop.

Also, Chicago Federal Reserve President Michael Moskow said in a speech that he thinks "the risk of inflation remaining too high is greater than the risk of growth falling too low," but his words seemed to have little effect on markets that just spent two days hanging on Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's words.

"It's likely almost an overt effort by Fed members" to do a balancing act on the signals they send, said Delta Global Advisors Chief Technical Strategist Bruce Zaro.

The Labor Department said the producer price index for finished goods fell 0.6% in January, after rising 0.9% in December and 1.8% in November. The core PPI, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, increased 0.2%. The numbers matched economist forecasts.

"The pressure on prices is somewhat muted now," Mr. Rogers said. He expects to see a gradual slowing of "contained growth." He noted that the next major economic release will be the Wednesday announcement by the Department of Labor on the January consumer-price index.

Big movers among Dow components included DuPont and Merck, up 1.4% and 0.9% respectively; Boeing, off 0.8%; and Pfizer, down 0.9%.

Microsoft shares slipped 2.4% to $28.74 after Chief Executive Steve Ballmer said some analyst revenue views for Vista might be too high considering what expectations are for personal-computer sales growth.

Continuing the flurry of merger-and-acquisition activity, Spain's Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria agreed to purchase Compass Bancshares for about $9.6 billion. The deal would give13 the Spanish bank substantial new heft in Texas, a market it has identified as a place for major expansion because of the flow of money between the U.S. and Mexico. Compass shares rose 6.5% to $70.70, while BBVA lost 2.5% to $25.57.

"There's a lot of cash out there, and I think investors are being relatively rational" with the premiums they expect from takeouts, said Jason Goepfert, chief executive of Sundial Capital Research. "I don't think there's speculative fervor" at this point.

Notable movers among other stocks included Sprint Nextel, which rose 2.1%, and Qualcomm, which sprang 2.9% higher. Qualcomm's MediaFlo system for broadcast mobile TV has been winning customers, and this week Oppenheimer upgraded the company to "buy" from "neutral."

A report in industry publication Automotive News suggested General Motors was in talks to purchase Chrysler Group. Chrysler parent DaimlerChrysler was up 4.4% to $73.33; GM slipped on the news, but recovered, ending 0.3% lower. Ford Motor, one of the most actively traded stocks on the NYSE, tumbled 0.8%.

Mills Corp. declined 4.6% to $25.48 after the real-estate investment company agreed to be bought by Simon Property Group and Farallon Capital Management for $25.25 a share.

Crude-oil prices added $1.30 to $59.29 a barrel as the U.S. government warned about an escalation of militant attacks in key producer Nigeria. OPEC's new secretary general said he feels the market is "stable."

In major market action:

Stocks broke even.14 On the New York Stock Exchange Thursday, 1,664 stocks advanced and 1,648 declined on volume of 1.36 billion shares.

Bonds gained.15 The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for every $1,000 invested, yielding 4.69%. The 30-year bond was up 9/32, yielding 4.788%.

The dollar strengthened slightly.16 The euro was at $1.3139 from $1.3145 at Thursday's close. The dollar was at 119.35 yen from 119.22 yen late Thursday.

Treasury Prices Climb On "Comforting" Data (WSJ)

By Laurence Norman

DOJ_NMG_0134275

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Treasury-bond markets chalked up gains Friday, with prices rising modestly on weaker-than-expected housing and consumer-confidence data.

The benchmark 10-year note was up 4/32, or $1.25 per $1,000 face value, at 99 16/32. Its yield fell to 4.69% from 4.706% Thursday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 9/32 to 99 13/32 to yield 4.788%.

Morning gains briefly took the 10-year note's yield down to 4.66%, its lowest level since Jan. 10, before it reversed course in a short session. U.S. bond markets closed early Friday ahead of the Presidents Day weekend.

The data, including weak housing starts and soft consumer-confidence numbers, were "comforting" for bond markets, said John Spinello, Treasurys strategist at Jefferies & Co., indicating that housing "will continue to be a drag on the economy."

Mr. Spinello said there has been a string of weaker economic data in recent days which, alongside this past week's remarks from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, had helped the 10-year Treasury yield fall some 0.12 percentage point since Wednesday morning.

Investors read Mr. Bernanke's testimony to Congress Wednesday and Thursday as being less aggressive on the possibility of further Fed rate increases than they had feared.

Crude-Oil Prices Near $60 On Concerns About Nigeria (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Oil futures rallied 2.4% and climbed above $59 after the government warned about more militant attacks in Nigeria and the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' secretary-general said producers were showing compliance with the group's new oil-production target.

The rally followed a volatile week in oil markets and came as traders closed bets on lower prices ahead of the long weekend. Floor trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange is closed Monday for Presidents Day, but electronic trading on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange's Globex platform will be available.

The front-month March crude-futures contract on the Nymex jumped $1.40 to $59.39 a barrel, a sharp recovery from its intraday low of $57.59 a barrel. The contract expires Tuesday.

In other commodity news:

EXCHANGES: A lobby group representing users of the futures markets released a statement Friday expressing concern about the announced merger between the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and CBOT Holdings Inc.'s Chicago Board of Trade.

The two futures exchanges -- the largest providers of exchange-traded financial-derivative contracts -- would combine to create CME Group and have a commanding market share of more than 85% of the market for U.S. futures-exchange trading, said the Futures Industry Association.

The FIA said the announced deal -- while creating possible cost savings -- "would concentrate significant market power...substantially lessen competition...and raise even higher the barriers to entry for new competitors." The FIA said the emergence of new competition may "overcome the anti-competitive effects of the merger."

The CME said in a statement that its merger "increases competition in the global derivatives marketplace and better positions the U.S. to compete."

CORN: Prices on the CBOT climbed as the market reacted to a private weather company's forecast that wet weather in the spring could delay corn plantings and may be followed by dryness during the summer that could impede growth. Nearby March corn rose 9.5 cents to $4.17 a bushel.

COFFEE: Prices on the New York Board of Trade fell because of an increase in U.S. stocks of unroasted coffee beans. The March contract closed down 2.1 cents to $1.1320 a pound.

Alan Who? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is so candid with Congress, he may make members forget his predecessor.

FEDERAL RESERVE Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill this week was so clear and succinct — and bullish — that investors may soon forget about his predecessor, Alan Greenspan. Bernanke's message that the economy is enjoying healthy growth, low unemployment and little inflation soothed financial markets, but it was his forthright, substantive answers that awed members of the Senate and House committees that oversee the nation's central bank.

Indeed, Bernanke, who's been on the job just over a year, performed better than he should have, politely answering too many questions.

The independence of the central bank that oversees the nation's financial system and monetary policy — regulating the supply of money in the economy and interest rates — instills a great deal of confidence in the dollar and in the nation's financial sector. Such independence may seem an abstraction, but it should be a tangible reality to legislators charged with overseeing the bank's work. If they don't get it, who will?

So it was discouraging watching these senators (on Wednesday) and House members (on Thursday) expending so much hot air trying to get the patient Bernanke to agree to any number of their legislative priorities or pet theories.

He endorsed certain approaches to affordable housing development, "good policies" (as opposed to bad policies?) to deal with the nation's aging population, the building of liquefied natural gas terminals, reducing government guarantees for anti-terrorism insurance, moves to force more transparency in CEO compensation packages, health insurance portability, more preschool programs and fewer "Law & Order" spinoffs.

OK, he didn't get into TV programming. But he could have. The point is that the chairman of the Federal Reserve should refuse to wade into any policy debates that exceed his reach. Although Bernanke did say President Bush's tax cuts have been a net positive for the economy, he resisted repeated entreaties from members of both parties to take sides on upcoming battles over tax policy. This is what tarnished Greenspan's independence. In one amusing aside on Wednesday, Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) tried to make a case for why it's appropriate to have the Fed chairman talk about education (something about it being an "input") but not tax policy.

Bernanke probably felt that he was weighing in on what he considered noncontroversial (if also nonrelevant) issues, but he'd be wise to stick to macroeconomic conditions and monetary policy. The Fed's credibility will be enhanced every time he says, "That's none of my business."

Back At Home, McCain Annoys The G.O.P. Right (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

SURPRISE, Ariz., Feb. 13 — The chairman of the local Republican Party here in the most populous county in Arizona has in his possession a bright yellow button with a black line slashed through the name McCain.

“I don’t wear it out very often,” said the chairman, Lyle Tuttle of the Maricopa County Republican Committee, in a slightly sheepish coda to a 20-minute vituperation about the state’s senior senator, served up from his living room chair.

“I think those who do not support Senator McCain,” Mr. Tuttle continued, “if they could just get the word out and help people to understand what has happened with him, we could have an impact.”

No doubt about it, Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who would like to be president, is a popular man in his state, having won re-election in 2004 with about 76 percent of the vote.

But a vocal slice of the state’s most conservative Republicans, reflecting concerns about Mr. McCain held by some conservatives nationwide, are agitating against him in a way that they hope might throw off his incipient presidential campaign.

In a recent telephone poll by Arizona State University, 54 percent of the state’s Republican voters who were queried favored Mr. McCain in a presidential primary next February, a small enough majority to incite his critics and encourage some Republican rivals.

“Arizona is one place where we are very well organized,” said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for the presidential campaign of Mitt Romney, the Republican and former Massachusetts governor.

“We think we can go out there and make the case on pro-family issues, on fiscal issues and on strong borders,” Mr. Madden added.

Meanwhile, disgusted with Mr. McCain’s position on proposed changes to immigration laws (he advocates legalization that would not require illegal immigrants to leave the country), with what some see as wavering on the issue of gay marriage (he lent his name to a state ballot initiative to ban it but did not support a constitutional amendment), and with the campaign finance act that bears his name, some Arizona Republicans are making trouble for Mr. McCain.

They have elected local party leaders whom he opposes, criticized his policy positions and thrown early support to other potential primary candidates — all in the hope of tripping up Mr. McCain on his own doorstep.

“They can make trouble for him,” said Bruce D. Merrill, an Arizona State University political scientist and polling expert. “It is too early in terms of voting to tell, but it certainly could potentially affect people’s decision to give him money.”

The senator’s supporters are quick to write off the detractors as a fringe of the raucous state party that will be flattened like pita bread once primary day arrives next year. As a practical matter, Mr. McCain’s supporters point out, Arizona’s large swaths of independent voters can vote in the Republican primary, which will be a boon to Mr. McCain even if he loses some votes within his own party.

"When I was a little kid, I was really into western movies," said Matt Salmon, former chairman of the Arizona Republican Party, who resigned with the intention to work for Mr. McCain's presidential campaign. "In one of those, the cavalry was outmanned by attacking Indians, so they put a bunch of branches on the backs of horses, who then kicked up a lot of dust to make it look like there were a lot more people than there were. These guys drag around a lot of branches and kick up a lot of dust."

Outnumbered or not, Mr. McCain's critics now hold leadership positions in Maricopa County, the state's most Republican enclave and biggest media market, which includes Phoenix. Their passion about the immigration issue, their flirtations with other candidates and their persistent harping underscore the skepticism about Mr. McCain that already exists among many hard-line conservatives here and around the nation.

They have been angered by Mr. McCain's opposition to tax cuts backed by the White House; by his immigration position, which places him on a collision course with other Republicans; by his moves to close a loophole on gun purchases; and by his vote for the fetal stem cell research bill.

The Maricopa County Republican Party recently conducted a straw poll that depicted Mr. McCain as losing badly to Representative Duncan Hunter of California, a conservative unknown to the majority of Arizona voters, then touted it with unmasked glee. The poll was derided as a sham by Mr. Merrill, the political scientist, and others who questioned the methodology.

Among some Republicans here, Mr. Romney, a Mormon who may benefit from his faith's strongholds around the state, is also mentioned as a viable alternative to Mr. McCain. Mr. Romney is supported by Joe Arpaio, the Maricopa County sheriff, among others.

Mr. McCain "can't just take it as a given that he is going to win here," said Randy Pullen, the new chairman of the Arizona Republican Party, who got the post by narrowly defeating a more moderate Republican backed by Mr. McCain. "He is going to have to work."

In some ways, Mr. McCain's troubles here reflect a fracas within the state party that has pit its more centrist members, long the stronghold of its leadership, against its most hard-line factions who call Mr. McCain "elitist."

For several years, various critics have complained that he has been aloof, that he has a brittle temper and that he has made missteps on key conservative issues.

Although Mr. McCain was ultimately victorious in the 2000 presidential primary, Gov. Jane Dee Hull of Arizona, a fellow Republican, took the unusual step of endorsing his opponent, George W. Bush, who was then Texas governor.

In 2001, two unsuccessful recall movements arose against the senator. In 2005, some groups around the state that advocate a strict deportation policy for illegal immigrants wrote letters of censure or displeasure attacking Mr. McCain for his stance. "The grass roots are burning mad," said Gary Watson, former chairman of the Mohave County Republican Central Committee. "We want to defend our borders. We don't want them to have citizenship."

So who would be better for Arizona?

"I am real excited about Rudy Giuliani," said Mr. Watson, even though the former New York mayor has a more liberal record on abortion rights, gun control and gay rights than Mr. McCain. "The social issues are a little bit looser than what I appreciate," Mr. Watson said. "But he is stronger than McCain on the border issue, and the border issue is so immense to deal with."

While much of the rumbling against Mr. McCain is among party leaders, they have managed to leave an impression among some voters.

"I could be persuaded to vote for someone else," Kathleen Hall, 60, a Republican who supported Mr. Bush in 2000, said as she sipped coffee in a Scottsdale outdoor mall this week. "McCain is not my favorite candidate. He would just as easily tomorrow turn into a Democrat."

Mr. McCain, who was elected to Congress from Arizona in 1982 and who succeeded Barry Goldwater in the Senate in 1986, does not appear to be shivering.

"Folks recognize that he is a principled and committed conservative who has delivered for his constituents," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for Mr. McCain's presidential exploratory committee.

And plenty of people think it is a fool's errand to try to prove otherwise.

"Anybody who thinks John McCain wouldn't win a Republican primary in Arizona is not living in the real world," said Mr. Merrill, the Arizona State University political scientist.

That does not mean they won't try.

"He would do a lot better in the general here than he would do in the primary," said Jack Hustead, who chairs the Apache County Republican Committee, "because in a primary, there are other options."

McCain To Preach Abstinence In S.C. (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, February 16, 2007

Most presidential candidates are trying to get people to say "yes." Republican Sen. John McCain will be encouraging South Carolina students to say "no."

The Arizona lawmaker is scheduled to speak Sunday night to about 1,500 middle and high school students about abstaining from premarital sex. Abstinence and abortion loom large as issues in this first-in-the-South primary state in the heart of the Bible Belt.

"Senator McCain has a long legislative record of supporting abstinence-based initiatives in his record in the U.S. Senate," said Trey Walker, McCain's South Carolina campaign director. "He thinks that abstinence is healthier and should be promoted in our society for young people."

The event is to follow McCain's appearance at a hot dog and ice cream social.

McCain is courting Christian conservatives in his bid for the GOP nomination. Recently, Christian leader James Dobson said he wouldn't support McCain because of his opposition to a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. McCain opposes gay marriage but says it should be regulated by the states.

Alexia Newman, who runs the Carolina Pregnancy Center, said her student rally is costing about $22,000. McCain isn't putting money into the event, but "if he wants to support this rally, that'd be great," Newman said.

"We're excited he would want to come and endorse what we're doing," she said. "It's going to be a high-energy night."

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — While Democratic Sen. Barack Obama has the backing of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, rival John Edwards is getting the endorsement of the state's Democratic Party chairman.

Former state legislator C. Richard Cranwell announced his support for the former North Carolina senator two days after officials with close ties to Kaine said the governor will back Obama.

"This indicates that Virginia is in play for the presidential sweepstakes for the first time in a long time," Cranwell said in an Associated Press interview Friday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Republican Newt Gingrich has a message for all the presidential candidates: it's just plain stupid to start running this early.

The former House Speaker who might end up being a candidate derided the early entry into the presidential race by so many candidates.

"I think the current process of spending an entire year running in order to spend an entire year running in order to get sworn in January 2009 is stupid," Gingrich said at a National Press Club event with Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer of New York.

"I wouldn't consider thinking about running for president prior to late September," said Gingrich.

The only reason to start this early, he said, was to line the pockets of the high-paid political consultants.

The man behind the 1994 "Contract with America" that won control of the House for the GOP said a big part of the problem was current finance laws that force candidates to spend so much of their time fundraising.

Gingrich and Schumer appeared together to promote books they had written.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) — Arkansas' ethics panel dismissed a complaint Friday against former Gov. Mike Huckabee over the presidential candidate's destruction of computer hard drives from his office.

By a 3-0 vote, the commission voted to dismiss the complaint filed last month against Huckabee. Jim Parsons of Bella Vista, Ark., accused Huckabee of violating the state's Freedom of Information Act by crushing the computer hard drives before he left office last month.

Graham Sloan, director of the commission, said the panel ruled that it did not have jurisdiction in the case.

"We're just not the enforcement agency with regard to the FOI," Sloan said.

Huckabee has defended the destruction of the drives, saying it was done to protect sensitive information such as employees' or constituents' Social Security numbers and credit card information.

Huckabee spent the remaining $13,000 in the governor's emergency fund to destroy the computer equipment before he left office Jan. 9.

Hard drives for 83 computers and four servers were destroyed, or crushed, after some information was downloaded onto backup tapes, the Department of Information Systems said.

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Tom Vilsack says being a punch line to Jay Leno's jokes is a plus.

"When you are just below the margin of error in polls, anything anybody says about you is important," Vilsack said Thursday on NBC's "Tonight Show."

In the show's opening skit, a security guard would not allow Vilsack on the set because he did not recognize him. Leno came to Vilsack's rescue and verified that he was a presidential candidate and the show's guest.

Though Leno often poked fun at Vilsack's relative obscurity in the presidential race, the former Iowa governor argued that his appearance with Leno will help his candidacy and distinguish him from the better-known candidates.

"I think any time you get an opportunity to be in front of a national audience, especially an opportunity to show an interesting life story, it's going to help," Vilsack told reporters during a conference call after the show's taping.

Leno ribbed Vilsack about having a small campaign staff and asked him how he would compete with candidates such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

"I saw your skeleton crew out there — two guys and a Hertz rent a car. How's that work?" Leno asked.

"Well, I'm not a rock star," Vilsack replied, "I'm rock solid."

Rudy Giuliani Visits Richmond (WDBJ)

WDBJ7.com, February 16, 2007

Rudy Giuliani met with some of Virginia's Republican Party before heading to a Richmond dinner designed to fatten his war chest.

The Republican is changing his focus from motivational speaking to running full-time for President. As someone who's seen first hand what terrorist are capable of on American soil, Giuliani says now is no time for the U.S. to show weakness in the Middle East.

The former mayor lived in the Commonwealth while working in the Ford administration. He is expected to be back a lot this year.

Giuliani would like to see the nation devote more resources to developing alternative energies. He campaigned for Jerry Kilgore when he ran for governor several years ago. Now Kilgore is returning the favor. He's organizing Republican support for Giuliani in the Old Dominion.

Another presidential hopeful hoping Virginia will play to his favor is Senator Barrack Obama. The Democrat will be in Richmond tomorrow for his own fundraiser. He's also expected to pick up an endorsement from Governor Tim Kaine.

Romney Explains '92 Vote For Tsongas (ABC)

By Jonathan Greenberger

ABCNews.com, February 16, 2007

Republican presidential candididate Mitt Romney offered a new explanation today for why he supported a Democrat in 1992.

That year, Romney, then a registered independent, voted for former Sen. Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Democratic presidential primary. He told ABC's George Stephanopoulos, in an interview that will air Sunday on "This Week," that his vote was meant as a tactical maneuver aimed at finding the weakest opponent for incumbent President George H.W. Bush.

"In Massachusetts, if you register as an independent, you can vote in either the Republican or Democratic primary," said Romney, who until he made an unsuccessful run for Senate in 1994 had spent his adult life as a registered independent. "When there was no real contest in the Republican primary, I'd vote in the Democrat primary, vote for the person who I thought would be the weakest opponent for the Republican."

But 12 years ago, the Boston Globe reported that Romney was giving a different explanation for his vote for Tsongas.

"Romney confirmed he voted for former U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas in the state's 1992 Democratic presidential primary, saying he did so both because Tsongas was from Massachusetts and because he favored his ideas over those of Bill Clinton," the Boston Globe's Scot Lehigh and Frank Phillips wrote on Feb. 3, 1994. "He added he had been sure the G.O.P. would renominate George Bush, for whom he voted in the fall election."

Romney's contention that his vote for Tsongas was a vote for the weakest opponent for Bush - a phenomenon that political scientists refer to as "raiding" - surprised Professor William Mayer of Northeastern University in Boston.

"That would have been a strange election to have done that in, in the sense that Paul Tsongas was obviously going to carry his home state" of Massachusetts, said Mayer. Tsongas won the Massachusetts primary with 66 percent of the vote.

While statistical evidence of "raiding" is hard to come by, Mayer said most political scientists believe it is rare, since typically only 3 to 4 percent of voters in a Republican primary are actually Democrats, and vice versa. It is rarer still, he said, for an independent, as Romney was, to "raid": "If you're so determined to help George Bush in 92 that you're willing to vote for Paul Tsongas, it probably means you weren't an independent."

Romney has previously come under fire for donating to a series of Democratic candidates in the 1992 election, including then-Congressmen Dick Swett, D-N.H., and John LaFalce, D-N.Y.

What Matters About Mitt Romney (WP)

By Stephen Stromberg

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

In 1967, a moderate governor of Michigan ran for the Republican presidential nomination and, for a time, was a favorite among many in the party. His support for the civil rights movement also gave him valuable crossover appeal. But after reversing course on the Vietnam War, his campaign fizzled.

What did not ruin George Romney's aspirations was his faith.

Like his son Mitt, George Romney was a devout Mormon. Religion, as the truism goes, is far more influential in American politics today than it was in the 1960s. Forty years after his father ran, Mitt Romney's faith has elicited a cover story in the New Republic, a front-page feature in the New York Times and obligatory mentions in otherwise standard coverage of the formal kickoff of his campaign this week. Romney, it seems, might be the first presidential candidate since Al Smith whose campaign suffers seriously because of his regular attendance at Sunday services.

Writers often note that evangelical voters, now considered consequential in Southern Republican primaries, distrust Mormons. It is too easy, however, to claim that the two Romney candidacies' differing challenges simply reflect the altered composition of Republican primary voters since 1968. In a recent Post-ABC News poll, 35 percent of respondents said they would be less likely to vote for a candidate who is Mormon.

Regular cover stories in news magazines, such as Time's "Mormons, Inc." in 1997, highlight the role Mormonism now plays in the popular imagination and reflect a widespread fascination with the church. Having grown up Mormon in West Los Angeles, I know that many Americans outside of evangelical communities are uncomfortable with Mormonism. Somehow, my particular religious identification, hardly my defining characteristic, was adequate grounds for my high school nickname -- Stormin' Mormon -- and the basis for seemingly endless grilling on the faith's eccentricities. The church's history of polygamy, for example, is off-putting to many. But Mormonism can provoke extreme reactions for deeper reasons.

After decades of explosive growth, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is no longer a relatively small, quirky, American-bred offshoot of Protestant Christianity but an increasingly influential institution that erects large temples in major cities, sends most of its young men on two-year proselytizing missions and operates big businesses across the country. The Mormons, critics say, are secretive and strange, and they are controlling more and more of your world.

The church's growth in power and prominence reflects its highly organized structure -- headed by a prophet who Mormons believe speaks for God -- that not only encourages but demands unusually active participation from congregants. To some outsiders, this can make it seem conspiratorial. On the lower- and middle-management levels, the church does not employ a professional clergy. Instead, everyday members are integrated into the institutional hierarchy and balance this responsibility with their professional lives. Romney himself has served as a stake president, an office loosely akin to that of a Catholic bishop. This fusion of laity and clergy means that rank-and-file Mormons are bound to the pronouncements of church leaders in a way that Catholic parishioners are not -- indeed, rank-and-file Mormons often are the ones implementing church policy.

Mormon culture also precludes the sort of passive association with the church that many Christian denominations in the United States tacitly allow. Members are either "active" or "inactive," and to remain in the former category, one must regularly attend Sunday services -- which run for three hours -- and accept a role such as choral director or Sunday school teacher or stake president. To be Mormon is to be an exceptionally committed participant in the community. This demanding communitarian streak strikes some as cultish, leading to the fear that Romney would be a tool of the church's First Presidency.

But regardless of how uncomfortable some of these characteristics make some feel, it is unproductive to focus on Romney's Mormonism. A candidate's faith, like that of an L.A. high school student or anyone else is ultimately a complex and personal phenomenon, even in the context of a highly centralized religious organization. My experience in Mormon congregations across the country has taught me that it is impossible to tell precisely how individual Mormons will apply their religious principles to their professional lives. And beyond encouraging hard work and honesty, the church itself is hardly definitive on the subject. Consider the divergent examples of other well-known Mormons -- those of Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), say.

No one but Romney can know how his beliefs might affect his judgment. Instead of focusing on his faith, it would be much more worthwhile for voters to judge Mitt Romney on his evolving political agenda -- as Republicans did when George Romney ran in 1967.

Washington Goes Hollywood: Democratic Hopefuls Seek Cash (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Campaign debates often turn on values. Next week, some important political players in Hollywood and Silicon Valley will demonstrate theirs: they like what's hip, new, attractive and future-oriented.

In the 1990s, that was Bill Clinton's breakthrough baby boomer presidency. In 2007, it's Barack Obama's multiracial, post-boomer candidacy.

That is why three luminous Hollywood names -- the Dreamworks trio of Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen -- are hosting an Obama fund-raiser in Los Angeles Tuesday. And it's why one of Mr. Obama's guides through Silicon Valley is Wade Randlett, an early Democratic force there through the TechNet advocacy group.

The two power centers represent increasingly important sources of Democratic campaign cash. The entertainment industry gave federal candidates $22 million in 2006 donations, according to the Web site opensecrets.org. That's more than either drug companies or the oil and gas industry. The $17 million from the high-tech industry lagged just behind those traditional powers. Nearly two-thirds of those entertainment checks went to Democrats, as did slightly more than half the high-tech money.

Hollywood will prove more hospitable. Antiwar sentiment is fiercer there, and Mr. Obama benefits from his early opposition to President Bush's Iraq policy in contrast to Hillary Clinton's 2002 vote to authorize the war. Silicon Valley keeps a closer eye on tax and regulatory policy, where Mr. Obama's views are less defined.

Mrs. Clinton -- soon to make her own northern California swing, including a visit to Google executives -- can boast of the shimmering New Economy boom on her husband's watch. And she will inherit important pieces of the financial machine that her campaign chairman, Terry McAuliffe, put together for Bill Clinton then. Media mogul Haim Saban, for instance, has signed up for Team Clinton once again.

The first woman with a prime shot at the presidency has some new backers, too. Legendary music producer Quincy Jones and executive Clarence Avant have agreed to help her -- especially valuable recruits this year because they, like Mr. Obama, are African-American.

"If those two put their shoulders to the wheel, that's a huge deal," says one of Mrs. Clinton's financial "Hill-raisers." That's a critical "if," because even the richest American can't contribute more than $2,300 to any candidate's primary campaign. In presidential fund raising, it takes a networker. Of course, the senator from New York has a potent financial network on Wall Street. The 2006 campaign donations from the securities and investment industries exceed those of Hollywood and Silicon Valley put together, opensecrets.org figures show.

The third top-tier Democrat, John Edwards, enjoys backing from fellow trial lawyers and lucrative ties to labor unions -- an even greater source of 2006 donations than securities and investment firms. But Mr. Obama's Left Coast trip next week makes clear he will prove a handful for both rivals in the early primary contest over money.

Young Voters Find Voice On Facebook (WP)

By Jose Antonio Vargas, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Site's Candidate Groups Are Grass-Roots Politics for the Web Generation

Late on the day that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) announced he was forming a presidential exploratory committee, Farouk Olu Aregbe logged on to Facebook.com, the popular online community where college students post profiles, share photos and blog. On a whim he created a group called "One Million Strong for Barack."

"I remember thinking, there's got to be more supporters out there," said Farouk, 26, who advises student government at the University at Missouri at Columbia.

Farouk's group had 100 members in the first hour. In less than five days, 10,000. By the third week, nearly 200,000. Yesterday, a month after he created the group, it had 278,100 members.

There are more than 500 Obama groups on Facebook. One of the first, "Students for Barack Obama," was created on July 7 by Meredith Segal, a junior at Bowdoin College who first heard of Obama when he gave the keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention in 2004. Instead of starting "a petition or something" to encourage the freshman senator to run for president, she turned to her Facebook page, created a group and invited people (first her friends, later strangers) to join.

Now it's a political action committee with nearly 62,000 members and chapters at 80 colleges, the most structured grass-roots student movement -- there's a director of field operations, an Internet director, a finance director and a blog team director -- in the presidential campaign so far. "Young people are on the Web," said Segal, 21. "That's how we're organizing."

Obama's Facebook supporters post photos of Obama on their pages alongside snapshots of birthday parties, nephews and girlfriends. They link to the latest Obama news ("Gov. Kaine of Va. to endorse Obama"), talk about their favorite Obama quotes ("I think mine is, 'I'm so overexposed, I'm making Paris Hilton look like a recluse' ") and engage in a 24-hour conversation about their candidate ("I told you guys sometime back that once Obama announces his candidacy, the sharks are going to come biting . . ."), linked to one another in the kind of community reserved for longtime players of World of Warcraft or incessant "American Idol" fans.

A few weeks ago, Segal's group staged a rally at George Mason University that drew an estimated 3,000 students -- and an appearance from Obama himself. This past Sunday, her group's Iowa State University chapter helped promote a rally that attracted more than 5,000.

While the Illinois senator's presidential campaign has outpaced his rivals in the enthusiasm it has generated on Facebook and other social-networking sites such as Friendster and MySpace, no one knows whether such online excitement can translate to votes.

Ask Howard Dean, the Web candidate of 2004. The Democratic former Vermont governor raised millions of dollars on the Web, generated huge amounts of buzz and then learned during the Iowa caucuses that online excitement did not guarantee offline foot soldiers -- or the right foot soldiers in a state that likes its volunteers homegrown.

Meetup.com helped energize the Dean campaign, but more sophisticated social-networking sites such as Facebook, Friendster and MySpace were not a factor during the 2004 election. A recent Pew Research Center poll, however, reported that 54 percent of 18-to-25-year-olds have used them. And Joe Trippi, who spearheaded Dean's e-campaign, is among those who believe they will play a significant role in the current race.

"It took our campaign six months to get 139,000 people on an e-mail list," Trippi said. "It took one Facebook group, what, barely a month to get 200,000? That's astronomical."

Peter Levine, deputy director of the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, a nonpartisan research center at the University of Maryland that studies young potential voters, predicts what he calls "the Facebook Effect."

"Everybody -- the pundits, the online strategists -- have been waiting for the first candidate to really hit a home run with the social-networking sites," Levine said. "Obama's message is attractive to a certain type of young person. He's saying: 'You have a role to play. This is about you. About your role.' There's a real hunger for that kind of message."

Added Todd Zeigler of the Bivings Group, a D.C.-based Internet communications firm that works with Republicans: "The key point here is that the support for Obama on these social-networking sites is not being driven by the campaign itself. It is something spontaneous as opposed to something the campaign itself is orchestrating. This shows a real enthusiasm for Obama's candidacy among young people that you aren't seeing for any other candidates at this point."

Obama's main Democratic opponents, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.), have also used the Web to speak directly to voters, sidestepping mainstream media. But the Illinois senator's campaign seems to have taken some of its cues from sites such as Facebook. The campaign Web site, launched last Saturday, allows visitors to blog, keep track of their fundraising contributions, make a list of events and so on. And there is a Facebook link at the bottom of his home page.

K. Daniel Glover, who edits National Journal's Technology Daily, said that for candidates, "it's all about using the Internet to connect to people," the same way candidates connect with the local precinct chairmen and state party officials. But Glover cautioned against expecting too much from the Internet, especially when it comes to younger voters. "I don't think anyone is going to be elected because he/she is all the rage on Facebook," he said.

Clinton has about the same number of Facebook groups as Obama, but the largest has only about 3,000 members, and many of the sites are maintained by opponents. For every group called "African-Americans for Hillary Rodham Clinton" (95 members), there is a group called "A second Bush was bad enough, don't give me a second Clinton" (55 members). Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has some presence on the site; a group called "John McCain in 2008" has 1,617 members. And though Obama himself has a few detractors -- a group that calls itself "Anybody That Would Support Barack Obama for President is a Moronic Liberal" has 424 members -- no one comes close to his overall popularity.

At 11 a.m. yesterday, "One Million Strong for Barack" had 278,100 members. Two and a half hours later, 278,537. Three hours later, 279,070.

Obama Stirs Columbia Crowd Of 3,000 (GAN)

By Ron Barnett
Gannett, February 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134283

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Barak Obama made his first campaign stop Friday in South Carolina, delivering a rousing can-do message to an enthusiastic crowd of 3,000 at Columbia's convention center.

"I don't believe in this can't-do, won't-do, won't-even-try style of leadership," the senator from Illinois said, drawing chants of "Yes, we can!" from the sign-waving throng.

Hitting one of the early primary states in the first week since announcing his candidacy for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination, Obama told supporters he doesn't believe those who say a black man can't be elected.

"Twenty years ago, nobody would have believed this crowd in South Carolina," he said of the racially mixed group.

He tried to distance himself from his rivals in the primary about the situation in Iraq, saying, "I'm proud of the fact that I was against this war from the start."

He talked about divisive politics preventing solutions to problems in health care, education and foreign policy.

He didn't mention the state's contentious Confederate flag display. The NAACP has called for a boycott of tourism in South Carolina over the presence of the flag on statehouse grounds, a few blocks from where Obama spoke.

Some who came to see Obama said they hadn't made up their minds about him but liked what they had seen.

"He's a family man, and I love his position on health care," said Kindle Johnson, a 30-year-old lawyer from Rock Hill, S.C., who was trying to decide between Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.

Reg Blair, a 43-year-old music professor at the University of South Carolina, said he is pretty much sold on the first-term senator from Chicago.

"I haven't been so inspired by a presidential candidate in a long time," he said. "I think he's the hope of the Democratic Party."

Obama wooed the crowd with his easy demeanor, joking about his "funny name" and looking even taller than 6-foot-2 on a square boxing-ring-sized stage.

He gave a brief history lesson, with each chapter, from the Revolutionary War to the Civil War to women's suffrage to the Civil Rights movement, illustrating that Americans have always done what conventional wisdom said couldn't be done.

"Each generation said we can do better than we're doing right now," he said. "Sometimes I feel like that spirit has been lost in America."

The crowd grew quiet as he spoke of 9/11 and his view of the mistakes the Bush administration made in its aftermath.

"Four hundred billion dollars, more than 3,000 lives, and we still see no end in sight," he said of the war in Iraq. "We've got to match our military might with the strength of our diplomacy."

He spoke of diverting money from the war to education and trimming inefficiencies out of the health care system if he is elected.

"There is no reason why by the end of the next president's term — by the end of my term — that we can't have affordable health care for every person in this country," he said, drawing cheers from the crowd.

He said South Carolina could benefit from his energy proposals for more home-grown bio-fuel and said America now sends $800 billion a year for oil to "some of the most hostile countries on earth."

"We end up funding both sides of the war on terrorism," he said.

Edwards' Populist Spirit Resonates With Silicon Valley Insiders (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, in an informal living room discussion this week with about 150 Silicon Valley insiders, said the Bush administration has failed America by demonstrating "enormous incompetence" at home in areas such as responding to Hurricane Katrina and abroad in Iraq.

The former North Carolina senator said that in the year and a half since Hurricane Katrina, "billions have been allocated" for rebuilding New Orleans without major relief to the vast numbers of poor residents.

"Is there any change? No, I can't see it," said Edwards, who announced his candidacy from New Orleans. "Where is that money?"

And in Iraq, where the president has called for increasing the number of troops by 21,500, he said, "the incompetence is almost beyond comprehension."

"I voted for this war. And I was wrong," he said. But it is "not enough for us to pass a resolution and give speeches" to condemn the president's troop increase, Edwards said to applause. "It's time for us to stop going along."

Edwards' shirtsleeves appeal during an intimate evening of dinner and conversation was delivered in the Woodside home of influential venture capitalist Andy Rappaport and his wife, Deborah -- both generous philanthropists and major donors to progressive political causes. With his under-the-radar trip to the Bay Area, Edwards, the Democratic Party's vice presidential candidate in 2004, displayed his strengths as a populist candidate who marshals the battle-hardened campaign experience of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the oratory gifts of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama -- the other leading Democratic presidential candidates.

Edwards' visit also dramatized how Silicon Valley has cemented its importance as the Hollywood North of presidential politics -- a required stop where candidates seek campaign cash and support among influence-wielding leaders in the capital of high tech.

Another Democratic presidential contender, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, used the setting of the Commonwealth Club of California in San Francisco this week to unveil a detailed policy to control greenhouse gas emissions, a favorite topic of Silicon Valley, where innovators are rushing to create green technologies. And Republican presidential candidate Rudolph Giuliani, the former New York mayor, addressed the Churchill Club in Santa Clara last week to talk up his leadership experience to tech leaders.

Obama is scheduled to meet Monday with tech gurus -- and has done his own culling of the area. Earlier this month, he addressed a conference call that packed supporters into a Peninsula home and raised $300,000 in about an hour, sources said.

Several of the guests at Edwards' talk this week said they also will attend a San Francisco lunch Friday for Clinton that will be hosted by major Democratic donor Susie Tompkins Buell.

In Woodside, Edwards' audience reflected the diverse profile of many of the valley's leaders: Some were longtime admirers, some were candidate shopping and some were Republicans disenchanted with their own candidates.

David desJardins, one of Google's early engineers and now a venture capitalist and consultant, said he and his wife, author Nancy Blachman, were happy to write checks to Edwards -- in addition to other leading Democrats such as Obama and Clinton -- to ensure that it is "not money, but ideas" that decide the Democratic race.

"We're feeling so positive that we have at least three good candidates," said Emy Thurber, a state Democratic Party official. "Edwards has a powerful message ... Hillary is so capable and skillful ... and Obama is smart, bright and young, with a great resume."

Still undecided, she said she would attend Bay Area fundraisers for Obama on Monday and Clinton on Friday.

Other Democratic presidential hopefuls include longtime Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Edwards, in his talk, addressed a range of issues that clearly resonated with many in the group: the war in Iraq, and matters closer to home such as the need to address what he called the "moral issue" of poverty in America and the opportunity gap.

"If we're not the party that stands up for the little guy, you tell me," he said, "who's going to do it?

"We need a president who actually believes in the capacity of our people ... to rise and create change. The power in America is not just in the Oval Office," he said motioning around the room to a crowd of nodding heads. "It's out here."

The former senator also encouraged debate from the politically attuned audience -- and, even in this wealthy crowd, stood his ground among those who questioned increased taxes on those making more than $200,000 a year to pay for his universal health care plan.

With some presidential hopefuls promising to trim the national deficit without raising taxes and tackle the expensive issue of health care, Edwards responded, "you can't have both. It's a lie to say you can have both."

Richardson Says NH His Early Top Priority (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 17, 2007

MANCHESTER – New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says he will focus more time, staff and resources to New Hampshire than to any other early primary or caucus state.

In an interview yesterday as he began a two-day swing through the first-primary state, the Democratic Presidential candidate said he will participate in a debate scheduled for April 5, to be sponsored by CNN, WMUR and the New Hampshire Union Leader.

He said that as a Westerner, he "must do well" in Nevada, where the Democratic National Committee has scheduled a new caucus after Iowa's traditional lead-off event but before the New Hampshire primary.

But, he said, "for me, New Hampshire is going to be my main state to concentrate on, staff-wise, resources. I consider this a breakthrough state for me."

Richardson said last summer he will campaign in New Hampshire even if Secretary of State William Gardner sets the primary for a date at odds with the DNC's calendar. He would risk losing any delegates won in New Hampshire by doing so.

DOJ_NMG_0134285

Richardson said, "New Hampshire is very important because it's the state that everybody considers the state that leads to the Presidency, and I don't mind saying that. We've got to compete in every state, but New Hampshire will be the top priority for me."

Richardson said that while other Democratic candidates running for office may be receiving big endorsements, he has the most experience in the field as a current governor and former congressman, ambassador and energy secretary.

"I've actually done some of the things that need to be done" as President, he said.

Richardson yesterday planned to campaign in downtown Manchester, Concord, Tilton and Holderness and plans to be in Manchester, Concord, Portsmouth and Hampton today.

Richardson Urges Diplomacy In Mideast (AP)

By Beverley Wang

AP, February 16, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Bill Richardson said Friday that President Bush should learn from recent successes with North Korea and engage in intense diplomatic negotiations in the Middle East to end the Iraq war.

"He finally used diplomacy and it works," Richardson said on the first day of a two-day visit to the early voting state of New Hampshire. "My hope is that he uses that lesson ... to talk to Syria about Hezbollah and Iraq, and that he talks to Iran about getting out of Iraq and stop their meddling there.

"I believe that a good concrete dialogue with those two countries — with the U.S. having tough smart positions — could achieve something," the New Mexico governor said during a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

Richardson campaigned in the early voting state after raising $2 million at a fundraiser in New Mexico on Thursday. The total puts him in good standing in the Democratic race although he isn't as well known as some of his rivals.

Richardson, a former U.N. ambassador who has negotiated with North Korea and Saddam Hussein, said his own Iraq plan combines diplomacy with a troop withdrawal by the end of 2007.

Diplomacy could take two paths, he said. The United States should negotiate with Iraq's three main ethnic groups to set territorial boundaries and divide the government and control over oil.

The United States also should lead talks with Iran, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt to get their cooperation in securing and rebuilding Iraq.

"I believe that would at least give Iraq a chance to keep itself together and not be overrun by a sectarian conflict," he said.

On the same day the U.S. House passed a nonbinding resolution rebuking the president's decision to send more troops to Iraq, the former congressman said Congress should have spent time working on a resolution to bring a real end to the war.

"A nonbinding resolution I believe is just being done for cover for members that want to vote a certain way," he said. "They're worried about their re-election prospects."

Richardson: War Vote Should Decide Control (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 17, 2007

MANCHESTER – Congress should stop focusing on nonbinding resolutions and should vote instead on whether to take back from President Bush its 2002 authorization for the U.S. participation in the war in Iraq, Democratic Presidential candidate Bill Richardson said yesterday.

The New Mexico governor and former United Nations ambassador, congressman and Clinton administration energy secretary said he favors a "withdrawal with honor and dignity and efficiency." A "de-authorization" vote "would be based on the War Powers Act, and it would be the first statement on the war," he said.

The House yesterday passed a resolution disapproving of Bush's troop "surge" while pledging that Congress will "support and protect" the troops. The Senate is scheduled to take up the measure today.

But Richardson said lawmakers "should stop voting on resolutions that mean nothing."

In the first of a two-day New Hampshire campaign swing, Richardson said Bush should "use the lesson he just learned in North Korea," where he won a nuclear weapons agreement by having his administration negotiate directly with the North Korean government.

Richardson said a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq should be used as "leverage" for diplomacy. The United States should try to bring Iran, Syria, Egypt and Saudi Arabia into negotiations on "security and reconstruction."

At the same time, he said, the United States should convene a "reconciliation conference" in Iraq to include the Sunnis, the Shiia and the Kurds.

DOJ_NMG_0134286

"You force them to have a coalition government, to divide up oil revenues, divide up the territory, not as separate countries, but territorial boundaries," he said.

Negotiating with Iran and Syria "won't be easy, but you can deliver benchmarks and tougher messages by talking directly to them, and you can see if there are areas of common ground."

Voting to de-authorize the war "would mean the President would lose the authority to conduct the war" but not immediately cut funding for the troops, Richardson said. "It would be the clearest legal message the President would get, and he would be forced to find a way to stop the war and engage in diplomacy.

"You withdraw with honor and dignity and efficiency, and you set up this diplomatic structure," he said.

Richardson supported Bush's call for more troops for Afghanistan, but said, "We're overstretched. I don't know where he's going to get them" while still conducting war in Iraq.

Richardson said the United States "is very vulnerable to oil shock, which will affect our national security." He said that as President, he would call for "an Apollo-like, man-on-the-moon effort" to reduce U.S. dependence on oil from 65 percent to 10 percent in 10 years.

"Not a little energy bill here and there," he said. "This will take massive public and private investment, tax incentives to develop renewable technologies." He would set fuel efficiency requirements at 40 miles per gallon and "concentrate on efficient fuels."

He would also promote "green buildings, solar roofs in schools, and retrofit homes for energy efficiency, more efficient air conditioning, more efficient lighting. And we will conserve, and the federal government will do its part."

Nuclear power "has to be on the table," Richardson said, "because it doesn't have greenhouse gas emissions. But what do you do with the waste? That has to be resolved."

He said that as energy secretary from 1998 to 2001, he issued an order that air conditioners had to be 30 percent more energy-efficient.

"The air-conditioning companies got mad," he said. "Bush came in; they reversed my order. But then we went to court and won.

"We tried to be more energy-efficient, but we didn't push as much as we should have," Richardson said. "I'm not blameless. We pushed, but the Congress wouldn't accept it. Big oil is still very strong."

But he said he does not advocate big taxes on oil. "Let's find ways for big oil to invest more in refining capacity and renewable energy and drilling in America," but not in the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR).

Richardson, asked how he differs from the other Democratic candidates, cited his endorsement last October by the National Rifle Association.

"I'm a hunter," he said. "I respect the Second Amendment. I'm not for assault weapons, but I'm a Westerner, and (hunting) is part of the culture."

He supports the death penalty for "the most heinous of crimes," is pro-choice and supports domestic unions, but opposes gay marriage.

On fiscal policies, Richardson said, he supports tax cuts for the middle class, including in capital gains. He said he would also cut taxes "for companies that pay more than the prevailing wage. I've had tax cuts for companies for technology start-ups" in New Mexico.

"The Democratic Party, our first solution is to tax, and I'm not of that school," he said.

Richardson supports universal health care programs similar to those in Massachusetts and California, "where you have mandates and incentives for workers and companies. It's a partnership that has to happen between hospitals, doctors and patients and the state and federal governments."

But, he said, "I believe you finance it through the budget. I would not be for financing it by new taxes."

He proposes ending congressional earmarks and would spend on community colleges some of the money saved by ending the Iraq war.

Sen. Joe Biden Touts His Plan For Iraq (AP)

By Henry C. Jackson, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

Sen. Joe Biden said he is the only Democratic presidential candidate who has a plan for Iraq, dismissing the ideas of other contenders as tactics that would leave the Middle East in peril. "They have tactics, not a plan," Biden told The Associated Press on Friday.

"What are they going to do, stop the civil war? ... There's a lot of people who have ideas about how to get out, but not many ideas about how to leave something more stable behind."

DOJ_NMG_0134287

The Delaware senator, opening a three-day swing through Iowa, spoke during an interview at the Ames Municipal Airport before heading to the Story County Democrats Soup Supper for a speech.

Biden expounded on his plans for Iraq during the interview, and touted himself as the Democrat with the best and broadest knowledge of foreign policy.

Biden said violence in Iraq could be alleviated if the country implements what he calls a federal system, in which Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis would be divided into separate regions to avoid conflict.

"The only way you get control is if one of three things happen," he said. "One, one side wins in a bloodbath, ... two, the desire to fight expires, ... or three, you install a federal system."

Biden said his plan for Iraq and years of service on the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee, which he chairs, would allow him to make a compelling case to voters.

"I think the next president will have to show a depth and breadth of knowledge in national security matters," he said. "They'll need to have the right plans and right ideas."

Biden said he believes his campaign will overcome remarks he made earlier this month about fellow contender Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill. Biden called Obama the "first mainstream" black to run for president, and referred to him as "clean" and "articulate."

Biden reiterated his previous apologies and noted that his campaign had secured the support of prominent black leaders since his comments.

"I think we're beyond that," he said. "And the good news is that I have a 35-year record on civil rights.

"But I'm not going to compliment anyone anymore. I should have been more sensible."

Biden's trip to Iowa is his first since formally announcing a presidential bid. The trip got off to a bumpy start Friday: An event at a veterans home in Marshalltown was canceled after bad weather forced Biden's airplane to land in Indiana.

Biden was also scheduled to depart Iowa early Saturday morning to return to Washington for a rare Saturday session of the Senate. Democrats need 60 votes to advance a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to boost the number of U.S. forces in Iraq.

"It's just too important," Biden said of the Iraq vote.

The vote meant Biden had to cancel several events he had been scheduled to attend on Saturday, though he planned to fly back to Davenport for a Democratic Party event. He also had a handful of events scheduled on Sunday in Iowa, which will open the presidential nominating season in January with its precinct caucuses.

Texas Senator Bucks Trend, Stands Solidly By Bush (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

In a sea of Republican doubt, Sen. John Cornyn of Texas is all about certainty.

He is certain that President Bush's decision to send more troops into battle is the right move. He is certain that Democratic war thinking is wrong. Despite the growing misgivings of so many GOP lawmakers, Cornyn is certain that the United States should stay in Iraq until the job is done.

The freshman senator is such a throwback to the early days of GOP fealty to Bush that his Senate Web site includes a "compassionate conservatism" link. Choosing survival over solidarity, other Republicans are seeking political cover. Cornyn, 55, is one of 20 GOP senators up for reelection in 2008, but he is trying a different strategy from most of the others: unwavering loyalty.

He not only supports Bush's troop-increase plan, but he describes any alternative in the starkest possible terms. "Are we going to allow Iraq to become another failed state which will then serve as a launching pad for future terrorist attacks, perhaps including against the United States?" Cornyn asked during a recent Senate floor speech.

"Now is not the time to choose a path of retreat and defeat -- as many of the [Howard] Dean Democrats would have us follow," he said in defending Bush's anti-terrorism strategy.

Cornyn opposes a nonbinding resolution approved by the House yesterday that criticizes Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq. The Senate is scheduled to meet in a special weekend session today to decide whether to begin debating that resolution.

Cornyn is a favorite at the White House, but his unalloyed defense of Bush's Iraq policies have some back home wondering whether he has gone too far.

"He's pretty much married himself to the president and to Karl" Rove, Bush's top political adviser, said Harvey Kronberg, editor of the Quorum Report political newsletter. "I'm just speculating, but we like to see a modest amount of independence here in Texas."

DOJ_NMG_0134288

With his white hair and tall, regal bearing, Cornyn showed up in Washington in January 2003 as a Bush insider. He had a long friendship with Rove and possessed a nickname bestowed upon him by the president: "Corndog." Speaking at a campaign event before Cornyn's election, Bush called the former Texas attorney general "a man who can help us get some things done to make America a safer and stronger and better place for all of us."

The new senator's White House connections gave him instant clout. Cornyn won a seat on the high-profile, and highly partisan, Judiciary Committee and quickly took a prominent role in several major political battles, including a long-running dispute with Democrats over some of Bush's most conservative judicial nominees.

He gained a reputation as a vocal, if somewhat predictable, advocate for the conservative agenda. The one area where Cornyn has broken with Bush is immigration -- the senator has staked out a more conservative position. Having formerly served on the Texas Supreme Court, Cornyn is particularly bothered by "activist" judges, whom he accuses of promoting liberal causes from the bench.

The Democrats' takeover of Congress last fall was a wake-up call for many Republicans to begin distancing themselves from the White House. Cornyn himself branched out recently by teaming up with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) on a tobacco-regulation bill and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) on a homeland security funding measure.

On the war, however, he has been unwavering in his support of Bush.

Cornyn has sided with Bush on a series of controversial, war-related issues. He endorsed a White House proposal for trying "unlawful enemy combatants" that sought to limit Geneva Conventions protections. When the National Security Agency's secret program to intercept international telephone calls from the United States was revealed, Cornyn called it a "useful tool" to protect Americans from terrorism. He was one of nine senators to oppose an amendment to ban the use of "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" against anyone in U.S. government custody.

Some Republican war supporters, most notably Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), have harshly criticized Bush's handling of the conflict. Cornyn resists any such talk. In a recent CNN interview, Wolf Blitzer put him on the spot with the question, "How much of a credibility problem does the Bush administration have right now?"

Cornyn smoothly deflected. "Well, the problem is, Wolf, we have so many members of the United States Senate who are running for 2008, I think we need to put this in a larger context. But the fact of the matter is that we need to do whatever we can to protect our troops. And the fact is that the Iranians are very much involved in what's happening in Iraq right now."

Pressed on the subject in an interview, Cornyn conceded, "Clearly no war is going to proceed without mistakes, and I think there have been mistakes made."

Cornyn is not surprised that some of his Republican colleagues are turning skittish on Bush. "That's a function of the president's [poor] approval rating. When it's soaring, people are rallying around him. When his numbers are in the tank, that is diminished. But I really do believe that this is more important than the next election and who's up and who's down in Washington," Cornyn said.

The lack of daylight between Bush and Cornyn, particularly over the war, has raised a few eyebrows among Democrats and within Texas political circles.

"He needs to more clearly stand on his own two feet and stop saying, 'I agree with the president,' " said Cal Jillson, a Southern Methodist University political scientist.

"Even in Texas, total fidelity to George Bush is not the wisest move, substantively or politically," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the Senate Democrats' campaign chairman. "The whole world is changing. There's an opening in every part of the country, including in Texas, like there wasn't even five years ago."

Democrats' political prospects in Texas brightened considerably last year, after a Democrat captured the seat of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R) in the general election and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez won a surprisingly convincing victory over Rep. Henry Bonilla (R), in a December runoff election in the massive 23rd Congressional District.

A few weeks later, the Texas Blue, a progressive Web site, raised the question of Cornyn's potential vulnerability. The evidence: two years of monthly tracking polls that showed Cornyn's job approval rating barely breaking 45 percent and a random sample of Texas residents conducted in December that detected a slight shift in favor toward Democrats.

Cornyn questioned the tracking poll's methodology, noting the firm, Survey USA, relies on recorded "robocalls," rather than using live agents to query voters. But his reaction suggested he had seen the numbers. He has raised $3.2 million for his 2008 campaign, more than any other incumbent GOP senator.

"I'm preparing for whatever happens," Cornyn said.

California Gives Stem Cell Research Grants (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134289

BURLINGAME, Calif., Feb. 16 (AP) — California's stem cell agency gave out nearly $45 million in research grants to about 20 state universities and nonprofit research laboratories on Friday, far exceeding the federal government's annual outlays for stem cell work.

In issuing the first significant research grants in its two-year history, the agency, the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine, became the biggest financial backer of human embryonic stem cell research.

Stanford University researchers were the biggest winners, receiving 12 grants worth a combined $8 million, including the first publicly financed human embryo cloning project.

The Salk Institute in San Diego and the J. David Gladstone Institute in San Francisco were among the 10 nonprofit research centers receiving grants.

Next month, another round of 25 grants worth about $80 million will go to established stem cell scientists.

Loans Launch State's Stem Cell Ambitions (LAT)

By Mary Engel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

California draws on public money, awarding about $45 million to 20 research institutions.

SAN FRANCISCO — Public money began flowing to embryonic stem cell research Friday for the first time since Californians voted to make their state a haven for a scientific endeavor that the Bush administration refused to fund on moral grounds.

Drawing on a state loan, the board created to oversee the ambitious enterprise awarded 72 grants to 20 institutions statewide for a total of about $45 million.

The funding is a fraction of the decade-long, $300-million-a-year juggernaut voters approved under 2004's Proposition 71, the Stem Cell Research and Cures Act. But it signaled the determination of the voter-created California Institute for Regenerative Medicine to make the state a player in the nascent field even as the bonds remain frozen by litigation.

"We can't afford to wait when it comes to advancing a life-saving science," Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday at a news conference.

To tide the state over during the lawsuits, Schwarzenegger arranged the $150-million state loan last summer on the day that President Bush vetoed legislation aimed at loosening federal funding restrictions.

Bush has expressed moral concerns about destruction of embryos during such research, as have several plaintiffs in the California lawsuits.

The state money exceeds the $38 million the National Institutes of Health spent on human embryonic stem cell research nationwide in 2006. Federal funding is limited to research on 22 embryonic stem cell lines — each one a group of cells derived from the same embryo — that existed before August 2001, the day President Bush announced his policy.

"We all know every marathon starts with a first step," the governor said. "But let's take that first step. Let's start the marathon. Let's not hold it up."

Schwarzenegger, on crutches because of his December skiing accident and flanked by people in wheelchairs, called the scientists doing stem cell research "our newest action heroes."

The grants were a bonanza for the UC system, with UC San Francisco receiving eight; UCLA seven; UC San Diego and UC Irvine six each; UC Riverside, UC Santa Cruz, UC Davis and UC Berkeley receiving two each. Even the new UC Merced got one. The biggest winner was Stanford University, which took home 12 grants. USC received four. The private nonprofit Burnham Institute for Medical Research in La Jolla received eight.

All 72 grants ranged from $251,000 to $808,000.

Friday's two-year grants, aimed at young scientists and established veterans new to stem cell research, give a hint of the promise and challenges of this field of medical research. The work has generated both hope and hype since scientists at the University of Wisconsin derived the first human embryonic stem cells just eight years ago.

For the grant-awarding process, a group of 15 scientists from outside California and eight patient advocates from the institute's oversight board ranked 231 proposals.

The top-scoring proposal, drawing $612,000, was from UC San Diego. It will look for the signal that triggers a human embryonic stem cell to develop into a particular type of brain neuron. Stem cells are able to form into any kind of cell in the body.

"If successful," the proposal's synopsis reads, "these experiments would provide a therapeutic strategy for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease and other disorders that are characterized by loss of forebrain neurons."

It went without saying that such a result, if it is achieved at all, would involve years of research beyond the two funded by the grant.

"The project may not work but the applicant is the right researcher to try it," wrote the reviewers.

DOJ_NMG_0134290

The board originally intended to award 30 grants for a total of about $24 million, but it increased the number of grants after seeing the scope and quality of the proposals, said Robert Klein, an influential backer of Proposition 71 and chairman of the oversight board.

"It's a historic opportunity to make a difference," Klein said.

After more than 12 hours of deliberation Thursday night and Friday morning, the full board made selections from the proposals, which were numbered and had the names of institutions and people removed. The institute staff advised board members, many of whom work for universities or institutions with proposals, on when to recuse themselves because of a possible conflict of interest.

The process drew some complaints from two government watchdog groups, which pointed out that Connecticut, which funds a much smaller stem cell research effort, identified all the institutions and scientists it awarded by name, including those rejected. The groups called on the board to publish the names of the California institutions that applied for grants but were denied.

But even they praised the spirited discussions and lengthy deliberations that went into choosing the grantees.

"Many of us had expressed concern that the board would act as a rubber stamp and not delve into this in a serious way," said John Simpson of Santa Monica-based Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights. "This is a very good process."

The litigation that has held up funding from the bond was brought by taxpayer groups and religious organizations. On Wednesday, a state appellate court heard oral arguments on the plaintiffs' appeal of a decision by the Alameda County Superior Court in April that upheld the constitutionality of the institute and its citizen oversight committee. The plaintiffs have said they will go to the California Supreme Court if necessary.

The state loan is to be repaid by bond money if the stem cell institute wins the lawsuit.

"They're on their own if they lose the litigation," said Ted Costa, who heads People's Advocate, a Sacramento-based taxpayer organization that is one of the plaintiffs.

Friday's awards were the first in a batch of three to be issued this spring, all funded by the state loan. The next will go to experienced stem cell scientists and the third to help fund shared laboratories.

The board named Friday's grants in honor of Dr. Leon J. Thal, the chairman of UC San Diego's neurosciences department who died this month in a plane crash. The renowned expert on Alzheimer's disease was a member of the oversight board.

Two Liberals Walk Into A Bar... (LAT)

By Martin Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

To many blue state-types, the Fox News Channel is already funny. But this weekend the media outlet famous for its patriotic fervor and red state champion Bill O'Reilly will try to be intentionally so.

Intended by its conservative creators as a counterbalance to "The Daily Show" and "The Colbert Report" on Comedy Central, "The 1/2 -Hour News Hour" premieres Sunday at 7 p.m. and will satirize current events and pop culture from a distinctly right of center viewpoint. Much like the 24-hour news channel itself, the show is out to fill a void in the marketplace, which the show's creators perceive as decidedly liberal.

"We thought it would be fun to have some unabashedly conservative entertainment," said Manny Coto, one of the show's creators and executive producers. "Our audience will be the millions who tune in to Rush Limbaugh and like-minded people who want that same kind of acerbic commentary and liberal bashing they get on his radio show everyday."

Added Ned Rice, another one of the show's creators and writers: "We're after the half of the country that doesn't think Jon Stewart is the only comedy that is needed."

Their show opens with something unlikely to be seen anytime soon on Stewart's "The Daily Show" or "Saturday Night Live." Limbaugh appears as the president of the United States and acid-tongued author Ann Coulter is his vice president.

The skit takes place in 2009 and is a joke, of course. Limbaugh was corralled into appearing in the skit by Joel Surnow, the show's executive producer and creator. The two struck up a friendship four years ago as a result of Limbaugh's enthusiasm for Surnow's hugely successful action-thriller program, "24."

(Surnow himself was the subject of an unflattering profile in the Feb. 19 issue of the New Yorker magazine. In it, he jokingly referred to himself as a "right wing nut job" — a description the story implicitly argues might actually be accurate. Surnow has been highly critical of the piece.)

So far, Fox News Channel has ordered only two episodes of "The 1/2 -Hour News Hour." The first one will receive an "encore" presentation Feb. 25, and a new second show is slated to air March 4.

Surnow is confident that even with minimal ratings, the show will be greenlighted for weekly production. That could happen, he added, as early as next week.

DOJ_NMG_0134291

Even with the considerable success of "24," Surnow still had trouble getting the show on the air. The Fox network, which airs "24," turned it down. But thanks to a long-standing friendship with Fox News Chairman Roger Ailes, Surnow was able to convince the executive to give his new show a chance.

"I don't know how many people have been pitching shows like this," said Surnow. "But up to now, the ones that get on seem to be pretty liberal leaning."

Hollywood isn't exactly choking on a conservative talent pool, Surnow said, who nevertheless rejected the idea a liberal agenda has suppressed a program like his in the past.

"I just don't think there are a lot of conservative writers and most of them are probably apolitical or lean some to the left," he said. "There may be a little barrier to entry, but talent will eventually mow those down."

The " 1/2 -Hour News Hour" is structured in a mock news format like "The Daily Show," but instead of a single anchor, there are two. As billed, the first show takes aim at Democratic politicians, environmentalists and the American Civil Liberties Union.

In one bit, an anchor states that, if elected to the White House, Hillary Rodham Clinton has vowed to pick a diverse cabinet — of "angry lesbians."

In another bit, it's reported that Iran, the recent host of an international conference denying the Holocaust, is now denying that the meeting was ever held.

"There are too many liberal sacred cows," said Coto, who is also an executive producer on "24." "Like Hillary Clinton may get an occasional swipe here and there, but they don't go after them the way they go after Bush or Cheney."

The show released a clip earlier this week on the YouTube website mocking the media's hyperventilation over the presidential bid of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

The clip quickly climbed up the viral video charts with hundreds of thousands of hits by midweek. Of course, it's unclear whether viewers found the bit funny or were merely curious about the conservative stab at political humor.

What are liberal critics going to think of the show?

"They're going to love it," joked Surnow. "They're going to have another place to shoot all their arrows."

Fox News Takes On Jon Stewart (POL)

By Helena Andrews

The Politico, February 16, 2007

This Sunday at 10 p.m., Fox News Channel will debut a news/comedy hybrid the network hopes will deflate the crush young Americans have on Jon Stewart.

Produced by Joel Surnow, the brains behind Fox's hit "24," "The Half-Hour News Hour" is a mock news satire (but for conservatives) that will hopefully make everyone forget about Comedy Central's "The Daily Show." Some have dubbed it the "un-Daily Show."

"I thought it was hilarious," said Jason Apuzzo, co-director of the Liberty Film Festival in Los Angeles. The third annual festival showed a pilot of "The Half-Hour News Hour" in November. "I think there's definitely a market for something like this because I think that most of comedy tends to be oriented toward a more liberal sensibility."

Several blogs have had a less than warm and fuzzy reaction to the show. "What a pathetic attempt at comedy. I certainly won't watch it, but then I don't watch the Fox News Channel anyway," wrote one critic on Popwatch, a blog for the magazine Entertainment Weekly.

Ana Marie Cox had this to say on her Time.com blog: "As anyone who has dabbled in comedy can tell you, starting out with a political objective or message is pretty much death for the funny."

Surnow, however, knows his audience. In November he told the Hollywood Reporter that the show "would play more to the Fox News audience than the Michael Moore channel."

The New Yorker recently wrote a 7,000-word piece on the popularity of Surnow's other show, "24," and its conservative implications. The show, according to the magazine, operates off of the nation's paranoia since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Surnow, who sometimes enjoys a cigar in his office with buddy Rush Limbaugh, said that in Hollywood party affiliation doesn't matter when the ratings are up. So the fact that he's a conservative in notoriously liberal La La Land has been a non-issue until now. With the "News Hour" set to debut its first episode, he told the New Yorker he's been "exposed."

Of course, Youtube.com is already in on the action. A two-minute-long snippet of the show has been viewed 327,060 times as of Friday. The opening graphics are reminiscent of that other comedy show, with flying titles and the stock red, white and blue color scheme.

Anchor Kurt Long begins with this joke: "Illinois Senator Barack Obama admits that as a teenager he sometimes used cocaine. This news sent Obama's approval rating among Democrats plummeting to all-time low of 99.9 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0134292

The studio then echoes with boisterous laughter.

And the Obama quips don't stop there.

"But in a related story Senator Obama has been endorsed for president by former Washington, D.C., Mayor Marion Barry." And there was more on Obama's middle name, Hussein, and mock features in a fictional Barack Obama magazine, such as: "A Life in Politics: My 18-month Journey."

Whether or not the jokes are about Obama himself or simply the hype surrounding him (which everyone can agree on) is up to the viewer.

Apuzzo, however, remained open as to whether the show audience will wear red or blue. "I don't think that Joel intends this to be exclusively oriented towards a conservative market," he said.

The pseudo public service announcement that Fox ran to promote the show makes the matter somewhat more clear.

Fox News Channel's "1/2 Hour News Hour": Right Funny, In Spots (WP)

By Tom Shales, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Can political conservatives be funny? George F. Will and William F. Buckley Jr., among a few others, are great wits, but that's different from setting out to generate peals of laughter throughout the land, and managing to do it. "The 1/2 Hour News Hour," a new weekly series from Fox News Channel, aims in part to prove that the right is not so full of itself that it can't get off a zinger or two.

Obviously patterned after "The Daily Show" on Comedy Central (which was just as obviously patterned on the "Weekend Update" segment of NBC's "Saturday Night Live"), "The 1/2 Hour News Hour" (premiering tomorrow night) is for the most part a straightforward mock newscast in which lefties are by far the favored targets. Thus the question "Can the right laugh at itself?" is neither addressed nor answered.

Despite constant, unrelenting protestations that "the media" are controlled by liberals, conservatism has hardly been absent from recent popular humor. For years, a major contributor to "Update," and the author of "SNL's" "cold open" sketch, was a conservative Republican, James Downey. The outrageous puppet movie "Team America" used many Hollywood liberals as literal targets, blowing them to proverbial kingdom come.

All that aside, " 1/2 Hour" definitely has its moments. Anchors "Jennifer Lange" and "Kent McNally" (Jenn Robertson and Kurt Long -- why didn't they just use their real names?) sit at a simple desk and deliver the facetious items without any of the dreadful, overboard mugging and mincing of "Daily Show's" obnoxious Jon Stewart.

The show opens with something of a sketch, however: It's 2009 and guess who's president? Rush Limbaugh, whom we discover seated at an Oval Officey desk and reciting his lines mechanically. When he calls for the vice president, in walks that spooky vampire Ann Coulter, too malicious and frightening to ever be funny. Still, the pair do have a certain star power.

On comes the artificial news. Hillary Rodham Clinton has pledged wide-ranging variety in her version of a Clinton administration, it's reported; she vows to appoint "a diverse group . . . of angry lesbians." An overlong segment on politically correct children's books includes such titles as "Harry Potter and the Alternate Lifestyle" and, for the developmentally challenged, "The Little Engine That Couldn't Quite."

There's a running gag about environmental activist Ed Begley Jr. attempting to get to the studio in a car that runs on, among other things, poopy, and mock commercials trashing the American Civil Liberties Union -- "protecting criminals from people like you since 1920." Here, though, the desire to deliver partisan swift kicks tends to override any impulse to amuse.

On the other hand, a segment in which a "game-show host and climatologist" attempts to link all public events, including Britney Spears's lack of underwear, to global warming has its chucklesome side, as does a plea from "Girl No. 13 on 'Deal or No Deal' " to drum up more causes for Hollywood celebrities to support, because the supply is running low. The inevitable Barack Obama jokes include the observation that a minor scandal caused his popularity among Democrats to plummet "to an all-time low of 99.9 percent."

Executive-produced by Joel Surnow, the man behind Fox's sadistic and preposterous (one hopes) "24," and undoubtedly encouraged by enfant terrible and Fox boss Roger Ailes, "The 1/2 Hour News Hour" is on the semi-amateurish side some of the time, and when it picks on dead revolutionaries such as Che Guevara, it seems lazy as well as tacky.

But those on the left anticipating, and probably hoping for, some kind of ghastly disaster will be disappointed -- and may even feel like joining in the (apparently canned) laughter more times than they'd expect. In a nutshell: It isn't terrible.

The 1/2 Hour News Hour (30 minutes) premieres tomorrow night at 10 on Fox News Channel.

Making fun of the president is not ideological. Not making fun of the president, on the other hand, is.

And that's what distinguishes "The ½ Hour News Hour," a Fox News version of "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart," from most other satirical shows. Comedians like Mr. Stewart, Stephen Colbert, Jay Leno and David Letterman ridicule whoever is in power, be it Bill Clinton or President Bush, John McCain or Nancy Pelosi.

The Fox News comedy only leans on the left.

On a mock news program much like "Weekend Update" on "Saturday Night Live," the targets are Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, global warming, Hollywood liberals, politically correct children's books ("Harry Potter and the Alternative Lifestyle") and the American Civil Liberties Union. A few riffs by the fake anchors, Kurt McNally (Kurt Long) and Jennifer Lange (Jennifer Robertson), are funny, yet others fall flat. But strangely, given the current wealth of material, there are no jokes about Mr. Bush, Dick Cheney or I. Lewis Libby Jr.

Sometimes the humor is so heavy-handed that it seems almost like self-parody. The premiere tomorrow opens with Rush Limbaugh and Ann Coulter in a skit set in January 2009. Mr. Limbaugh is the newly elected commander in chief, and he tells his fellow Americans that his Democratic opponent, Howard Dean, is "finally getting the medical attention he has so desperately needed for so long," which is a strange joke for Mr. Limbaugh to make, given his history of pain killers and prescription fraud.

Any notion that Mr. Limbaugh is trying to be slyly self-deprecating is quickly deflated by the earnest indignation fueling this comedy show.

Almost 30 years after the Reagan revolution, conservatives have to tilt pretty far to portray themselves as marginalized and downtrodden. Republicans controlled the House and the Senate until only recently, and they still run the White House, but the impulse to paint themselves as a persecuted minority leading a cultural war against the Hollywood-led liberal media dies hard.

It's a strange new comic order when the actor and environmentalist Ed Begley Jr. and his hybrid cars loom larger than the Iraq war, the deficit or White House leaks.

It's not surprising that a Fox News comedy show would share the same bunker sensibility as the rest of the network. That 24-hour cable news channel was created as a conservative antidote to mainstream news organizations. The us-against-them empire keeps growing. Rupert Murdoch announced that his latest venture, the Fox Business Channel, would be "more business-friendly than CNBC." (If nothing else, that is perhaps a sign that Mr. Murdoch does have a sense of humor.)

"The ½ Hour News Hour" is not even the first comedy show on Fox News. "Red Eye," a loose and slightly naughty late-night talk show, has a conservative but flippant bent. The host, Greg Gutfeld, says his show is "like Anderson Cooper without the poppers." But the panelists are young and try to be hip, so they mostly talk off the cuff about sex, stupid news items and celebrities.

" ½ Hour" is more tightly wound. Some of the writing is clever. "After months of being criticized for hosting a Holocaust denial conference in December," Mr. McNally says, "the Iranian government is now denying that the conference ever took place." He adds, "Or if it did, that attendance figures were greatly exaggerated by a Zionist-controlled media."

But most of the punch lines are silly, and the material too skimpy and narrow in range. It has been a long time since anyone laughed at jokes about Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio.

There is nothing wrong with Fox News adding a comedy show to its roster, and in some ways it's quite fitting. Humor is by definition unfair and unbalanced, but it is most effective when it is more evenly and broadly spread.

Bush Discusses Mideast With Israeli PM, Saudi King (AFP)

AFP, February 17, 2007

US President George W. Bush discussed the situation in the Middle East with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah, the White House said.

The telephone talks came just before US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice headed to the Middle East to host a rare summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders that she hopes will break new ground in reviving peace negotiations frozen for nearly seven years.

Monday's meeting with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and Olmert was the focus of Bush's talks with the Israeli prime minister, the White House said in a statement.

Bush also "discussed the situation in Iraq and developments in Israeli-Palestinian affairs" with the Saudi king, the White House added.

Rice has in recent months heralded the existence of a "new opening" for progress towards Israeli-Arab peace and the creation of an independent state for Palestinians, and has billed Monday's summit in Jerusalem as a high-profile jump through that breach.

Wait-and-see Policy On Hamas Damps Expectations For Jerusalem Summit (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Officials have set the bar so low for a US-Israeli-Palestinian summit in Jerusalem on Monday that even a modest step towards a revival of the moribund peace process is likely to be spun as a giant leap.

The Bush administration, bogged down in Iraq and assailed in Congress, badly wants to hear some good news from the Middle East. The timing, however, could hardly be worse.

Mahmoud Abbas's em-brace of Hamas, the Islamist group, has raised questions of the Palestinian Authority president's suitability as a peace partner, while a domestic crisis of confidence in Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, has cast doubt on his ability to break the deadlock.

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, who arrives tonight for bilateral talks with the two leaders before Monday's tripartite meeting, said peace efforts were "obviously more complicated because of the uncertainties surrounding the [Palestinian] national unity government".

The Hamas government that ruled the PA since the Islamists' election victory a year ago quit this week to pave the way for formation of a new cabinet in which it will share power with Mr Abbas's Fatah movement and independents.

The move, in the wake of a February 8 accord signed in Mecca by the two rival parties, brought enormous relief to the Gaza Strip, where more than 100 people had died in factional violence.

It left questions unanswered, however, on how far the new government would go to fulfil international principles that it recognise Israel, renounce violence and abide by existing agreements. Unless western donor countries are satisfied, an embargo on direct aid to the Palestinian government will remain in force.

In the hiatus between the Mecca accord and the government being sworn in, the US, its Middle East quartet partners - the European Union, United Nations and Russia - and even Israel have adopted a policy of wait-and-see.

"We don't like what's happened on the Palestinian side but we don't want to shut the door completely," a senior Israeli official told the Financial Times. "We will still try to work something out with Mahmoud Abbas."

The Israeli side, however, has quashed expectations, particularly in Europe, that Monday's summit might focus on skipping some of the more contentious elements of the Quartet's "road map" plan and head to final settlement talks, offering the Palestinians what diplomats call a "political horizon".

Tzipi Livni, the Israeli foreign minister, appeared tempted by the idea but it is not one that Mr Olmert would have much chance of selling to the right wing of his quarrelsome coalition.

Palestinians are now so buoyed by the Fatah-Hamas rapprochement that they see themselves as the most confident player within the trio of Israel, the US and the PA.

"Mecca gives President Abbas the freedom to negotiate. It was clear the US wasn't in favour of a Hamas government," said Ziad Abu Amr, an independent likely to be named as foreign minister in a new unity government. "But if the Americans are realistic, the best thing is to deal with Hamas in a constructive way."

Fatah officials and independents believe that Hamas, eager to rehabilitate itself in the eyes of the international community after a year of failed government, has moved towards the mainstream, despite its reluctance to recognise Israel.

"Fatah didn't embrace the Hamas political programme," said Mr Abu Amr. "I would say it's the other way round."

Israel, for the time being, tends to see the glass as half empty rather than half full. "The fact is Hamas moved a little bit, which is positive," said the Israeli official. "But we don't think it moved far enough. Mahmoud Abbas moved towards Hamas, which we don't like."

Palestinians officials meanwhile hoped their political accord would turn the Bush administration away from a perceived policy of seeking the removal of Hamas, by force if necessary. The White House's attempts to boost Fatah's military strength were set back this week when Congress froze $86m (£41m, €65m) destined to bolster Mr Abbas in his conflict with the Islamists.

"Hamas is now committed to the international rules," said Alaa Yaghi, a Fatah parliamentarian. "What more does the US want? If they don't want Hamas, it means they don't want peace on the ground."

Bush Plans Deep Cuts To Andean Drug War Budget (WT)

By Martin Arostegui, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia -- President Bush's new budget calls for deep cuts in the leading U.S. program to fight drug trafficking in the Andean region, amid growing clashes over drug policy between Washington and leftist governments in Venezuela and Bolivia.

DOJ_NMG_0134295

The cuts to the Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI) affect every country in the region except Colombia. They have been criticized by governments in the area, as well as by U.S. counternarcotics officials and some lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

"It would be the largest across-the-board reduction in aid since the war on drugs began," said one U.S. diplomatic official, who asked not to be named.

The ACI was designed to help local efforts to reduce the flow of illegal drugs, which surged in the late 1980s when cocaine production skyrocketed and powerful drug cartels emerged.

The ACI would receive $442.8 million under the fiscal 2008 budget that Mr. Bush submitted to Congress earlier this month, down 23 percent from the estimated spending for the current fiscal year and off nearly 40 percent from $727.2 million in fiscal 2006. The largest percentage cuts would be in Peru and Bolivia, which remain major producers of coca.

More than $2 million in anti-drug aid budgeted for Venezuela in fiscal 2007 was never spent as American officials feuded with populist anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez over counternarcotics policy. Venezuela would get no ACI money in the new budget.

Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro criticized the cuts, but told reporters in Caracas earlier this month that his country would not bend to U.S. "blackmail."

The Bush budget also proposed a sharp cut in ACI funds to Bolivia, where leftist President Evo Morales, a close Chavez ally, has announced a major increase in the amount of land set aside for legal coca production. Bolivia would receive $30 million in ACI money in fiscal 2008, down from almost $80 million in fiscal 2006.

Hugo Acha, a Bolivian legal consultant on drug policy, said, "There is no point in the U.S. giving aid if the objectives are not being met. The war on drugs appears to have become a mere formality."

But Ecuador's Foreign Minister Maria Fernanda Espinosa warned that the cuts will be seen as a punishment for countries in the region that elect governments that clash with Washington.

Even Peru, which has good relations with the United States, is facing a cutback.

Peruvian Prime Minister Jorge del Castillo said in an interview, "Peru should receive more aid rather than having it cut, in view of the magnitude of the problem we face, which is equal to Colombia."

Romulo Pizarro, Peru's top counternarcotics official, said he planned to lead a delegation to Washington next month to argue against the ACI reductions. He said Lima was meeting its objectives under the program.

"We understand the State Department wants to use the money from South America elsewhere," he said. Asked if he thought the money could go to Iraq, he said, "That's right."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended the cuts on Capitol Hill last week while facing pointed questioning from lawmakers.

Miss Rice said the administration was only shifting money to more effective programs on a country-by-country basis, while keeping overall aid to the region high. Much of the counternarcotics money would move to other development accounts and to the Millennium Challenge Corp., Mr. Bush's signature foreign-aid program.

"It's not just an across-the-board, mindless cut on Latin America," she said.

She acknowledged that some funds had been cut to countries that were less cooperative in U.S. counternarcotics efforts.

"There are some places, for instance, Bolivia, where our opportunities are somewhat more limited than they've been because of the nature of the government there," she said.

Another senior U.S. official earlier this week said the State Department was driving the ACI cuts.

The official, speaking on background, said the shift had wide support, but warned that as countries such as Colombia and Peru focus on development or "soft-side remedies," terrorists and drug cartels in the region could "strike back with a vengeance."

"Why signal to the rest of the Andean nations that those who line up with us will see a cut in funding for their anti-drug efforts?" the official said.

Scandal In Colombia Raises Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Feb. 16 -- U.S. support for Colombia has been a foregone conclusion under the administration of President Ãlvaro Uribe, who was elected in 2002. But with a widening scandal tying the president's close supporters to paramilitary groups, policymakers on Capitol Hill say skepticism of Uribe's government is mounting, leading to closer scrutiny of a proposed aid package and free-trade agreement with the Andean nation.

On Thursday, Sen. Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Castro, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo AraÃºjo, was arrested along with three other senators and a congressman. Authorities said they are investigating links that those lawmakers -- along with a sixth legislator who remains at large -- may have had ties to a paramilitary organization that has terrorized the country for years while shipping tons of cocaine to U.S. cities.

And Friday, the Supreme Court, which is heading a probe of Congress, announced that it would provide prosecutors with documentation to help determine whether the foreign minister's father, Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Noguera, had ties to paramilitary groups and participated in the kidnapping of a businessman. The foreign minister's cousin, Hernando Molina, governor of the state of Cesar, is also under investigation by authorities for allegedly collaborating with paramilitary groups to carry out killings and finance his campaign.

Uribe said he would stand fast behind his foreign minister in the midst of a scandal that has put eight congressmen behind bars and led to the questioning of dozens of national and local politicians. At a news conference Friday, Foreign Minister AraÃºjo told reporters, "I'm going to keep working with efficiency, honor, results and joy."

Officials in Washington said Uribe's support for the foreign minister would not help the Colombian government in its negotiations with U.S. lawmakers.

"The effects of what we call 'para-gate,' among Colombia followers in Congress, are that more and more folks are starting to get a bit skeptical regarding support, because there's a question of how far-reaching the relationship between the paramilitaries and the government officials is, vis-Ã -vis the president," a senior aide to a Republican senator said on condition of anonymity. "The confidence that we have in Uribe has been what's carried this for so long. That confidence has been brought into question."

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia.

"Colombia F.T.A. cannot pass the Congress, as constructed, and Plan Colombia is in more jeopardy because of these scandals, the infiltration of the paramilitary into the inner workings of the Colombian government," Levin said by telephone from Washington. "I voted for Plan Colombia, at least the first few times, but this is a very worrisome development."

Though lawmakers in Washington remain intensely focused on Iraq, it is not lost on policymakers that Colombia remains the biggest recipient of U.S. assistance outside of the Middle East and Afghanistan. Nearly $4.7 billion has been funneled to Colombia since Plan Colombia, an extensive aid package designed to defoliate coca and erode support for Marxist rebels, was instituted in 2000. The assistance has helped Colombia lower violence and tightened bonds between Bogota and Washington.

But Colombia continues to produce more than enough cocaine to meet world demand. And despite a highly touted demobilization that started in 2003, paramilitary groups still thrive, with shadowy new forces killing rivals, union leaders and peasants while battling guerrillas for control of the country's lucrative drug business. In the midst of this tumult, the Supreme Court and a team of prosecutors have begun to unearth extensive ties between paramilitary commanders and dozens of congressmen, regional politicians from coastal states and mid-level administration officials.

For Uribe, the scandal couldn't have come at a worse moment. He, Vice President Francisco Santos and Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos have made recent trips to the United States to press for approval of a free-trade agreement and more assistance to help the state take control of an unruly countryside. In Colombia's latest proposal, Uribe and his cabinet say they want to spend $44 billion in the coming years -- a program that would rely on a heavy infusion of aid from Washington and European countries.

"The whole scandal and the fact that all of these people are close confidants of the president are really going to muddy the waters as they're looking at a free-trade agreement and a new aid package in a democratically controlled Congress," said Adam Isacson, who closely tracks U.S. aid to Colombia for the Center for International Policy in Washington. "The Colombian government has a rather big sales job ahead of it, and this makes it infinitely harder for them to do that sales job."

Vice President Santos, in an interview, said that the disclosures would never have come out if Uribe's government had not entered into negotiations with the paramilitary organizations, a process that he said not only led to a full-scale disarmament but emboldened institutions such as the Supreme Court to investigate authorities' paramilitary ties.

"We're going to deal with it openly, and confront reality and let the chips fall where they may," Santos said. "The most important thing is that we clearly present what we've done. The United States Congress should be totally calm about there being complete transparency here."

The Bush administration has reiterated its support for Uribe. "We remain committed to the free-trade agreement," Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, told reporters in Washington. He added that the administration would continue to back anti-narcotics operations in Colombia.

But the latest disclosures have drawn heated criticism, from organizations such as Human Rights Watch and from some of Capitol Hill's more influential shapers of U.S. policy in Latin America, including Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee.

DOJ_NMG_0134297

"This confirms the concerns that many have had for a long time, that the paramilitaries have infiltrated the economic and political establishment of Colombian society," he said in a statement. "It should give us some pause as to who we are dealing with."

Chávez Threatens To Jail Violators Of Price Controls (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Feb. 16 — Faced with an accelerating inflation rate and shortages of basic foods like beef, chicken and milk, President Hugo Chávez has threatened to jail grocery store owners and nationalize their businesses if they violate the country's expanding price controls.

Food producers and economists say the measures announced late Thursday night, which include removing three zeroes from the denomination of Venezuela's currency, are likely to backfire and generate even more acute shortages and higher prices for consumers. Inflation climbed to an annual rate of 18.4 percent a year in January, the highest in Latin America and far above the official target of 10 to 12 percent.

Mr. Chávez, whose leftist populism remains highly popular among Venezuela's poor and working classes, seemed unfazed by criticism of his policies. Appearing live on national television, he called for the creation of "committees of social control," essentially groups of his political supporters whose purpose would be to report on farmers, ranchers, supermarket owners and street vendors who circumvent the state's effort to control food prices.

"It is surreal that we've arrived at a point where we are in danger of squandering a major oil boom," said José Guerra, a former chief of economic research at Venezuela's central bank, who left Mr. Chavez's government in 2004. "If the government insists on sticking to policies that are clearly failing, we may be headed down the road of Zimbabwe."

For now, Venezuela remains far from any nightmarish economic meltdown. The country, which has the largest conventional oil reserves outside the Middle East, is still enjoying a revenue windfall from historically high oil prices, resulting in a surge in consumer spending and lavish government financing for an array of social welfare and infrastructure programs. Dollar reserves at the central bank total more than $35 billion.

The economy grew by more than 10 percent last year, helping Mr. Chávez glide to a re-election victory in December with 63 percent of the vote. Yet economists who have worked with Mr. Chávez's government say that soaring public spending is overheating Venezuela's economy, generating imbalances in the distribution of products from sugar to basic construction materials like wallboard.

Public spending grew last year by more than 50 percent and has more than doubled since the start of 2004, as Mr. Chávez has channeled oil revenues into social programs and projects like bridges, highways, trains, subways, museums and, in a departure for a country where baseball reigns supreme, soccer stadiums.

In an indicator of concern with Mr. Chávez's economic policies, which included nationalizing companies in the telephone and electricity industries, foreign direct investment was negative in the first nine months of 2006. The last year Venezuela had a net investment outflow was in 1986.

Shortages of basic foods have been sporadic since the government strengthened price controls in 2003 after a debilitating strike by oil workers. But in recent weeks, the scarcity of items like meat and chicken have led to a panicked reaction by federal authorities as they try to understand how such shortages could develop in a seemingly flourishing economy.

Entering a supermarket here is a bizarre experience. Shelves are fully stocked with Scotch whiskey, Argentine wines and imported cheeses like brie and Camembert, but basic staples like black beans and desirable cuts of beef like sirloin are often absent. Customers, even those in the government's own Mercal chain of subsidized grocery stores, are left with choices like pork neck bones, rabbit and unusual cuts of lamb.

With shoppers limited to just two large packages of sugar, a black market in sugar has developed among street vendors in parts of Caracas. "This country is going to turn into Cuba, or Chávez will have to give in," said Cándida de Gómez, 54, a shopper at a private supermarket in Los Palos Grandes, a district in the capital.

José Vielma Mora, the chief of Seniat, the government's tax agency, oversaw a raid this month on a warehouse here where officials seized about 165 tons of sugar. Mr. Vielma said the raid exposed hoarding by vendors who were unwilling to sell the sugar at official prices. He and other officials in Mr. Chávez's government have repeatedly blamed the shortages on producers, intermediaries and grocers.

Those in the food industry argue that the price controls prevented them from making a profit after inflation rose and the value of Venezuela's currency plunged in black market trading in recent weeks. The bolívar, the country's currency, fell more than 30 percent to about 4,400 to the dollar in unofficial trading following Mr. Chávez's nationalization of Venezuela's main telephone company, CANTV, and its largest electric utility, Electricidad de Caracas.

Fears that more private companies could be nationalized have put further pressure on the currency as rich Venezuelans try to take money out of the country. Concern over capital flight has made the government jittery, with vague threats issued to newspapers that publish unofficial currency rates (officially the bolívar is quoted at about 2,150 to the dollar).

Regardless of efforts to stop illicit currency trading, the weaker bolívar has made imported food, fertilizers and agricultural equipment more expensive. Venezuela, despite boasting some of South America's most fertile farmland, still imports more than half its food, largely from Argentina, Brazil, Colombia and the United States.

Supermarket owners expressed relief when the government this week cut value-added taxes on retail food sales and raised the prices on more than 100 staples in an effort to alleviate the shortages. The announcement included an average 32 percent increase in beef prices and a 45 percent increase in chicken prices.

Following Mr. Chávez's nationalization threat, supermarket owners were cautious in their public statements. "As long as we are complying with the regulations, I don't believe there will be any type of reprisal," said Luis Rodríguez, executive director of the National Supermarket Association.

But many were clearly torn, afraid that their stores could be seized if they complained, but at a loss as to how to continue operating. "If I don't sell at the regulated price they'll fine me, and if I don't sell meat I'll be out of business," said a butcher shop owner here.

During his television broadcast, Mr. Chávez said his measures would be laid out in a decree, a power that his rubber-stamp legislature just bestowed upon him. He acknowledged that removing taxes on food sales would deprive the government of more than $3 billion in revenues, higher than the military budget, but he said tax increases on luxuries like beach homes and yachts would make up for part of the shortfall.

Mr. Chávez also said he would raise subsidies for state-owned grocery stores. Economists say such subsidies, together with hefty loans to farmers, have allowed the price controls to function relatively well until recent weeks.

But recent expropriations of farms and ranches, part of Mr. Chávez's effort to empower state-financed cooperatives, have also weighed on domestic food production as the new managers retool operations. So has the flood of petrodollars into the economy, easing food imports and making some domestic producers uncompetitive, an affliction common to oil economies.

"There seems to be a basic misunderstanding in Chávez's government of what is driving scarcity and inflation," said Francisco Rodríguez, a former chief economist at Venezuela's National Assembly who teaches at Wesleyan University.

"There are competent people in the government who know that Chávez needs to lower spending if he wants to defeat these problems," Mr. Rodríguez said. "But there are few people in positions of power who are willing to risk telling him what he needs to hear."

Mexico's Economy Loses Steam (LAT)

By Marla Dickerson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Sluggish manufacturing and falling exports to the U.S. are blamed for the deceleration. Slowing growth could spur emigration.

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's economy slowed in the last three months of 2006, and that could have consequences in the United States: Tough times in Mexico typically fuel immigration north of the border.

Mexico's gross domestic product expanded 4.3% in the October-to-December period from the final quarter of 2005, according to figures released Friday by the finance ministry. It was the third consecutive period of slower growth in the nation's economic output and a sharp decline from the 5.5% expansion registered in the first quarter.

The deceleration was blamed largely on a sluggish factory sector and a slowdown in exports to Mexico's principal customer, the United States.

Some analysts believe it portends a challenging year ahead for new President Felipe Calderon, who campaigned on promises of creating millions of jobs and vibrant economic growth for Mexico.

"When I took a look at some of the numbers I said, 'Uh-oh,' " said Eugenio Aleman, a senior economist for Wells Fargo & Co. in Minnesota. "Things are not looking good."

On the year, Mexico posted GDP growth of 4.8%, the strongest since 2000. High oil prices pumped record tax revenue into government coffers. The nation had a banner year in job creation.

But Aleman and other economists are cautious about the nation's prospects this year. The economy of the United States, Mexico's biggest trading partner, is weakening. Mexico's inflation has been rising, its oil production is slipping, and the nation's bellwether auto sector has hit a speed bump.

The United States has long served as an escape valve for struggling Mexicans, but there are signs that this funnel is tightening. Growth in the sums of money sent home by Mexican workers slowed to a trickle in November and December compared with the final months of 2005. It's an indication that stiffer border enforcement might be making it harder for undocumented Mexicans to reach America.

That will increase pressure on Calderon to reach a migratory accord with the United States. Unemployment in Mexico has soared. Rising prices on basics including tortillas, milk and eggs have sparked street protests. Millions of families rely on the remittances sent home, which have become the nation's second-largest source of foreign exchange behind oil revenue.

Much of the slowdown in economic growth is attributed to manufacturing. Mexico's factory sector expanded 3.1% in the final quarter of the year. In the first three months of the year it grew a sizzling 7.1%, driven by rebounding auto production.

But the Big Three's woes are being felt south of the border. The Mexican plants of Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and DaimlerChrysler account for about 70% of the cars assembled here, most of which end up in American showrooms.

A U.S. sales slump trimmed Mexican production and exports by 5% in December. The trend accelerated in January as exports tumbled to 88,915 vehicles, a 20.7% drop from January 2006.

Mexico's overall export growth slipped to 6% in November and 4% in December after an average increase of 19% over the first 10 months of the year. Industrial production grew an anemic 1.6% in December, much lower than forecasts.

Meanwhile, consumer prices have been rising. Mexico ended 2006 with an inflation rate of 4.05%, up from 3.3% in 2005, sparked largely by skyrocketing prices for tomatoes, tortillas and other basic foodstuffs. Further increases could force Mexico's central bank to raise interest rates, a move that would help curb inflation but would be a further millstone on growth.

"They don't want to tighten policy and increase the risk of a much sharper decline in economic activity," said Marcela Meirelles, Latin America economist with Trust Company of the West in Los Angeles.

Mexico's oil sector probably won't be as much of a help to the economy in 2007 as it has in years past. Petroleum prices have declined steeply since last summer's record highs, meaning less oil revenue for Mexico's treasury. Production also has fallen sharply at Cantarell, its largest oil field, a major worry in a nation that last year relied on petrodollars to fund nearly 40% of public spending.

Remittances too are showing signs of weakness. Mexican workers last year sent home a record $23 billion to their families. But the pace of growth decelerated markedly over the course of the year.

In the first quarter of 2006, remittances grew 27.5% compared with the January-to-March period in 2005. In the final three months of last year, remittances were up just 5.5% over the same period the year before. November and December were virtually flat.

Slower growth could be a result of tighter U.S. border enforcement. That's a sign of progress for border agents but a potential blow for Mexico, where remittances have become a pillar of the economy.

"That's worrisome," said Christian Stracke, emerging markets analyst with New York-based credit research firm CreditSights Inc. He said remittances play a major role in Mexico's balance of payments. "It's something we're going to have to keep an eye on."

Stracke said Mexico's construction sector, which expanded 5.9% in the fourth quarter, should continue to be a bright spot in 2007.

He said credit should also help keep the Mexican economy moving. Banks and retailers last year extended record amounts of credit card, auto loan, mortgage and other retail credit, which has bolstered consumer spending.

Detained AIDS Doctor Allowed To Visit U.S. Later, China Says (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BEIJING, Saturday, Feb. 17 — China gave in to international pressure on Friday and agreed to release a prominent AIDS doctor from house arrest so she can attend an awards ceremony in Washington next month.

“We’re just really excited about it,” said Wenchi Yu Perkins, an officer with Vital Voices Global Partnership, a nonprofit women’s advocacy group that will honor the doctor, Gao Yaojie, in March along with other women from around the world.

“I just talked to Dr. Gao,” Ms. Perkins added. “She confirmed that last night an official visited and informed her that they would respect her wish to come to the U.S. I think that is the best gift for her for the Chinese New Year.”

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, an honorary co-chairwoman of Vital Voices, announced China’s decision on Friday after receiving the news from the Chinese ambassador in Washington. Mrs. Clinton said in a statement that she was “delighted” and that she had been assured that Dr. Gao would “be allowed to travel freely to the United States.”

Dr. Gao, 80, has been kept under house arrest since Feb. 1 in the central China city of Zhengzhou in Henan Province. Authorities detained her to stop her from traveling to apply for a travel visa , friends and AIDS advocates said.

Dr. Gao is famously outspoken, and although China has taken a more open approach toward AIDS in recent years, officials were apparently worried she might say something provocative or embarrassing in Washington. She gained international attention for her work helping to expose the government-sponsored blood-selling operations that caused thousands of farmers to be infected with H.I.V. during the 1990s.

Dr. Gao's detention had attracted international attention and brought pressure on the Chinese government. On Tuesday, a provincial newspaper, Henan Daily, published a photograph and article detailing how provincial officials had visited Dr. Gao to wish her "sincere greetings" for the upcoming Lunar New Year. Many AIDS advocates saw the photograph and assumed it meant that China had released her. But, in fact, she was still under house arrest.

Dr. Gao could not be reached for comment on Saturday morning.

NATO Calls Antimissile Worries Unfounded (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Gen. John Craddock of the United States Army, who recently took over as the NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, said Russia had nothing to fear from a planned antimissile system that the United States wants to install in Poland and the Czech Republic. "It's been clearly stated what the U.S. intention is," he said, "and that is to provide defense against missiles from a rogue nation." Although he did not name any country, the antimissile site would be designed to stop attacks by Iran against the United States and its European allies. Last weekend, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia reacted angrily to the plan to install a missile defense system in former Soviet Bloc countries, saying it would set off a new arms race. On Thursday, Gen. Yuri N. Baluyevsky, the chief of the Russian military's general staff, said that if the United States went through with the system, Russia might drop out of the intermediate-range nuclear forces treaty of 1987, in which the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to eliminate land-based ballistic and cruise nuclear missiles with a range of 310 to 3,410 miles.

7 Get Life Sentences In Bombings Of Istanbul Synagogue And Office (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

ISTANBUL, Feb. 16 — A court on Friday sentenced seven Muslim men to life in prison and several dozen other people to lesser terms for their involvement in the deadly bombings of Jewish and British sites here in 2003.

The bombings killed more than 60 people and wounded hundreds more. Suicide bombers drove four explosive-laden trucks into two synagogues, the British Consulate and the HSBC headquarters here in two coordinated attacks five days apart. HSBC is a London-based banking and financial services company.

After a judge read their sentences, some of those convicted shouted, "Long live hell for nonbelievers!" and another yelled, "God is great!"

The life sentences were given to those who were determined to have been masterminds of the plot. Six of the seven denied any links with Al Qaeda and sought acquittal. The judge sentenced 41 other defendants to prison terms ranging from 3 to 18 years on a variety of charges, while 26 defendants were acquitted.

One of those who drew a life term was Louai al-Sakka, a Syrian whom security officials have described as a senior member of the Qaeda network in Iraq. He was found guilty of planning the attacks and providing financing.

Mr. Sakka was arrested in 2005 in Turkey while, according to the authorities, he was preparing a suicide attack on an Israeli cruise ship that was to carry tourists to Antalya, a Turkish Mediterranean port. At the time, the police said plans for the attack and high-powered explosives had been found at his residence.

Earlier this week, local news organizations said Turkish intelligence officials had told them that Al Qaeda had planned to kidnap Mr. Sakka on the way to the courthouse, a warning that prompted heavy security for the last two days of the trial.

Friday's session was dominated by another defendant, Harun Ilhan, who proudly declared himself a member of Al Qaeda and declared that he had been the ringleader of the four Istanbul bombings.

He read from a 700-page defense that he carried in a plastic grocery bag, spending more than four hours reading 83 pages about his hatred of the Turkish state and social deterioration in non-Muslim societies before the judge interrupted, asking him to summarize the rest.

Mr. Ilhan refused, saying, "You have this one-time chance to see why I've done this, became a member of Al Qaeda, how Al Qaeda works and has been supported worldwide, but you're just shutting me up."

After a brief exchange, the judge found Mr. Ilhan in contempt of court and ordered him out of the courtroom, but he refused to move and was carried out by five army guards.

Erkan Gabi Talu, 39, who lost his 8-year-old daughter, Annette Rubinstein Talu, and his mother, Anna Kant Talu, in one of the attacks, watched as Mr. Ilhan was removed. He said he was disappointed to have been denied access to the courtroom at the time of the sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0134301

"I've been waiting for all these years to see their faces at time of the verdict, but I'm denied this moment of limited joy," Mr. Talu said. "In my next visit to her grave, I wished to tell my daughter that she could rest in peace, but with all these acquittals and mild jail terms, I will not be able to do that."

The 2003 attacks were shocking for Turkey's predominantly Muslim population because of the high death toll, but also because Turks thought the country would be spared attacks by radical Islamic militants.

Seven Jailed For Turkey Bombings (BBC)

BBC.com, February 16, 2007

A court in Turkey has sentenced seven people to life in prison for the 2003 Istanbul bombings which killed 58 people including the UK consul-general.

A Syrian, Loai al-Saqa, was jailed for masterminding and securing finance for the attacks on the UK consulate, two synagogues and an HSBC bank branch.

The remaining six were Turkish citizens convicted of organising the bombings.

A total of 74 people were tried - many received lighter sentences and 26 of them were acquitted.

As the verdicts were read out to a packed courtroom, several defendants shouted "God is great".

The judge ruled that five of those sentenced to life, including Saqa, should not be allowed to benefit from any sentence reductions or amnesties.

'High-level operative'

The court was told that a group of men, calling themselves Warriors for Islam, came together to plan the attacks on the direct orders of Osama Bin Laden.

In court, many of the defendants admitted attending training camps in Afghanistan for Islamic extremists - but all but one man denied any part in the Istanbul attacks.

The UK consulate in Istanbul was one of the targets Harun Ilhan, one of the men jailed for life, admitted plotting the bombings and being a member of al-Qaeda.

Saqa - who had denied involvement in the attacks - was described by the state prosecutor as a high-level operative for al-Qaeda.

"Hey my hero brothers! Do not worry for me. Victory is very near," Saqa said during final arguments.

Also sentenced to life in prison were Fevzi Yitiz - for helping to build the truck bombs - and Yusuf Polat, Baki Yigit, Osman Eken and Adnan Ersoz.

Seyit Ertul was convicted of leading an al-Qaeda cell in the Turkish town of Konya and was sentenced to 18 years in prison.

Hamid Obysi was sentenced to 12-and-a-half years for membership of al-Qaeda, bomb-making and producing false identity cards

Twenty-nine people received sentences of six years and three months and 10 more were sentenced to three years and nine months for helping the bombings.

UK Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett welcomed the verdicts.

"These were abhorrent acts, two of which specifically targeted British interests," she said.

Rwanda Genocide Accusation Causes An Uproar (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

A French judge says the current leader, Paul Kagame, ordered the killings that set off the genocide.

— More than a decade after the genocide, a mystery still lies at the heart of Rwanda's darkness.

But France's most celebrated anti-terrorism magistrate believes he knows who assassinated two African presidents on April 6, 1994. The shooting down of the Rwandan presidential jet that night was followed by the killings of an estimated 800,000 people, most of them members of the Tutsi minority.

In a report to French prosecutors late last year, Magistrate Jean-Louis Bruguiere accused the Tutsi leader who is now president of Rwanda, Paul Kagame, of ordering the assassination.

The investigation includes allegations that U.S. and U.N. officials helped quash earlier inquiries to protect Kagame, an ally of the United States.

The French judge's report, which was obtained by The Times, has caused an uproar in Africa and Europe, and led Kagame's government to break off relations with France.

DOJ_NMG_0134302

A United Nations tribunal is judging perpetrators of the genocide, but the ghosts of Rwanda still haunt a world community that failed to intervene. French investigators do not claim that the assassination was the sole cause of the genocide. Tensions already were growing between Tutsis and Rwanda's majority Hutus. But Bruguiere alleges that Kagame sacrificed fellow Tutsis in a brutal "political calculation" aimed at toppling the Hutu-dominated government.

"Kagame deliberately chose a modus operandi that, in the particularly tense environment ... between the Hutu and Tutsi communities, could only cause bloody retaliation against the Tutsi community," says the judge's report, which recommends that prosecutors file formal charges.

Former U.N. investigators who initially looked into the assassination told Bruguiere that their bosses had blocked efforts to pursue leads implicating Kagame. The 67-page French report presents testimony from exiled Kagame bodyguards, spies and commanders. They identified a commando team that allegedly shot down the plane, killing President Juvenal Habyarimana and the president of neighboring Burundi, as well as their aides and the French crew.

In November, Bruguiere issued warrants for nine high-ranking Rwandan officials in the investigation, which he opened in response to a complaint from the widow of one of the French pilots. The judge also urged a U.N. war crimes tribunal on Rwanda to investigate Kagame, who as a head of state is immune from prosecution.

The warrants put Rwandan suspects in danger of arrest if they travel, and Kagame also could be in jeopardy once he leaves office. But a trial in France seems remote for now.

In response to the warrants, Kagame accused the French of trying to conceal their ties to former Hutu leaders and said the prosecution amounted to blaming the victims.

"Mr. Bruguiere is an impostor, a politician," Kagame said. "If he were a judge, he would raise the question of the implication of France in the genocide of the Tutsis in Rwanda."

Magistrate ruffles feathers

Bruguiere's eight-year investigation led French detectives through a diaspora of Rwandan exiles in Africa, Europe and North America. It also revealed intrigue sometimes pitting France and its African allies against forces supported by the United States and Britain.

Bruguiere, 63, has ruffled diplomatic feathers before. He charged six Libyan intelligence officials, including the brother-in-law of the nation's leader, Moammar Kadafi, in the bombing of a flight from Zaire — now known as Congo — to Paris in 1989 that killed 170 people. The charges irritated French diplomats who had been trying to improve relations with Kadafi, but a French court eventually convicted the Libyans in absentia.

The high-profile Rwanda prosecution could culminate the career of the swashbuckling French magistrate. Facing mandatory retirement in two years, Bruguiere is likely to run for the legislature this spring and could also aspire to a Cabinet post.

Critics accuse Bruguiere of grandstanding and sloppiness. His report contains "disconcerting errors" such as misspelled names, Le Monde newspaper said. One of the witnesses, a former Kagame soldier living in Europe, has reversed his testimony and denied that he participated in shooting down the plane.

But a former chief U.N. investigator applauded Bruguiere for taking a new look at the case. The version of events advanced by the Rwandan government is that extremist Hutus killed the president as a pretext for launching the genocide, but Rwandan authorities have never charged anyone in the assassination.

"People feel very comfortable because there's a version of history out there, they've published books, made films, and they feel comfortable leaving it alone," said Michael Hourigan, an Australian who says he quit in disgust when ordered to stop investigating Kagame. "Someone needs to explain why there's been no investigation."

Among the dozen Tutsi dissidents who testified in the inquiry was Aloys Ruyenzi, a former Kagame bodyguard with the wary manner of a man accustomed to looking over his shoulder.

Ruyenzi, 35, says he fled to Europe because Rwandan operatives tried to kill him when he turned against the government. During an interview, he confirmed the testimony he gave to Bruguiere.

"It was my wish to testify," he said. "Nobody forced me to do it."

Ruyenzi is one of many English-speaking Tutsis who grew up in Rwanda's neighbor, Uganda. He received military training in Uganda and became an intelligence sergeant in a Rwandan exile force led by Kagame. He recalls with pride that he was chosen in 1992 to become one of Kagame's bodyguards.

Kagame led an incursion from Uganda, a U.S. ally, into Rwanda, where Hutu governments had for years repressed the Tutsis, often brutally. His crack 600-man guerrilla army forced a truce with Habyarimana, a Hutu who had staunch French backing.

Ruyenzi said he stood guard on March 31, 1994, as Kagame and five top aides discussed shooting down Habyarimana's plane. Col. Theoneste Lizinde, a military advisor, was a key plotter, Ruyenzi said.

"Lizinde was from Rwanda, not an exile, so he knew the territory more than the others," Ruyenzi said. "Lizinde gave the report on where the plane should be shot. The place was near the airport. My testimony was not hearsay. I was an eyewitness. I heard what Kagame said. I was in the room. His quote was: 'If the president does not die, we could not win the war.' "

Ruyenzi and other witnesses testified that shoulder-borne Soviet-made SAM-16 missiles were smuggled to the area in a load of firewood. On April 6, a missile team infiltrated a Hutu-controlled semirural area near the airport in Kigali, the Rwandan capital, the report says.

Habyarimana and President Cyprien Ntayamira of Burundi returned together that evening from peace talks in nearby Tanzania. Their Falcon 50 jet descended into the sights of the commando unit about 8:25 p.m., according to the report. It names Sub-Lt. Franck Nziza as the fighter whose missile blew up the plane and sent flames and wreckage raining onto the presidential estate next to the airport.

"They came back ... and said what they did," Ruyenzi said. "They were promoted."

Hours later, Hutu soldiers intercepted two radio communications, one in the presence of a U.N. peacekeeping officer, in which Kagame's troops alluded to their success, investigators say.

French investigators later traced the missiles to a stock sold by Russia to Uganda, which provided them to Kagame's troops, the report said.

Investigators say that rising hostility between Hutus and Tutsis before the assassination, as well as the downing of the plane, contributed to the genocide that followed. Extremist Hutus had been broadcasting venomous anti-Tutsi propaganda over the radio for weeks. But the investigators accuse Kagame of exposing Rwandan Tutsis to murderous retaliation by Hutus in a ploy to create chaos and seize power.

The Kagame government adheres to the contrasting theory that extremist Hutus angry about the peace deal with the Tutsis killed Habyarimana.

At first, that scenario shaped the thinking of Hourigan, the Australian former U.N. investigator, and his American deputy, retired FBI supervisor James Lyons, who were sent to the killing fields in 1996 to lead a multinational team.

"All the academic and press comment was that it was Hutus around the president," Hourigan said. "But we never, ever met anyone who could give us substantive information to back up those leads. They were empty statements, vague and very generalized."

Leader implicated

In early 1997, U.N. investigators developed three informants close to Kagame who implicated their leader.

"They had firsthand knowledge, and they said it had been a special unit that did black-bag jobs," meaning covert killings, Lyons said in an interview. "Two of the informants knew each other, but the third didn't [know either of them]. That lent credence to what they were saying."

On March 7 of that year, Hourigan used a secure phone at the U.S. Embassy in Kigali to report to Louise Arbour, a war crimes prosecutor based in The Hague, according to testimony.

Hourigan says the prosecutor encouraged him. But when he visited The Hague days later, he said, she ordered him to drop the investigation of Kagame.

"She had already made her mind up," Hourigan said. "It was almost like the end of a marriage. It wasn't a debate."

Arbour, now the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, has declined to comment.

Hourigan also testified that he thought there was a link between his call on the U.S. Embassy phone and Arbour's about-face. He said in his testimony that he suspected that U.S. spies learned of the emerging focus on Kagame and that Washington leaned on U.N. brass to protect the Tutsi leader.

U.S. officials who served under President Clinton say it is farfetched to think Washington helped quash the investigation. But Herman Cohen, the assistant secretary of State for Africa under President George H.W. Bush, said the idea was plausible because U.S. officials felt guilty about failing to intervene in the genocide.

"The Clinton administration really did everything possible to protect Kagame," Cohen said.

A spokesman for the U.N. genocide tribunal, based in Arusha, Tanzania, declined to comment on that debate. But he said Hourigan's internal report has remained available to prosecutors.

The tribunal has "enormous interest" in Bruguiere's report, spokesman Everard O'Donnell said. But it has not officially received the report and will not be pressured by outside forces, he said.

"Nobody tells the prosecutor what to do," O'Donnell said in a telephone interview.

He said the trials so far had contradicted the idea that the assassination triggered the genocide.

"The whole point about the genocide is that it was planned, preplanned," O'Donnell said. "Although the crash, the killing of the presidents, plays a role, it is not the cause of the genocide."

DOJ_NMG_0134304

As for the accusations against Kagame, O'Donnell said the evidence was mixed. "The position is very much today that it's a whodunit," he said. "And we don't know whodunit."

Potential witnesses killed

In a chilling footnote, two potential witnesses identified by the U.N. investigative team were killed in Nairobi, the Kenyan capital, team officials and French investigators say.

Lizinde, named as a lead plotter, was kidnapped and slain in 1996 as he prepared to write a book about the assassination, the French report says. His family accuses Rwandan agents of the killing, citing documents in which Lizinde said he fled to Zaire and then Kenya after being targeted by Kagame's forces, the report says.

The other man slain was former Interior Minister Seth Sendashonga. Kenyan police accused a Rwandan diplomat of trying to kill him in 1996 and deported the official; Sendashonga was killed two years later.

A former Rwandan military intelligence agent living in the United States testified that the killing was the work of a covert unit created to silence dissidents. Sendashonga was dangerous because he "knew about the project of the attack on the presidential plane," the witness, Jean-Pierre Mugabe, told French investigators.

Ruyenzi, the former bodyguard, worries about meeting the same fate. Having lost loved ones in the horror nearly 13 years ago, he said, justice should disregard politics and ethnicity.

"I'm a Tutsi and I don't support anybody who is a criminal," he said. "If he is a Tutsi, let him answer for what he did. If he is a Hutu, let him answer for what he did."

UN Chief Proposes Ambitious Overhaul (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Ban Ki-moon, the United Nations' new secretary general, on Friday warned that an unprecedented global surge in UN peacekeeping operations had left its leadership "impossibly overstretched" and unable to cope without serious reform.

In an ambitious restructuring proposal sent to the General Assembly, he said in the past three years alone nine missions had been started or significantly expanded and three more were on the way.

There are 100,000 peacekeeping personnel in the field, an all-time high, and over the coming year that could increase by 40 per cent. "Our system is dramatically strained and overstretched . . . at a time when we can least afford it," Mr Ban said. "The current approach for mounting and sustaining peacekeeping operations will not sustain the explosive growth."

The core of his proposal is to split the peacekeeping department in two by creating a new department for field support. This would also take in parts of the UN that deal with personnel management and recruitment, and free peacekeeping operations officials to focus on strategy.

Mr Ban, however, faces a deep reluctance by governments to cede any authority to UN bureaucracy. After a troubled first month, he was beset by complaints from rich and poor countries alike that he was not consulting enough and that his team did not appear to understand how the UN worked.

Mr Ban appears to have listened to the criticism. On his return from a two-week trip, he began an outreach campaign with influential countries. The complaints have subsequently become more muted.

"He has done a better job in explaining his proposals now," said a western diplomat, although there remained confusion over the process. "Certainly it is not the way it was two weeks ago: a lot of people want to help him, and don't want the secretary general to fail in the first thing he does," the diplomat said.

Edward Luck, an international affairs professor at Columbia University who has been advising Mr Ban, said: "In retrospect there was probably more of a problem with presentation than substance. . . It's a good sign that the more he explains the more he people are comfortable with it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Arrests New York Man In Terror-Funding Sting. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/17) reported, "A businessman was charged Friday with secretly trying to pass along thousands of dollars to buy night vision goggles and other equipment for a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan. Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, was accused in Manhattan federal court of financing terrorism and material support of terrorism. The indictment said he accepted an unspecified amount of money between June and December to transfer $152,000 that he believed was being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support an Afghanistan terrorist training camp." The New York Post (2/17, Cornell) noted Alishtari "was nabbed by the FBI

Thursday and charged with providing material support to terrorists, as well as money-laundering and wire-fraud charges, which carry a maximum of 95 years in prison. Prior to his arrest, Alishtari…had agreed to cooperate with law enforcement. But the deal fell through before he provided substantial assistance, according to a source close to the case."

The White Plains Journal News (2/17, O'Connor) reported, "A woman who answered the phone at Alishtari's home yesterday and identified herself as his wife cried when informed of the charges against her husband. She said she last saw him Thursday when he left in a cab for a business meeting. FBI agents later raided the family's home, she said, without telling her why they were there." The Journal News noted, "On his blog and on an MSN group titled 'atalishtarispeeches,' Alishtari calls himself a 'conservative Republican' and a 'Reagan Republican' devoted to peace, dedicated to halting child slavery as well as 'Internet fraud, violence and online scams hurting innocent children, women, and families so help me God.'" The New York Daily News (2/17, Zambito) and Newday (2/17, DeStefano) also briefly reported on Alishtari's arrest.

Al-Arian Plans To Continue Hunger Strike. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/17) reported, "A former Florida university professor who has stopped eating in prison to protest his treatment sounds fine and doesn't intend to give up his nearly monthlong hunger strike, his wife said Friday." Sami al-Arian "stopped eating Jan. 22 after federal officials told him he had to testify before a grand jury about Muslim charities in northern Virginia that had helped finance his think tank in Tampa, Fla." The AP added, "al-Arian wants to be released so he can leave the United States, his wife said in a telephone interview Friday. 'We worry about Sami, but at the same time we try to do our best to get him out of this whole situation,' Nahla al-Arian said during an interview."

Italian Court Indicts 25 CIA Officers Over "Extraordinary Rendition." ABC World News (2/16, story 4, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Italy, a judge ordered 26 Americans, most of them CIA agents, to stand trial in the case of a terrorism suspect who said he was kidnapped, flown to Egypt, and then tortured. This would be the first trial of its kind."

The Washington Post (2/17, A1, Delaney, Whitlock, 690K) reports, "An Italian judge gave approval Friday for what will be the first overseas criminal trial of CIA officers involved in a covert counterterrorism operation, as a court in Milan indicted more than two dozen Americans on charges of kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric four years ago. After a judicial hearing that lasted two months, the court handed down indictments against 25 CIA operatives, a U.S. Air Force lieutenant colonel and five Italian spies who are accused of grabbing an imam, Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, off the street and stuffing him into a white van as he walked to noonday prayers Feb. 17, 2003. Nasr was taken from Milan to his native Egypt, where he claims he was tortured in prison for more than three years."

The Financial Times (2/17, Barber) reports, "The centre-left government of Romano Prodi, prime minister, is unwilling to meet prosecutors' demands to seek the extradition of the Americans so that they appear in court in Milan."

The Washington Times/AP (2/17, Barry) reports the Italian prosecutors "think that many of the American names in the indictment are aliases, and even if Italy requests the Americans' extradition -- a move that would strain U.S.-Italian relations -- it is unlikely that the agents, who have all left Italy, would be turned over for prosecution. All the U.S. agents have court-appointed attorneys, who say they have had no contact with their clients. In Italy, defendants can be tried in absentia."

The New York Times (2/17, A1, Fisher, 1.16M) reports the indictment "marked a turning point in Europe, where anger is high at the American program of 'extraordinary renditions.' … Though the Italian indictment is the first in which such a case was ordered to trial, this week the Swiss government approved an investigation into the flight that was said to have carried Mr. Nasr from Italy to Germany, through Swiss airspace. The flight reportedly then went from an American air base in Germany to Egypt. Late last month, a German court issued an arrest warrant for 13 people suspected of involvement in the kidnapping in Macedonia of a German citizen of Lebanese descent. There are also investigations into extraordinary renditions in Portugal and Spain. In the meantime this week, a European Union parliamentary committee issued a detailed report into what it said were 'at least' 1,245 secret C.I.A. flights in Europe, some of them involving extraordinary renditions."

Navy Brig Personnel Ordered To Testify Regarding Padilla's Treatment. The Washington Post (2/17, A17, Whoriskey, 690K) reports, "Officials at the Navy brig where terrorism suspect Jose Padilla was held for 3 1/2 years as an enemy combatant were ordered Friday to testify at a hearing to determine his psychological competency, a ruling that allows the defense to press its claims that sensory deprivation and torture in confinement have rendered the alleged al-Qaeda operative unfit to stand trial. … Federal prosecutors objected strenuously to allowing the testimony, arguing that the focus of the competency hearing should be on Padilla's psychological state, which they believe is adequate, and not necessarily on what past events might have caused post-traumatic stress disorder, as defense attorneys allege. During a hearing Friday, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke grew tired of the government's objections."

The New York Times (2/17, A11, News, 1.16M) reports Cooke "ordered eight Defense Department and Justice Department officials to appear for questioning at Mr. Padilla's competency hearing next Thursday. The eight were previously interviewed for a United States Bureau of Prisons report that prosecutors cite as evidence that Mr. Padilla is mentally competent."

History Of US Military Commissions Explored. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/17, A15, 1.16M), historian Stephen Budiansky writes, "This week President Bush issued a final executive order authorizing military commissions to begin trying suspected terrorists. Under rules drafted by the Pentagon last month, the commissions would be permitted to sentence defendants to imprisonment or even death on the basis of hearsay or coerced testimony. This lack of basic legal protections provided by civilian courts or courts-martial has brought condemnation at home and abroad as an abandonment of this nation's historic commitment to liberty and the rule of law. Yet when military commissions -- an American invention -- were first instituted 150 years ago, they were hailed around the world as an advance for humanity and principles of justice."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Port Authority Clears Dubai Ports World Selloff. The New York Times (2/17, B2, Belson, 1.16M) reports, "A day after two United States senators called the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey greedy and obstructionist, the agency signed off on a deal that would let DP World, a Dubai-based port operator, sell its leases to A.I.G. Global Investment Group. In return for its consent, the Port Authority will receive $10 million from A.I.G. to help pay for an overpass that will make it easier for trucks to deliver containers from the company's terminal to train lines. A.I.G. also agreed to spend more than $40 million to improve operations at its terminal at the Port of Newark. The agreement was somewhat of a compromise by the Port Authority, which had asked for $30 million to cover investments it had made on behalf of DP World and a $50 million commitment from A.I.G. to spend on the port."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, 2.04M) reports DP World "agreed in December to sell its U.S. ports operations to AIG Global Investment Group, following months of criticism that the UAE firm couldn't be trusted running the security-sensitive shipping apparatus. That deal suddenly foundered this week when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal." The Financial Times (2/17, Grimes) reports Sen. Charles Schumer "said on Thursday that the authority's demands amounted to a 'ransom fee' and threatened not to back future requests if it persisted with its demands."

States Use Driver's License Databases To Fight Crime. The New York Times (2/17, A10, Liptak, 1.16M) reports seven states "have or are working on…enormous databases of driver's license photographs. Coupled with increasingly accurate facial-recognition technology, the databases may become a radical innovation in law enforcement. Other biometric databases are more useful for now. But DNA and fingerprint information, for instance, are not routinely collected from the general public. Most adults, on the other hand, have a driver's license with a picture on it, meaning that the relevant databases for facial-recognition analysis already exist. And while the current technology requires good-quality photographs, the day may not be far off when images from ordinary surveillance cameras will routinely help solve crimes. Critics say the databases may therefore also represent a profound threat to privacy."

WAR NEWS:

House Passes Nonbinding Iraq Resolution, With 17 Republicans In Support. Even though the outcome was long expected, broadcast networks led with the House vote on the two-line resolution expressing disapproval of President Bush's planned deployment of more troops to Iraq, and most major newspapers put the story on the front page. Many reports say the vote was a "rebuke" of the President. While coverage throughout the past week has examined how many Republicans were likely to support the resolution, with estimates ranging from 20 to 60, few reports focus on the fact that just 17 Republicans voted for the nonbinding measure, or that the number was lower than expected. With two Democrats voting against the resolution, it passed 246-182. Republicans voting yes were Reps. Michael Castle, Howard Coble, Tom Davis, Jimmy Duncan, Phil English, Wayne Gilchrest, Bob Inglis, Timothy Johnson, Walter Jones, Ric Keller, Mark Kirk, Steve LaTourette, Ron Paul, Tom Petri, Jim Ramstad, Fred Upton, and James Walsh. Democrats voting no were Reps. Jim Marshall and Gene Taylor.

ABC World News (2/16, lead story, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) said the House issued a "strong rebuke to the President's policy in Iraq" with the vote, saying that while "opposing a president during a time of war is historic, so was this vote merely symbolic, for what the House did today does not actually restrict the President in any way." ABC (Tapper): "It was the first official opposition to the war in Iraq in congressional history." NBC Nightly News (2/16, lead story, 3:05, Williams, 9.87M) introduced its report by saying the "White House today said the President was too busy with other matters to watch live television coverage of the vote that is tonight being called the start of an epic confrontation, between Congress and the Commander-in-Chief."

The CBS Evening News (2/16, lead story, 2:12, Couric, 7.66M) said, "The words were simple and clear. After four days of debate, the House passed a resolution today that says it disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush to deploy more than 20,000 additional US combat troops to Iraq. … The vote was symbolic, but it's just the beginning of a campaign by congressional opponents of the war to try to stop it." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi: "This resolution today sets the stage for that new direction, one in which we will focus on other than military initiatives." Also on the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 2,:50, 7.66M), White House correspondent Jim Axelrod said, "The President is dug in on this, and the surge is actually already under way. So what's going to settle all this, it would seem, is what happens on the streets of Baghdad."

The Washington Post (2/17, Weisman, 690K) headlines its front-page report "House Rebukes Bush On Iraq," saying the House, "capping four days of passionate, often angry debate," delivered Bush "its first rebuke since the Iraq war was launched nearly four years ago." While the resolution "is nonbinding, proponents and opponents delivered outsized predictions of the vote's consequences. Democrats asserted that it will begin to turn the political tide so decisively that the president will have no choice but to begin bringing U.S. forces home, while Republicans warned darkly that the House has emboldened murderous Islamic terrorists at the expense not only of American lives but also of America's way of life." The Washington Times (2/17, Ward, 88K) leads its front-page reports by saying Republicans said the "nonbinding but symbolic action…is defeatist and a step backward in the war on terrorism."

The New York Times (2/17, Zeleny, Luo, 1.16M) runs its story under the front-page headline "A Divided House Denounces Plan For More Troops," saying the "sharply divided" House passed a measure "formally repudiating President Bush's decision" to send more troops to Iraq. The Times says passage "was never in doubt, but the debate, lasting full days and much of three nights, brought nearly every member to the floor to declare, briefly but often vehemently, where they stood on a short, resolution affirming support for the troops but denouncing Mr. Bush's new approach to the war. … With 392 members speaking, the debate lasted twice as long as when Congress voted in 2002 to authorize the use of force against Iraq." The Times is one of the few sources to prominently point out that "the number of Republicans who joined them was only about half of what some Democrats had predicted." Minority Leader John Boehner said, "Republicans may have lost the vote on this nonbinding resolution. But we won the debate." NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 2, 2:15, Gregory, 9.87M) said officials at the White House said the 17 Republican defections were "fewer defections than they actually expected," but the "response over here was still muted. It was certainly a political blow."

The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Simon, 850K) says the "sharp partisan split was a disappointment to Democratic leaders, who had hoped for more GOP support, and it lessened the vote's political impact. Still, the vote marked a milestone in the declining public support for the nearly 4-year-old war, and it signified the growing Democratic determination to press for a de-escalation of U.S. involvement in the conflict." The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, Rogers, 2.04M) overlooks the earlier GOP defection estimates, saying the "Republican defections and new Democratic unity underscore how much the political landscape has changed in the past year. Eight months ago, only three House Republicans opposed a similar resolution supporting the war effort and warmly praising the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. By comparison, even Republicans who stood with the president in this week's debate were often critical of Mr. Maliki and leery of committing more U.S. forces."

The Chicago Tribune (2/17, Fang, Bendavid, 617K) says the "rhetoric on the House floor Friday was emotional, sweeping and at times agonized, with orators on both sides speaking of honoring the dead, staying true to the nation's mission and respecting the Constitution. In a chamber that often sees a lone congressman addressing an empty chamber, many seats were filled, and particularly eloquent speeches were met with standing ovations. It was perhaps the closest Congress had come in three decades to the impassioned debates that animated the nation during the Vietnam War." The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Gaouette, 850K) says "Democrats and Republicans alike crowded the chamber by midafternoon to cheer their sides during the final appeals for votes. Spectators waiting to enter the third-floor public galleries lined the halls and the marble stairs."

Newsday (2/17, Phelps, Gordon) says that while to supporters, "Friday's Iraq vote in the House was the historic answer to the embarrassments of 1964 and 2002, when Congress overwhelmingly approved wars in Vietnam and Iraq that would become unpopular," to its "opponents, the nonbinding statement of disapproval of the president's war plan was at best a meaningless gesture, at worst a terrible precedent or even a solace to America's enemies." The San Francisco Chronicle (2/17, Epstein, 384K) called it a "double-barreled confrontational message" from the House to the President, "telling him it opposes his latest buildup of troops in Iraq and in the next few weeks will try to start curtailing military operations in the war zone."

The Houston Chronicle (2/17, Mittelstadt, 530K) calls it a "symbolic but stern repudiation," while the Dallas Morning News (2/17, 500K) says "war opponents hope Friday's vote will serve as a turning point, the first of several actions that the Democratic-led Congress will take to pressure the president to redeploy troops to Afghanistan, the Middle East or elsewhere, or bring them home."

Among the other sources reporting on the debate and vote are the Financial Times (2/17, Luce), AP (2/16, Espo), the Web site of The Hill (2/16, Marre, Kucinich), RollCall.com (2/16, Stanton), CNN.com (2/16), and BBC.com (2/16).

Symbolic Vote Could Be Just The Beginning Of Democrats' Efforts. In a front-page analysis, the Washington Post (2/17, Baker, 690K) reports says while the resolution "specifically renounced" the troop increase, "by extension, the 246 to 182 vote passed judgment on Bush's overall stewardship of the war in Iraq and, more broadly, on his leadership in the world. At a time when the president is confronting Iran over its nuclear enrichment program, the House vote demonstrates that he has far less latitude to take aggressive action than he might have had in the past." But the vote "signaled peril for the Democratic congressional leadership as well. Despite deep Republican discontent with the course of the war, Democrats were unable to persuade more than 17 members of the president's party to register that dissatisfaction with their votes. If Democratic leaders could not build a broader bipartisan coalition for a symbolic vote, it may prove much harder to attract Republican support for proposals to limit Bush's options in Iraq."

A New York Times (2/17, A6, Stolberg, 1.16M) analysis piece also looks at what the symbolic vote portends, saying the "act of Congressional defiance…lays the groundwork for an even more bitter and ultimately more consequential clash over whether and how lawmakers might restrict President Bush's authority to prosecute the war." It is still unclear whether congressional Democrats have the "political resolve to rein in Mr. Bush. But by emboldening critics of the Iraq war, the vote has made the debate over financing, which would have been unthinkable even six months ago, a virtual certainty."

Members Of Congress Discuss Their Votes. Rep. Patrick Murphy said on CNN's Newsroom (2/16, Harris), "I believe that we need a new direction in Iraq. I served there in Iraq in 2003 and came home in 2004, literally three years ago. And I believe that, still, the Iraqis are sitting on the sideline. And it's time for them to step up and really fight for their country. … Gen. Petraeus is a great leader. And Secretary Gates, I like the fact that he's been much more open and has been very open with this Congress, which is needed."

DOJ_NMG_0134312

Rep. Joe Sestak said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/16, Matthews), "I voted for this resolution because I don't believe doubling down on a bad military bet. We have tried this before, we have increased troops by 12,000 since August and it hasn't worked. More than that, every day that I was forward deployed, leading men and women into harm's way, whether it was while I was on the ground in Afghanistan or with my battle group over in combat in Afghanistan or in Iraq, I wanted to know that back here the men and women, the policy makers are thinking about the best use."

Rep. Peter King said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/16, Matthews), "I strongly oppose the resolution. I think it's absolutely wrong for Congress to be injecting itself into a strategic battlefield decision. The Senate unanimously confirmed Gen. Petraeus. I've been to Iraq with Gen. Petraeus. He's our finest commander over there. He says this plan can work, he wants to make it work, he's already implementing it and for us to be in effect undermining him, and that's what we're doing by saying that the plan won't work, we're substituting our decision for that of Gen. Petraeus. And also, the logical sequence, or the logical connection, between today's vote and the next vote would have to be, I believe, a vote toward cutting off funds, which by the way is what Jack Murtha and Nancy Pelosi are already talking about, by imposing so many conditions on the next appropriations bill, to in effect make it impossible to pay for the troops that will be there."

Rep. Tim Walberg said on CNN's Newsroom (2/16, Harris), "Whether or not it's binding or nonbinding, it is making a statement. And just as General Washington came back from the Revolutionary War to the Congress and said send me help and support and encouragement, and they denied that, General Washington and the troops went back and won the war. And of that we are grateful. I think the same will take place here. But with this resolution, we are saying to the troops, we support you, we don't support your mission. And that's my concern."

Rep. Virgil Goode said on Fox News' Your World (2/16, Cavuto), "I wish the vote had been different, but it was closer than many anticipated. And I think the arguments against the resolution were gaining ground. … I believe that those on the ground in Iraq, the terrorists, and those with al Qaeda are encouraged by it. They say it shows a lack of unity in the United States."

Senate Cloture Vote Expected To Fail. ABC World News (2/16, story 2, 1:20, 8.78M) anchor Charles Gibson asked George Stephanopoulos, "The Senate comes in to vote tomorrow." ABC's Jake Tapper "says they don't have the votes to pass it. Why go through the exercise?" Stephanopoulos: "Because Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, wants to put pressure on those Republicans in the Senate who actually support the surge. Both Republicans and Democrats agree that there are probably about 55 votes for this resolution right now, but not the 60 that it would take to break the filibuster and get it to the floor. So, Mr. Reid wants to put the pressure on those senators who support this resolution and don't support the surge." Gibson: "Bottom line, what you're telling me is Democrats don't have the votes overall in Congress, to pass even a nonbinding resolution opposing the war." Stephanopoulos: "They don't. They don't right now, even though there is a majority in the House and the Senate in support of this resolution."

The Politico (2/16, Bresnahan, Budoff) also says that while Senate Democrats "will try again Saturday to force debate" on their resolution, "their second attempt in two weeks appears unlikely to succeed." Several Republicans including John Warner "intend to vote with Democrats." But Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said he "did not expect Democrats to stitch together the 60 votes necessary to move the Senate toward a debate on the anti-surge resolution approved by the House."

Hagel To Vote For Cloture. Sen. Chuck Hagel said on PBS' NewsHour (2/16, Lehrer), "I will vote for cloture tomorrow, and the reason I will is this is just another procedural vote. We do need to move this forward now. We've given the two leaders two weeks to try to resolve this. They have, at least so far, been unable to do it. We need to have the next series of votes. This is a procedural vote, and I will vote to move the procedure along. … I doubt if there will be 60 votes tomorrow. But, again, I think we should keep our eye focused on the issue here, and that is debate of resolutions and votes on those resolutions."

More Commentary On House Vote. The Washington Post (2/17, A30, 690K) editorializes, "Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has a message for anyone who spent the week following the House of Representatives' marathon debate on Iraq: You've been distracted by a sideshow." But "the House vote does matter: It ought to increase the pressure on Mr. Bush and the Iraqi government to follow through on their pledges to accompany the military campaign with tangible steps toward political accords and economic reconstruction. Senate leaders would be wise to reach an agreement today allowing a similar debate. And both chambers should aggressively conduct oversight hearings aimed at holding the administration to its promise to link continued U.S. troop deployments to Iraqi performance."

The New York Times (2/17, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "President Bush lost touch long ago with Iraq's political reality -- not to mention Americans' anguish and disbelief at his mismanagement of the war. So we welcome the House of Representatives' long-overdue attempt to shake some sense into Mr. Bush with a resolution opposing his decision to send another 20,000 combat troops to fight this disastrous war without any plan to end it. Yet yesterday's vote, in which 17 Republicans joined the Democrats to produce a margin of 246 to 182, was the easy part. It takes no great courage or creativity for a politician to express continuing support for the troops and opposition to a vastly unpopular and unpromising military escalation. Even if the Senate manages to overcome its procedural self-hobbling and approve a similar resolution, the war and the mismanagement will go on. The next necessary steps will require harder thinking and harder choices."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A8, 2.04M) editorializes, "A funny thing happened yesterday on the way to the House of Representatives' vote to 'support' the troops but assail their mission in Iraq: The majority for this 'non-binding' attempt at gathering political cover was a lot smaller than advertised. Yes, the Democrats carried the day, 246-182, and thus can say to their antiwar supporters that they 'sent a message,' or something, to President Bush and the Iraqis. But the margin was smaller than media speculation had predicted, with only 17 Republicans heading for the tall grass. … Yesterday's vote showed that if Democrats want to execute this cynical duck-and-run, they will have to do it without much Republican help."

The Los Angeles Times (2/17, 850K) editorializes, "Fortunately for Congress, actions speak louder than words -- even symbolic actions such as the House of Representatives' approval Friday of a nonbinding resolution opposing the 'surge' of U.S. troops to Iraq. The surge is necessary, but the resolution may be as well -- as a way to hold President Bush to his commitment that U.S. involvement in Iraq is not open-ended. Still, the world will little note, nor long remember, the words that were uttered by House members before the 246-182 vote. Congress is often a cave of winds, but with a few exceptions the House's Iraq debate was a blowhard's paradise."

Rice On Unannounced Visit To Baghdad. WashingtonPost.com (2/17) reported early today that Secretary of State Rice "made an unannounced visit to Baghdad Saturday for meetings with U.S. and Iraqi officials, arriving in the embattled capital as the Iraqi government reported initial success in a new security effort." Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor announced that Rice "was expected to hold a town hall-style meeting with U.S. Embassy and military personnel in the heavily fortified Green Zone and later meet with senior Iraqi government officials." Rice arrived at about 11:30 a.m. Baghdad time, or 3:30 a.m. EST, and "planned to brief reporters on her visit" this afternoon. She "made the previously unannounced stop as part of a trip to the Middle East."

A late AP (2/17, Gearan) piece notes Rice said in Baghdad that "the success of a new security crackdown in Baghdad will be measured largely on how well the U.S.-backed government capitalizes on any respite of sectarian violence." She "made an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital to check on the early days of the campaign to put down tit-for-tat violence between Sunnis and Shiites that has consumed Baghdad and contributed to the exodus of an estimated 3.8 million Iraqis from their homes."

Rice Said To Face Skeptical House Appropriations Subcommittee. The Washington Post (2/17, A16, DeYoung, 690K) reports Rice was "grilled" by the House Appropriations Subcommittee on State, Foreign Operations and Related Programs. "Skeptical lawmakers yesterday demanded a detailed accounting of how [Rice] plans to spend $6 billion in supplemental funds that the administration has asked for the State Department this year, much of it for Iraq and Afghanistan." Members from both parties "asked pointed questions about the rising cost of efforts that seem to be failing, despite newly announced U.S. strategies for both countries."

Maliki Touts Plan's "Fabulous Success" To Bush. In a conversation with President Bush yesterday, the Washington Post (2/17, A20, Ernesto Londono, 690K) reports, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said "the relative lull in violence is a promising sign that the Baghdad security plan is off to a good start." He "assured President Bush that the three-day-old plan 'has achieved fabulous success,' according to an account of the conversation released by the prime minister's office. Speaking by secure video link-up, Maliki also told Bush that officials will be 'firm in dealing with any side that breaks the law, regardless' of their sect."

The New York Times (2/17, Santora, 1.16M) says Maliki "told President Bush on Friday that the increased effort to provide security in Baghdad had gone exceedingly well so far." Also, "across Baghdad, there were signs of the heightened troop presence, as cars were searched at new checkpoints and raids resulted in the arrest of at least 35 people." Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil Jr. "told reporters on Friday that there had been a substantial reduction in violence in the past 48 hours, which he attributed both to the increased troop presence and the decision by Sunni and Shiite militants to keep a low profile."

"Jury Remains Out" On Crackdown's Success. The AP (2/17, Murphy) reports, "As a military offensive seeks to bring Baghdad from the brink of anarchy, a top Iraqi security officer tried Friday to measure its early stages using the grim logic of a place with daily bloodshed: by counting the bodies arriving at the morgue. A total of 10 corpses were collected off the streets ... This was the basis for an upbeat message by [Qassim] Moussawi, a spokesman for the joint U.S.-Iraqi security sweep that began this week and has so far faced limited resistance. But his American counterparts remain much more guarded. ... The contrasting [US and Iraqi outlooks cut across the entire mission, dubbed Operation Law and Order, which seeks to reclaim the streets."

Sadr Commanders Flee Iraqi Crackdown. The Financial Times (2/17, Khalaf) reports, "Iraqi officials on Friday reported an 'exodus' of commanders from the Shia Mahdi army, as armed groups seek to protect themselves from the US military crackdown in Baghdad and preserve their organisations. Mystery has swirled over the whereabouts of Moqtada al-Sadr, the fiery cleric whose Mahdi army is accused by the US of a leading role in the sectarian violence that has devastated the capital. ... It is not clear how long the Mahdi commanders will stay away. In previous security crackdowns in the capital, militias and Sunni insurgents faded but re-appeared when US forces retreated."

Sunni Insurgents Carry Fight North Of Baghdad. The AP (2/17, Frayer) reports, "Sunni insurgents have been streaming out of Baghdad to escape the security crackdown, carrying the fight to neighboring Diyala province where direct fire attacks on Americans have nearly doubled since last summer, U.S. soldiers say. That has led to sharp fighting only 35 miles north of the capital in a province known as 'Little Iraq' because of its near-equal mix of Sunni and Shiite Arabs as well as Kurds. ... Some U.S. officers suspect the advance publicity for the Baghdad security plan may have encouraged extremists — both Sunnis and Shiites — to flee the capital for surrounding provinces, including Diyala, where fewer U.S. troops are stationed."

Gates Proves "Less Combative" Than Rumsfeld. The Financial Times (2/17, Sevastopulo) reports, "Before Robert Gates held his first Pentagon press conference as defence secretary, reporters were curious how his modus operandi would differ from Donald Rumsfeld's, his predecessor. When he opened with something Mr Rumsfeld rarely gave - an apology - it was clear a new era had dawned." Gates proved "almost shy" compared to the "charismatically antagonistic" Rumsfeld, but "In a sign Mr Gates may be seeing his honeymoon draw to a close, he came under pressure over recent contradictory statements by members of the military and Bush administration officials about the extent to which top Iranian officials had approved attacks on US solders in Iraq."

Some US Forces In Surge To Deploy Ahead Of Schedule. NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 3, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Thousands of US troops are either already on their way to Iraq or about to deploy for there. That is the case with the US Army Third Infantry division, which you'd recall led the original march into Baghdad, the tip of the spear, now going back months ahead of schedule." The Washington Times/AP (2/17) reports, "The Pentagon said yesterday it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq. The 3rd Infantry Division headquarters staff will deploy from Fort Stewart, Ga., next month -- about three months earlier than planned, according to an Army statement."

ABC World News (2/16, story 3, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Ironically, while the Congress debates the advisability of the President's surge, the surge itself has begun. US and Iraqi troops have launched the increased security crackdown this week. And so far, there are encouraging signs, as they've met little resistance so far." ABC (Karl): "The new effort to secure Baghdad isn't even a week old. But already, the Iraqi military says violence is down.

Iraqi officials offer a morbid statistic. Only 10 bodies showed up at the Baghdad morgue today, compared to the usual average of forty to fifty a day."

Children Of Troops Endure Parents' Absence. The CBS Evening News (2/16, story 7, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News In Focus : The home front.. As Americans in uniform fight overseas, their families need the courage to carry on without them: 163,000 US servicemen and women are serving in Iraq and Afghanistan, and according to the Pentagon, these American heroes have at least that many children back in the States." CBS (Bowen): "By all appearances, Chloe Clark elementary school is typical, until you take a closer look." Coley Fannin: "How many of us are from military families?" Bowen: "Half the 300 students here come from Army families. ... And counselor Coley Fannin's job is to help them learn how to cope. He holds weekly group sessions. ... So they learn to cope, but that doesn't mean 10-year-old Trey Nesbit likes it."

Al Qaeda's Abuses Swing Anbar Sunnis To US Side. The Washington Times (2/17, Hess, 88K) reports on its front page, "Sunni tribes in troubled Anbar province have begun working closely with U.S. and government forces, contributing nearly 2,400 men to the police department and 1,600 to a newly organized tribal security force, authorities say. ... By a U.S. count, 12 of the Ramadi area's 21 tribes are cooperating in the security effort, six are considered neutral, and three are actively hostile. That is almost the reverse of the tribal posture last June, when three were cooperative and 12 were hostile."

Suicide Bomber Kills Nine In Kirkuk. The AP (2/17, Murphy) reports, "A suicide car bomber rammed into a crowded market in northern Iraq moments after a booby-trapped vehicle exploded Saturday, killing at least nine people and injuring 60, police said. The back-to-back blasts in the oil hub of Kirkuk broke a brief lull in major violence around the country as U.S. and Iraqi forces try to regain control of Baghdad and other key areas from gangs and militias."

Quds Force Remains A Mystery. The New York Times (2/17, A1, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "Like so much else about the Iranian state, the Quds Force, which conducts overseas operations for Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, remains remarkably mysterious even to those who closely study the country. The Quds Force is under intense scrutiny by American intelligence agencies because it is suspected of supplying sophisticated explosives to Iraqi militants." Defense Secretary Gates is quoted as saying, "We know that the Quds Force is involved." The Times continues, "But the Quds Force is cloaked in secrecy inside Iran and is the subject of considerable guesswork from scholars in the United States, who in interviews this week offered estimates of its size ranging from 3,000 to 50,000 men. The true number, along with details of the strength and budget of the entire Revolutionary Guard, is hidden even from the Iranian Parliament, said [scholar Abbas] Milani, according to legislators he has spoken with. Some specialists even question whether the Quds Force exists as a formal unit clearly delineated from the rest of the Revolutionary Guard."

Businessman Sentenced For Role In Iraq Scheme. The New York Times/AP (2/17, A11) reports in a four-sentence brief, "An American businessman whose companies made more than $8 million in Iraq reconstruction money through a gifts-for-contracts scheme was sentenced to 46 months in prison. The businessman, Philip H. Bloom, who has lived in Romania for many years, pleaded guilty last year to bribery and conspiracy to commit money laundering."

Iraqi Reporter Describes Search For Missing Father And Brother. In a first-person account for the Wall Street Journal (2/17, A1, 2.04M), Iraqi emigre Sarmad Ali writes, "My father had left home in Baghdad that morning to go to the auto-repair shop across town where he works. Fifteen minutes after he left, car bombs exploded on his route to work and he hasn't been seen since. ... I feel responsible for my family, but at the same time helpless. I am not a U.S. citizen, or a permanent resident. My guest status here prevents me from being able to bring my family to join me." Ali now fears his brother may have been killed in a bombing: "He did not pick up his phone. Not the next day either. I recently reached a friend in Iraq, who said he had seen my brother. But I'm still waiting for him to call back."

Baghdad Girls Find Haven In School. The Washington Post (2/17, A18, Partlow, 690K) reports, "In Baghdad alone, 38,766 people have been driven from their homes by the daily sectarian killing, the United Nations reports, and the echoes of this mass migration resonate every day at Amil High School for Girls in Baghdad. Located in the relatively safe Shiite area of Kadhimiyah, along the western bank of the Tigris River, the whitewashed concrete schoolhouse has become a haven for Shiite Muslim students fleeing with their families from the religious segregation now pulling apart many of Baghdad's neighborhoods. In the past three months, Amil High School has accepted 135 new students, pushing the school's population over 1,000, and more families show up each day. Iraq's Human Rights Ministry has sent employees to distribute skirts, backpacks and shoes to the new pupils."

Al Qaeda Releases Afghan Attack Video. The AP (2/16, Mortimer) reports, "Al-Qaida posted today a video showing what it claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of U.S. and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan. The video appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage U.S. claims to be winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan. ... The narrator, who sounds like the American al-Qaida member Adam Gadahn, claims that the [depicted] position is 'liberated' by the insurgents. However, the film does not show the insurgents capturing the target -- a compound of mud-plastered buildings in a valley -- during the night-time battle. It only shows the insurgents walking through the compound in daylight."

Lawmakers Introduce Bill To Let Death Benefit Go To Guardian. The Washington Post (2/17, A6, George, 690K) reports, "Lawmakers introduced companion bills in the House and Senate yesterday that would allow grandparents and other relatives raising children of fallen troops to be designated as beneficiaries of a $100,000 'death gratuity.' The bills, by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Rep. Tom Latham (R-Iowa), followed a story yesterday in The Washington Post that profiled Susan Jaenke, an Iowa woman who is raising a 9-year-old granddaughter after Jaenke's 29-year-old daughter, Petty Officer 2nd Class Jaime S. Jaenke, was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq. Susan Jaenke could not collect the $100,000 benefit her daughter thought she had assigned to her because of strict next-of-kin regulations."

Injured Marine Becomes Minor League Pitcher. ABC World News (2/16, story 11, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally tonight, our 'Person of the Week,' someone moving into the world of sport that we can all root for." Cpl. Cooper Brannon: "They say Marines don't cry, right? You know, this is one of my biggest dreams of my whole life. You know?" Gibson: "Twenty-two-year-old Cooper Brannan is trading one uniform for another. Just this week, the Marine Corporal signed a minor league contract to pitch for the San Diego Padres. ... He sustained serious wounds to his left hand. Three fingers were severed. Doctors were only able to reattach two of them."

Dowd Says Self-Help "Secret" Has War Policy Relevance. New York Times (2/17, A15, 1.16M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes mockingly, "Oprah did her second show in eight days on 'The Secret,' the self-help book (and DVD) by Rhonda Byrne, an Australian reality-TV producer. ... A main tenet of The Secret is learning to avoid the chain reaction of churlishness, which begins with a single thought: 'The one bad thought attracted more bad thoughts, the frequency locked in, and eventually something went wrong. Then as you reacted to that one thing going wrong, you attracted more things going wrong.' It's an apt description of Iraq policy. A bad thought that led to more bad thoughts, and the negative frequency is now locked in on Iran, which is responding with its own negative frequency."

Former Rove Aide Will Not Seek Arkansas US Attorney Post. The Washington Post (2/17, A10, Eggen, 690K) reports Tim Griffin, "a military lawyer who previously worked for presidential adviser Karl Rove and for the Republican National Committee," said "he will not seek the nomination to be chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock. Griffin "was appointed interim U.S. attorney in Little Rock in December on the White House's recommendation. The Justice Department said it intended to nominate Griffin for the job permanently. But Griffin said yesterday that he would be unlikely to be confirmed for the job because of opposition from key Democratic senators, including Mark Pryor (Ark.) and Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.). … Griffin's decision, which was reported by the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, is the latest development in the controversy over the abrupt firings of seven U.S. attorneys. The dismissals angered lawmakers of both parties and have prompted a battle over the attorney general's power to name replacements." The New York Times (2/17, A12, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "On Thursday evening, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called several Arkansas lawmakers to advise them that Mr. Griffin's name would be withdrawn, Congressional aides said."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/17, Taylor) reports, "Griffin, 38, said he would be willing to remain interim U.S. attorney until a replacement is named. Under a change in the law last year, that means he could stay in office until the end of President Bush's term. … 'I will be here as long as the White House and Department of Justice wants me here,' he said. 'Under the law, I could be here, hypothetically, until end of 2008 or early 2009.'" McClatchy adds, "Justice Department officials described Griffin as a talented and experienced lawyer, and accused Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., of trying to block Griffin from becoming a permanent U.S. attorney. Justice Department officials said Friday that the administration would work with the Arkansas delegation to find a replacement. Gonzales has told senators that he'll submit all U.S. attorney candidates for Senate confirmation. … 'Given Tim's strong qualifications, the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation,' Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said." McClatchy notes, "Administration officials have been forced to defend the firings in recent weeks after critics raised concerns that well-respected U.S. attorneys were being removed to make way for handpicked candidates who would be less likely to buck the White House. .. Gonzales called Pryor on Thursday night to tell him that the Justice Department would not ask the Senate to confirm Griffin. … Gonzales promised that the administration would seek confirmation for another candidate, but he didn't say when an announcement would be made, said Michael Teague, Pryor's spokesman."

WPost Decries DOJ And Interior Officials' Ties To Lobbyist. The Washington Post (2/17, A30, 690K), ina n editorial, writes, "It's the kind of story that seems to confirm everything people believe is sleazy about the way Washington works. Last March, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then the head of the Justice Department's environmental division, bought a $1 million vacation home with Don R. Duncan, the top lobbyist for oil company ConocoPhillips. Nine months later, Ms. Wooldridge signed off on a settlement agreement that let ConocoPhillips delay the installation of pollution-control equipment and the payment of fines. Just to make matters cozier, the third owner of the beach house is J. Steven Griles, the former No. 2 official at the Interior Department who's now the target of a Justice Department criminal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Oh, and Ms. Wooldridge, who lives with Mr. Griles, once worked with him at Interior, where she gave Mr. Griles ethics advice and defended his actions during an inspector general investigation. … Ms. Wooldridge has left the department, but Justice…said yesterday that its Office of Professional Responsibility was looking into the matter."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Seeks Civil Resolution Of Enron-Related Case. The Houston Chronicle (2/17, Hays) reports, "Three former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives whose 2004 fraud and conspiracy convictions in an Enron case were overturned last year may avoid facing another jury." The Chronicle continues, "Upon informing U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein on Friday that the government wanted to retry the case 'sooner rather than later,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Arnold Spencer said prosecutors also would 'continue our conversations' with defense attorneys to resolve it without a second trial. … Spencer declined to elaborate, as did attorneys for two of the defendants. But one of the defense attorneys, Dan Cogdell, said he was 'looking for a civil resolution, not a criminal resolution,' such as a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Chronicle adds, "Werlein, who presided over the first trial, encouraged some sort of nontrial resolution. He said prosecutors should 'at least ponder' where the government's time, money and energy is best spent. … 'So I wish you well in your conversations. I hope you will be able to be successful,' the judge said." The Chronicle notes, "Friday's hearing came nearly six months after a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals threw out most jury convictions of Daniel Bayly, James Brown, Robert Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs. … The case involves a year-end 1999 deal in which the government contends the brokerage pretended to buy three power plants on barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have met quarterly earnings targets. The defendants claimed the deal was proper. … Jurors acquitted in-house Enron accountant Sheila Kahanek while convicting the four Merrill defendants and Dan Boyle, a former Enron finance executive."

FBI Serves Subpoenas On New Jersey Lawmakers In Widening Probe. The Newark

Star-Ledger (2/17, Sherman, Whelan) reported, "New Jersey legislative officials were hit with a volley of federal subpoenas" Friday, "in a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie. The subpoenas were served on both the Democratic and Republican leadership in the Senate and the Assembly -- seeking information on how millions in public funds were handed out over the last three years." The Star-Ledger added, "The subpoenas, delivered by FBI agents late Friday afternoon as lawmakers were heading home, left many in Trenton thunderstruck. 'Trenton is on fire,' declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole (R-Essex), as news of the subpoenas broke. … Lawmakers and other Statehouse veterans could not recall a federal probe ever going as deeply into the state's budget process." The Star-Ledger noted, "Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether some lawmakers have sought, through the state budget process, to steer money to nonprofit organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families."

Payments To Woman Who Had Affair With San Francisco Mayor Under Probe. The New York Times (2/17, McKinley) reports from San Francisco, "In the latest development in a lingering political scandal, the city attorney here is investigating whether any laws were broken in a payment to a married woman who had an affair with Mayor Gavin Newsom." The Times continues, "The woman, Ruby Rippey-Tourk, worked full time in City Hall as the mayor's appointments secretary until last May, when she took a three-month unpaid leave to seek treatment for a substance abuse problem. … While she was on leave, several unidentified city employees donated their sick time to Ms. Rippey-Tourk under a program that allows city employees to transfer sick time to other city employees. After she returned from leave, Ms. Rippey-Tourk formally resigned, and was paid out the cash equivalent of that accumulated time, a little more than $10,000." The Times adds, "Sam Singer, a spokesman for Ms. Rippey-Tourk, said he was not at liberty to say who had transferred their time, but that the mayor had not. Mr. Singer added that the payment was 'acceptable and legal.' … But on Thursday, the city attorney, Dennis Herrera, said he would examine the payment to make sure it had been 'done properly under city laws and procedures.' … Peter Ragone, a spokesman for the mayor, said his office welcomed the review. 'We are confident the matter was handled appropriately and humanely,' Mr. Ragone said." The Times notes, "The inquiry comes as Mr. Newsom is trying to shake off the damage from his admission last month that he had a brief sexual relationship with Ms. Rippey-Tourk in late 2005, when he was in the process of getting a divorce. Ms. Rippey-Tourk is married to Alex Tourk, who had been managing Mr. Newsom's campaign for a second term until the affair prompted his resignation."

Connecticut Attorney Accused Of Destroying Evidence In Child Porn Case. The New York Times (2/17, Malone) reports from Greenwich, CT, "A well-known lawyer was indicted on Friday on charges that he obstructed justice and destroyed evidence in the investigation of a former church choir director whose laptop computer contained images of naked boys." The Times continues, "The lawyer, Philip D. Russell, 48, of Stamford, appeared in United States District Court in Bridgeport and pleaded not guilty. He was released on $100,000 bail. … Mr. Russell is accused of destroying a laptop computer containing pornography that was owned by Robert F. Tate, the longtime music director at Christ Church here. Mr. Tate pleaded guilty in January to possessing 150 to 300 images of naked boys and faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison." The Times adds, "The indictment said that two unidentified church officials and Mr. Russell, who was acting as a lawyer for the church, confronted Mr. Tate in October after a church employee who had been using the laptop discovered the pornographic images. Mr. Tate admitted that the images were his and promptly resigned. … Mr. Russell then took the laptop and dismantled it, the indictment said. … Prosecutors said Mr. Russell and the church officials allowed Mr. Tate to remove his possessions from his church apartment and arranged for him to fly from Connecticut to California. He was later arrested in Los Angeles." The Times notes, "It is unclear whether there will be other indictments. Several people affiliated with the church have hired lawyers, and the Rev. Jeffrey Walker, the church's rector, has been called before the grand jury at least twice. Prosecutors did not return calls seeking comment. … Some legal observers say Mr. Russell's case could be a test of a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law that places greater responsibility on lawyers to preserve evidence in situations that may become the subject of criminal prosecutions."

San Francisco Police Issue Warrant In Wiesel Attack. The New York Times (2/17, Marshall) reports, "The San Francisco Police Department issued an arrest warrant for a man suspected of attacking Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize." The Times continues, "The man, Eric Hunt, 22, of Sussex County, N.J., is accused of assaulting Mr. Wiesel, 78, on Feb. 1, as he was attending an interfaith conference." The Times adds, "Mr. Hunt, who is not yet in custody but has been located, will be charged with a hate crime, the police said in a statement. He was identified as a suspect, the police said, after claiming to be the attacker in an Internet posting."

House Democrats Back Federal Shield Law. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/17, Coile) reports, "House lawmakers, with the support of top Democratic leaders, are preparing to fast-track long-stalled legislation that would shield reporters in most cases from having to reveal their sources to federal prosecutors." The Chronicle continues, "The move follows the Justice Department's decision this week to withdraw a subpoena for two Chronicle reporters after a defense lawyer pleaded guilty to leaking grand jury transcripts in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative investigation, in which top athletes testified they had used illegal steroids." The Chronicle adds, "Reps. Mike Pence, R-Ind., and Rick Boucher, D-Va., plan to reintroduce their federal media shield legislation next month with the support of House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich. Conyers has pledged to move the bill through his committee quickly and to the House floor. … Sens. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., and Richard Lugar, R-Ind., are preparing to reintroduce a similar bill in the Senate, although proponents suggest it may be tougher to get a filibuster-proof 60-vote majority in the Senate, given the Bush administration's opposition. … The Chronicle case has been used by the bill's supporters as Exhibit A for why Congress should pass a law protecting journalists from having to name their sources or turn over materials to the government."

Doolittle Defends Wilkes In Cunningham Bribery Probe. The Sacramento Bee (2/17, Whitney) reports, "Rep. John Doolittle, R-Roseville, said Friday that he believes in the innocence of a close friend and political supporter indicted this week on charges related to the bribery of former San Diego-area Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The Bee continues, "Brent Wilkes, a Poway defense contractor whose business Doolittle had helped land a $37 million contract, was indicted on corruption charges, including paying bribes and providing prostitutes for Cunningham, who's now in prison. … Wilkes entered a not guilty plea to the charges, handed up by a federal grand jury, in a federal court in San Diego on Wednesday. He later sent out an e-mail proclaiming his innocence. … 'The investigation and its accompanying deliberate leaks of false rumors has destroyed my reputation and inflicted critical wounds on all of my business interests,' Wilkes said. 'Let me say loud and clear: I never bribed Duke Cunningham or anyone else.'" The Bee notes, "Doolittle said in an earlier interview that he befriended Wilkes though Ed Buckham, a former staff member for then-Rep. Tom DeLay who became a lobbyist for the Alexandria Strategy Group and was a close associate of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Doolittle also has described Abramoff as a close friend. … Over the course of their relationship, Wilkes and his wife, Regina, together with his companies and associates, contributed tens of thousands of dollars to Doolittle's re-election committee and political action committee. … In April 2005, Wilkes' corporate jet was used to fly DeLay to Las Vegas for a fundraiser at the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino for Doolittle's PAC, the Superior California Federal Leadership Fund. Wilkes contributed $10,000 to Doolittle at that event. … Later, Doolittle acknowledged he included a $37 million item in the Defense Department's budget to pay for a contract to one of Wilkes' companies, PerfectWave. He also said he tried to win a House contract for another Wilkes company, ADCS. … Asked about Wilkes' indictment during a telephone news conference Friday, Doolittle said he has read his friend's statement, and believes him."

Michigan Lawmakers Await DOJ Standards On Sex Offender Registry. The Lansing (MI) State Journal (2/17, Adams) reports, "A Senate bill would amend the state's 1994 sex offender registry law to follow federal registry requirements. … But unfortunately, federal officials haven't revealed those requirements." The Journal continues, "The bill would expand information about ex-cons on the State Police public sex offender registry to include details about vehicles they own, their places of employment and convictions for other crimes. … That would comply with a 2006 federal mandate that requires standardization of information in state registries so they can be integrated into the National Sex Offender Registry. … However, the U.S.

Justice Department hasn't announced what standardization would entail. It's up to that department to read what Congress ordered and determine exactly what it means, said Sgt. Matt Bolger, legislative liaison for the State Police. … 'Federal law is nowhere near as easy to read as state law is,' he said. … 'We're kind of waiting on that determination from the Department of Justice on what our duties are going to be.'" The Journal notes, "Once those duties have been determined, Michigan lawmakers can amend state law to comply, Bolger said."

Judge's Order Regarding Plame's Status Questioned. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/17, A31, 690K) the National Review's Byron York writes, "At the end of each witness's testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, after prosecutors and defense attorneys examined and cross-examined, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton asked jurors to write down any questions they had. Walton would then look through the papers, decide which questions were appropriate and pose them to the witness. … But last week there was a moment when we got a hint not from a question that Walton asked, but from one he refused to ask. After the testimony of star prosecution witness Tim Russert, Walton scanned the jurors' queries and announced, 'There is going to be one question I'm not going to ask. I've concluded that that question is not appropriate and therefore you should not speculate as to what the response would have been.' What was he talking about? A moment later, Walton told the jurors: 'What Mrs. Wilson's status was at the CIA, whether it was covert or not covert, is not something that you're going to hear any evidence presented to you on in this trial.' 'Whether she was, or whether she was not, covert is not relevant to the issues you have to decide in this case,' he said. It is The Thing That Cannot Be Spoken at the Libby trial. … The result is that jurors have heard constant suggestions that some sort of crime, committed by the administration and perhaps by Libby himself, lies at the bottom of the case. An air of accusation hangs over the courtroom. But the accusation can't be discussed."

GE To Book $115 In Asbestos Claims Expenses. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, Kranhold) reports, "General Electric Co. said it will record a $115 million after-tax expense in the first quarter after losing a decade-long battle with its insurers over payments for thousands of asbestos-related claims." The Journal continues, "In a decision released this week, the New York State Court of Appeals upheld lower-court rulings preventing GE from tapping secondary insurance to cover claims brought mostly by individuals exposed to asbestos-insulated turbines. The Court of Appeals is the state's highest court." The Journal adds, "To date, GE, based in Fairfield, Conn., has paid more than $500 million to settle asbestos-related cases, according to court documents. GE said 509,000 asbestos-related claims were filed against the company through 2006; 40,000 are pending. GE said claims settled to date have mostly been covered by both GE's primary and secondary carriers; the rest are being covered by GE. GE didn't make the asbestos but used it to insulate turbines. … GE spokesman Gary Sheffer said, in a statement, GE was 'disappointed in the decision, which is contrary to how the majority of courts have ruled.' Mr. Sheffer said GE is reviewing its options. … Mr. Sheffer said the expense, amounting to about one cent per share, would have no impact on GE's financial forecast for the first quarter. GE has said it expects net income of between $4.5 billion and $4.6 billion, or 43 cents to 45 cents a share. … The lawsuit centered on whether GE's asbestos-related claims should be treated as one incident under its insurance policies issued between 1965 and 1985 or whether each claim should be treated individually."

DC Circuit Panel Hears Suit Over Tire-Pressure Monitors. The Detroit News (2/17, Shepardson) reports, "A three-judge federal appeals court panel today expressed skepticism toward tire makers and an auto safety group who say federal regulators have watered down rules requiring tire pressure monitoring systems in all new vehicles starting this fall." The News continues, "Tire makers and Public Citizen argue the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's regulation, aimed at making automakers install tire-pressure warning systems, falls far short of what Congress intended when it passed a 2000 law requiring that all vehicles be equipped with such monitors by Sept 1." The News adds, "The legislation came in the wake of a recall of 13 million tires on Ford Explorers and other vehicles that were linked to nearly 280 deaths. … A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia heard the challenge to the NHTSA rule today, more than three years after another appeals court threw out NHTSA's first tire pressure regulation, issued in 2002. … Judges David Sentelle, Brett Kavanaugh and A. Raymond Randolph questioned whether the tire makers and Public Citizen had the legal right or 'standing' to file the suit. … Marc Machlin, a lawyer for Public Citizen, noted that more than 78,000 accidents yearly are caused by under inflated tires." The News notes, "The plaintiffs must overcome several hurdles: one is showing that there is a 'non-trivial' higher risk from the rule NHTSA imposed versus the type of tire monitoring rules they are seeking. They also must show they have a legal right to file the suit. … Sentelle said if there is only a general risk for everyone, the matter is best decided by 'the political branches' -- i.e. Congress and the White House. Sentelle said under the Public Citizen theory, drivers, passengers and pedestrians -- basically everyone in the United States -- would have a right to sue. … But Kavanaugh also asked some tough questions of Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III. He said it was 'odd' that NHTSA could 'water down' or effectively eliminate some of the requirements that Congress set in its statute. … Byron said Congress couldn't have meant to mandate an 'impossible' requirement, namely that automakers certify that their systems work with all replacement tires."

DOJ Backs Florida Sober House Suit. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/17, Franceschina) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice filed a legal brief Friday contending that a Boca Raton ordinance banning so-called sober houses from residential neighborhoods clearly violates federal housing law." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "The Justice Department brief was filed in a lawsuit by a sober house operator against the city that went to trial last month. It asks a federal judge to declare the ordinance invalid and prevent the city from enforcing it. The ordinance, passed by the City Council in May 2002, would require the sober houses to move into areas of the city zoned for medical centers and hotels." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "The ordinance has never been enforced because of the threat of litigation. Steve Manko, the owner of two large sober house apartment complexes -- Boca House for men and Awakenings for women -- sued the city in March 2003. The American Civil Liberties Union, representing former and current Boca House clients, also was involved in the case. … Manko's attorney, William Hill of Miami, said he was encouraged by the Justice Department filing because it supports the plaintiffs' position. The plaintiffs contend that the ordinance violates the federal Fair Housing Act and also the Americans with Disabilities Act. Under those federal provisions, people who are in recovery from alcohol or drug addiction are considered to be disabled or handicapped, providing them with housing protections. … 'I'm ecstatic,' Hill said. 'It could not be clearer. The Department of Justice is saying what we have been saying all along: This ordinance violates the Fair Housing Act on its face. The city should have realized this was wrong years ago and not put us through this. Instead, the city has been putting forth a defense that is not legal under the Fair Housing Act.' … Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the Justice Department filing did not raise any new issues. … The Justice Department filed a separate suit against the city over the alleged housing violations in September. That case is pending. The judge hearing Manko's suit invited the Justice Department to file Friday's brief. … Justice Department attorney Nancy Langworthy wrote that the city's ordinance 'singles out for regulation housing for disabled persons and is discriminatory on its face.' Langworthy asked the judge to award damages to several former and current residents of Boca House and to impose a fine on the city 'to vindicate the public interest.'"

NYTimes Urges New York To Curb Police Camera Use. The New York Times (2/17) editorializes, "The New York Police Department has generally had the public on its side when it comes to securing the city since the Sept. 11 attacks. For their part, New Yorkers seem perfectly willing to put up with inconveniences, including traffic stops and bag searches. But the police have more and more overstepped their bounds by routinely and indiscriminately videotaping demonstrations of every kind, even peaceful ones. A federal judge was right this week to order the police to curb this conduct." The Times continues, "The practical effect of the order is to compel law-enforcement officers to obey guidelines that require them to state a reason to suspect unlawful activity before they videotape demonstrators. They must also get department authorization. That's a modest requirement. The city contends the current practice is not strictly unconstitutional, but the prospect of being photographed by police while merely protesting can have a chilling effect on free speech." The Times concludes that the city government "should now move quickly to ensure the court, and the public, that it will protect New Yorkers' civil liberties."

ANTITRUST:

GM Reportedly Discussing Buyout Of DaimlerChrysler. The Washington Times (2/17, Lengell) reports, "The world's largest automaker is set to expand further, as General Motors Corp. is negotiating to buy the struggling Chrysler division from its German parent, DaimlerChrysler AG, sources with knowledge of the talks said." The Times continues, "GM and DaimlerChrysler officials have denied the existence of any talks. … 'We're not going to comment on speculations concerning [any] discussions between [DaimlerChrysler] and GM,' GM spokesman Tom Wilkinson said yesterday. 'As we've said in the past, we've frequently discussed areas of mutual interest with other carmakers, and in a lot of cases, these discussions don't lead anywhere.'" The Times adds, "Nevertheless, Detroit and Wall Street were buzzing after the German business publication Manager Magazin reported Wednesday that GM and DaimlerChrysler were negotiating a buyout of Chrysler. … Speculation of a buyout intensified yesterday after the U.S. trade publication Automotive News reported that 'high level talks' of a buyout between DaimlerChrysler and GM executives are being held."

The Washington Post (2/17, D1, Freeman) reports, "Shares of DaimlerChrysler climbed yesterday after media reports that General Motors was in talks to buy the German firm's Chrysler division." The Post continues, "Chrysler officials in Germany played down the reports, saying the primary focus now for Chrysler was a restructuring aimed at returning it to profitability. And U.S. industry executives struggled yesterday to assess how GM would benefit from an alliance with Chrysler. GM is in the process of shrinking its operations in an attempt to increase its profit. … Other potential Chrysler suitors include European or Asian carmakers seeking a bigger foothold in North America. Renault-Nissan Motor chief executive Carlos Ghosn, who unsuccessfully sought to enter into an alliance with General Motors last year, has said he is open to new partners. He has not, however, publicly expressed interest in Chrysler."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, B3, Stoll, Berman) reports, "GM and Chrysler are discussing joining forces to develop a large sport-utility vehicle and possibly a small car made in Korea, several people familiar with the matter said, adding that a 'production deal' is the most likely scenario. … On Wall Street, the focus also turned to Detroit's labor negotiations with the United Auto Workers. As so much of the industry's future is based around this contract, the issue presents a chicken-and-egg paradox for potential buyers." The Journal adds, "Many people discounted the idea of a spinoff, saying that it would do little to fix Chrylser's main problems of cost structure and product appeal. That said, these people pointed out that what is best for the remaining Daimler side of the company may not be best for Chrysler's side. … DaimlerChrysler investors clearly favor the idea of selling Chrysler, long the smallest of Detroit's Big Three and now even smaller than Toyota Motor Corp. in the U.S. market. … A deal linking GM, the world's largest auto maker, and Chrysler would likely face many hurdles, including antitrust questions, integration challenges and opposition from workers."

The Financial Times (2/17, Reed, Milne, Simon) reports, "Analysts expressed scepticism on Friday that GM's shareholders would support the idea of a tie-up with Chrysler, the most focused of Detroit's Big Three, at a time when both face declining sales in the world's biggest car market. … GM has not made a full car-company acquisition in its recent history, although, like other groups, it forms ad hoc alliances and joint ventures."

The New York Times (2/17, Maynard) reports, "The willingness by DaimlerChrysler to cut loose its Chrysler Group, ending its nine-year trans-Atlantic partnership, is drawing cheers from investors. … Shares of the German company rose nearly 14.4 percent this week, capped by a climb on Friday that was fueled by speculation that General Motors and Chrysler were holding talks. DaimlerChrysler ended the week at $73.33, up $3.08." The Times continues, "The talk is doing little for G.M., however. Its shares rose less than 1 percent this week, closing Friday at $36.34, down 10 cents. … On Wednesday, DaimlerChrysler said it was keeping all its options open for Chrysler, refusing to rule out a sale or a strategic partner for its American unit." The Times adds, "At Friday's close, DaimlerChrysler stock was within $1.20 of a 52-week high, prompting some analysts to predict it could be headed much higher, to levels rarely seen since the heady days after the 1998 merger. … That alone is reason enough to keep the rumors swirling a little longer, analysts said, giving DaimlerChrysler time to see whether any potential suitors come forward for Chrysler. It has hired JPMorgan as a strategic adviser."

Banco Bilbao To Buy Compass Bancshares. The New York Times (2/17, Werdigier) reports, "Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria, Spain's second-largest bank, after Santander, agreed to buy Compass Bancshares of the United States for $9.6 billion, making its biggest acquisition abroad in a market where it seeks to strengthen its foothold." The Times continues, "Banco Bilbao, or BBVA, said Friday that Compass shareholders can choose to receive either $71.80 in cash or 2.8 new BBVA shares for each of their current Compass shares. The offer represents a premium of about 16 percent to the average Compass share price during the last 10 days and 8 percent above Friday's closing price." The Times adds, "Spain's banks have profited from significant growth in the Spanish economy and a sharp increase in mortgage lending, even to foreigners who are buying holiday homes in the country. BBVA, based in Bilbao, in northern Spain, and Banco Santander Central Hispano, the country's largest bank, have used their profits to expand into Latin America, where economic growth has spurred demand for banking services. … BBVA owns BBVA Bancomer, the largest bank in Mexico by assets, while Santander has spent a total of $17 billion on various Latin American acquisitions since 1996. Santander now owns Mexico's No. 3 bank, Serfin, and Brazil's seventh-largest lender, Banespa."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, B1, Johnson) reports, "Spain's two main retail banks have moved from the bush leagues to become among the largest, most efficient, most profitable in the world. And one of them just made a big play to take on two U.S. giants in a lucrative American market." The Journal continues, "Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's agreement to buy Alabama-based Compass Bancshares Inc. for $9.6 billion, announced Friday, would give it hundreds of branches in the South and West, including 163 in Texas, a fast-growing market. That would pit Madrid-based BBVA against Bank of America Corp. and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., the Lone Star State's two biggest banks. … That deal follows Spain-based Banco Santander Central Hispano SA's acquisition last year of a 25% stake in Philadelphia-based Sovereign Bancorp, which has almost 800 branches in nine states." The Journal adds, "BBVA was all bluster in announcing the deal. BBVA 'is much more advanced than the Citis or the J.P. Morgans' at nuts-and-bolts retail banking, said Chairman and Chief Executive Francisco González. … The U.S. rivals are expected to put up a fight. 'They're competing against some of our best retail banks,' said Jefferson L. Harralson, a bank analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods. 'It's going to be hard for them to move market share, and it's going to be hard for them keep market share.' … The deal follows a string of acquisitions that have turned BBVA and Santander into the world's 15th-largest and ninth-largest banks respectively by stock-market value. Both reported record full-year profits this month."

The Financial Times (2/17, Mulligan) reports, "Analysts voiced concerns about the dilutive effect of the planned €4bn capital increase to part-fund the deal, which comes just three months after a €3bn share issue aimed at improving the balance sheet. … There were also worries about the erosion of BBVA's core capital ratios. 'History shows investors should be wary of acquisitive companies,' UBS said."

Tribune Moves Toward "Self-Help" Auction Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A2, Ellison) reports, "As the auction for Tribune Co. limps to a close, it is becoming clear that newspaper publishers can't sell their way out of their current woes." The Journal continues, "Tribune's board of directors is scheduled to meet late this coming week, and while it is uncertain they will emerge from the meeting with an announcement, company management and advisers are casting aside outside offers and working on what is being billed as a 'self-help' plan. … That is another way of saying that nobody came to Tribune's rescue." The Journal adds, "Typically, if a company avoids a takeover, employees and management breathe a sigh of relief and go back to business as usual. But if this auction ends as many expect, Tribune will have to self-inflict the kinds of harsh changes that normally come from an outside buyer. That will mean even steeper cost cutting and asset sales. … That is partly because Tribune, along with many other newspaper players, waited too long to take the dramatic action that now is being thrust upon them. Tribune was forced into the auction process by its largest shareholder, the Chandler family, which pushed for action just as panic was building about the industry's prospects. The irony is that the Chandlers were too late. They are angling to remove themselves from the newspaper business they should have gotten out of years ago, when they sold Times Mirror Co. to Tribune in 2000. Today, the options are much more limited. … Under the current plan, at least Tribune's fate is all in the Chicago family. Sam Zell, a Windy City real-estate mogul, and the Chandlers are still circling Tribune, though any chance of either party making a successful offer is unlikely. Tribune isn't comfortable with either proposal being proffered, and neither party seems willing to increase the terms."

New England Ski Resorts To Be Sold. The Boston Globe (2/17, Reidy) reports, "Two New England ski resorts, Mount Snow in Vermont and Attitash in New Hampshire, are set to be sold for $73.5 million." The Globe continues, "American Skiing Co. of Utah said yesterday it has entered into an accord to sell Mount Snow and Attitash to Peak Resorts Inc. of Missouri. … Included in the proposed sale of Mount Snow and Attitash are the commercial cores of the Grand Summit Hotels at both locations, said American Skiing, which added that the buyer will assume $2 million in debt and other liabilities." The Globe adds, "Saying that the sale is expected to close on or before April 30, American Skiing said it plans to use the proceeds to reduce existing debt and for working capital. … The deal will give Eureka, Mo.-based Peak Resorts its first major ski areas. That company operates half a dozen tiny ski areas in Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, and New Hampshire. … The sale will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah. … American Skiing already has agreed to sell Colorado's Steamboat Springs resort to Canadian resort operator Intrawest Corp. for $265 million. David Hirasawa, the company's investor-relations manager, said Steamboat is expected to change hands by March. … Both resorts sit partly on national forest land, and the sale will require the consent of the US Forest Service. Stockholder approval also will be required. … Hirasawa said the sale also is subject to an antitrust review by the US Justice Department."

The AP (2/17, Foy) reports, "The sale is set for the end of April and will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah. … American Skiing already has agreed to sell Colorado's Steamboat Springs resort to Canadian resort operator Intrawest Corp. for $265 million. Hirasawa said Steamboat is expected to change hands by March." The AP adds, "American Skiing has been investing heavily in The Canyons, its flagship 3,700-acre resort in Park City, which added terrain and lifts this winter. It also owns Killington and Pico, neighbors in central Vermont, and Maine's Sunday River and Sugarloaf/USA. … The company said Dover's Mount Snow, the closest major Vermont resort to the New York City metro area, is the fifth most popular eastern U.S. ski area. It has an 18-hole golf course."

IG Finds Interior Ethics Lapses Are Rarely Punished. The Boston Globe (2/17, Donnelly) reports, "Officials at the US Interior Department received free golf outings, dinners, hunting trips, and box seats at sporting events from companies they monitored, but were rarely punished for the ethics violations, other than being ordered to attend two-hour ethics courses, the department's inspector general told a House panel yesterday." The Globe continues, "Testifying before the House Natural Resources Committee, Earl E. Devaney said the ethical lapses were part of a department-wide culture 'replete with a lack of accountability.' … Devaney, who for seven years has been the independent overseer of a department that manages oil leases, national parks, and Native American affairs, has been in charge of numerous investigations inside the Interior Department, including one probe that has drawn intense scrutiny: What was behind the omission of royalty payments to the government in oil and gas contracts from 1998 to 1999. … He said the loss of the payments, which kick in when oil and gas prices reached certain levels, could cost taxpayers 'tens of billions of dollars' over the lifetime of the contracts. Six criminal investigations were now under way by the Justice Department relating to unethical behavior in the department, Devaney said." The Globe notes, "Asked why the Interior Department has had so many ethical and management problems, Devaney suggested it was simply greed. … 'Outside of the money at the Treasury Department, everything else [of value] that someone would want is at Interior -- oil, gas, mines, land, and water,' he said. 'It's been my experience that when a lot of money is at stake, bad people will show up eventually.' … Still, he told the committee that '99.9 percent' of department employees were dedicated and ethical and that Dirk A. Kempthorne , the current department secretary, has in the past year tried to tackle a multitude of serious problems."

California Seen As Model For States Seeking To Conserve Energy. The Washington Post (2/17, A1, Mufson, 690K) reports California "uses less energy per capita than any other state in the country, defying the international image of American energy gluttony. Since 1974, California has held its per capita energy consumption essentially constant, while energy use per person for the United States overall has jumped 50 percent. California has managed that feat through a mixture of mandates, regulations and high prices. The state has been able to cut greenhouse-gas emissions, keep utility companies happy and maintain economic growth. And in the wake of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change report on global warming, California serves as a model for other states seeking a similar path to energy reduction. Now California is pushing further in its effort to cut automobile pollution, spur use of solar energy and cap greenhouse gases."

NYTimes Praises Johanns Farm Bill Proposals. The New York Times (2/17, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "Mike Johanns, the secretary of agriculture, has unveiled his proposals for a new farm bill, which on the whole seems remarkably promising. Mr. Johanns seems to have little desire to protect entrenched subsidies and a very strong desire to improve the environment. The question is whether Congress will listen to him or to the lobbyists. … The bill also calls for $7.8 billion over 10 years to help protect the environment — which makes it the most generous conservation program the Bush administration has offered in the last six years."

LATimes Pleased By Stevens' Shift On CAFE Standards. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, 850K) editorializes, "Sen. Ted Stevens' resistance to fighting climate change is melting faster than his home state's glaciers. The senior senator from Alaska proposed a bill last month aimed at raising automotive fuel economy standards, in some ways higher than a competing bill backed by such traditional environmentalists as Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) Stevens' about-face on fuel economy (he voted against a bill two years ago similar to the one he just introduced) is welcome, even if many of his proposal's details aren't. Across-the-aisle initiatives like his are part of the reason this Congress stands a good chance of making the most meaningful improvements to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards since they were created during the last fuel crisis in the 1970s."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Played No Role In Neo-Nazi Rally Organized By Florida Informant. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Orlando Sentinel (2/17, Curtis) reported, "The FBI played no role in staging a neo-Nazi rally last year in Orlando, a statement released Friday says. Questions about the bureau's possible involvement were raised earlier this week when a hearing in federal court disclosed that a paid FBI informant and member of the National Socialist Movement organized the white supremacist march. 'In no way did the FBI initiate, organize, or sponsor the NSM rally,' the statement from the agency's Orlando office says." The Sentinel added, "Many agencies use informants, and in its statement Friday, the FBI explained some of the benefits. 'By the nature of its investigative mission, the FBI . . . must aggressively pursue intelligence avenues that bring it into contact with individuals and/or organizations in unsavory and/or illegal activity,' the statement says." However, the Sentinel noted, "The FBI has a long history of using informants and occasionally getting burned by them. One of the most notorious examples was James 'Whitey' Bulger, still on the 10 Most-Wanted List in connection with 18 murders."

Baseball's Bonds Chases Record While Legal Problems Mount. The New York Times (2/17, Chass) reports, "When Babe Ruth broke Roger Connor's career home run record, no one paid much attention. Connor had hit 138 home runs in the 1880s and 1890s, and Ruth passed him in 1921 with little or no fanfare. Much was made of Henry Aaron eclipsing Ruth's record in 1974, but even then probably the most notable thing that happened was that Aaron shoved a box of strawberries in a reporter's face. … But Barry Bonds's threat to Aaron's record of 755 couldn't generate more of a sideshow." The Times continues, "Bonds's pursuit of the record — he needs 22 home runs to break it — is entwined with the issue of steroids. Did he or did he not use them to slug 213 home runs in a four-season span from 2000 through 2003? Or did he just use a good grade of flaxseed oil?" The Times adds, "One act of the sideshow was written out of the script when Bonds signed his $15.8 million contract for the 2007 season the other day, 10 weeks after he and the Giants agreed to its terms and two weeks after he first signed it. … A second version of the contract became necessary when the commissioner's office struck an appearance clause from the original version. Bonds became upset by another clause in the contract after it leaked out. That clause says the Giants can void the contract if Bonds is indicted." The Times notes, "Any indictment would be put together by the United States attorney's office in San Francisco, which has a new interim head, Scott N. Schools, who replaced

Kevin V. Ryan. Schools is a career federal prosecutor who previously served as a general counsel in the Justice Department. For now, he will run a San Francisco office that was apparently divided last summer over whether to push right then and there for an indictment of Bonds. … The term of the federal grand jury that was meeting at that point was about to expire, and lawyers involved in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid-distribution case say there was a split among assistant United States attorneys about seeking an indictment before that jury was dismissed. The lawyers said their understanding was that Ryan decided not to go forward."

IMMIGRATION:

Movement To Free Imprisoned Border Guards Gains Momentum. The Washington Post (2/17, A2, Fears, 690K) reports, "Early this week, the Bush administration urged angry conservatives to remain calm over the convictions of two former Border Patrol agents who shot an unarmed Mexican drug smuggler, but petitions for their release continued to flood the White House. It did not help that one the lawmen, Ignacio Ramos, was attacked by Latino gang members in his cell…and beaten bloody. Days after prison officials confirmed the beating on Feb. 8, Department of Homeland Security officials admitted that an inspector general's report erroneously quoted Border Patrol agents as saying Ramos and his partner, Jose Compean, intended to kill Mexicans." Rep. Tom Tancredo "visited Ramos in prison and told him of the movement against his incarceration." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher "threatened to call for impeachment proceedings against President Bush if the agents were harmed in prison." Sen. Dianne Feinstein "promised to look into the matter."

Chertoff Touts Guest Worker Program In Mexico. The New York Times (2/17, A8, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "On his first official visit to Mexico, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he considered an expanded guest-worker program for Mexican migrants as key to stopping terrorists and criminals from slipping into the United States. 'Every time a Border Patrol officer is transporting a load of future housekeepers and landscapers to some place to be returned, he's not looking for drug dealers or drug loads,' Mr. Chertoff said after two days of meetings with Mexico's top security officials."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Small Business Tax Breaks As Part Of Minimum Wage Deal. The Washington Post (2/17, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports the House "overwhelmingly approved a modest package of tax breaks for restaurants and small businesses, moving Congress one step closer to approving the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nearly a decade. On a vote of 360 to 45, the House agreed to extend and expand credits and deductions to save taxpayers $1.3 billion over 10 years. It would adjust the tax code to increase collections by a similar amount. The measure would also guarantee that restaurant owners could keep a tax credit worth an estimated $500 million over 10 years. The measure now moves to the Senate, which passed a far more generous $8.3 billion tax package this month under pressure from Republicans who refused to support a higher minimum wage unless it included tax relief for small businesses."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, Lueck, 2.04M) reports Sen. Charles Grassley "called the House package 'puny.' There is common ground on the substance of some breaks . Both the House and Senate bills would extend a credit for businesses that employ disadvantaged workers and a deduction for small companies' equipment expenses. 'I know there are differences between the bills, but I'm confident they'll be worked out,' said Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. The bill would raise the minimum wage by $2.10 an hour -- from $5.15 to $7.25 -- over two years."

The New York Times (2/17, A10, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "Lawmakers are not expected to reconcile the difference until after their 'Presidents' Day District Work Period' next week, and it remains unclear how difficult those negotiations will be. Further muddying the outlook is a split between small-business groups and big-business groups over which bill to support. 'I would not say we're surprised at the delay,' said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan. 'But I would say we are chagrined.' Few lawmakers doubt that Congress will eventually approve the higher minimum wage, which was last raised 10 years ago. The battle is over how much business groups and Republicans can demand in return."

The Washington Times/AP (2/17) reports, "Groups representing small businesses, such as the National Federation of Independent Business, prefer the larger Senate bill. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce supports the House bill because it objects to the Senate's revenue provisions, particularly the plan to eliminate deductions for payments in lawsuits."

DOJ_NMG_0134327

Two Moles Removed From Bush's Left Temple. The Washington Post/AP (2/17, A11) reports President Bush "had two moles removed from his left temple yesterday. His doctors say they expect tests on the skin growths to show that they are noncancerous. The five-minute procedure, called a shave biopsy, was performed in the White House office of Bush's official physician, Richard J. Tubb. Stephen Krivda, a dermatologist from Walter Reed Army Medical Center, performed the procedure, for which only a local anesthetic was required." ABC World News (2/16, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M), the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 8, Couric, 7.66M), and NBC Nightly News (2/16, Williams, 9.87M) all ran brief items on the procedure.

Cheney Departing For Asia With Many Worries But Also Bush's Confidence. Two reports on Vice President Cheney's trip to Asia this week cast Cheney's role and influence in starkly different terms. Under the headline "Controversy Likely To Follow Cheney To Asia," the Los Angeles Times (2/17, Reynolds, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports says with Cheney "set to depart Monday for a weeklong trip to Asia," many in Washington "are wondering whether he might be grateful for an excuse to high-tail it out of town. The past few weeks have not been kind to the vice president -- or at least to his public image."

But the Chicago Tribune (2/17, Silva, 617K) headlines its story "Cheney Tours With Bush's Confidence," and while, like the Times piece, it recounts Cheney's recent woes, the story says Cheney "has not lost his influence with President Bush, who often has counted on his sharp-tongued No. 2 to launch the most searing offensives against political and administration critics. And, since the retirement of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and a recasting of the administration, Bush has counted even more on the hardest of his hard-liners to hold the White House line." With the Bush Administration now "besieged by congressional critics of the war in Iraq yet boasting of sudden progress in a nuclear standoff with North Korea, Cheney will make a weeklong tour of the Pacific. He will offer a nod of thanks to Bush's supporters in the 'war on terror,' but also pointed reminders of the risks still posed by powers intent on undermining Western democracy."

Low Judicial Pay Said To Discourage Top Candidates. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/17, A15, 1.16M) University of Wisconsin law professor Anne Althouse writes, "It's hard to ask for a raise, especially when you're a judge. Look at poor Justice Anthony Kennedy supplicating before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Valentine's Day. With stilted locutions — 'it's frankly most awkward for me' — he staked out pedantic points about the constitutional scheme of separation of powers, and lumbered toward a conclusion that federal judges need to make more money. … If the pay is low, the judges will be the kind of people who don't care that much about money. They might be monkish scholars, or they might be ideologues who see in the law whatever it is they think is good for us. … Low judicial pay should trouble us not because the judges will somehow lack 'excellence.' It should trouble us because the law will be articulated by ideologues and recluses."

Pelosi Gives Jefferson Seat On Homeland Security Panel. The Washington Post (2/17, A9, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, "who yanked embattled Rep. William J. Jefferson off a powerful tax committee last year, has decided to put him on the Homeland Security panel, aides to the Louisiana Democrat confirmed yesterday. The move infuriated some Republicans, who accuse him of being a potential security risk. Jefferson has been the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation related to a telecommunications deal in Africa."

Bill Giving FDA Power To Regulate Tobacco Garners Bipartisan Support. The Washington Post (2/17, A8, Lee, 690K) reports, "After years of falling short, advocates of requiring the Food and Drug Administration to regulate tobacco are again waging that fight in Congress -- and this time, they say, the odds are in their favor. … A bipartisan group of lawmakers introduced legislation last week to grant the FDA authority over the manufacturing, marketing and sale of tobacco products, including the power to restrict advertising, require stronger warning labels, and regulate the amount of nicotine and other ingredients. The agency would not be able to ban tobacco." The Post notes the FDA "claimed the authority to regulate tobacco in the mid-1990s…but the effort was challenged by tobacco companies and overturned by the Supreme Court in 2000. What followed were several attempts to pass legislation in Congress, many of which attracted broad-based support -- including from cigarette maker Philip Morris USA. But invariably the bills hit an impasse and died. … 'This is the year when we can pass meaningful legislation,' said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, the lead GOP sponsor in the House, whose father died of emphysema. Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the top Republican sponsor in the Senate, said 54 percent of smokers take up the habit before age 18. The legislation 'is the best way to address the public health concerns and the marketing concerns we have about children being targeted and addicted to a drug like nicotine,' he said."

GSA Responds To Waxman Inquiry Regarding Noncompetitive Contract. The Washington Post (2/17, A4, Higham, O'Harrow, 690K) reports the U.S. General Services Administration "has responded to a congressional inquiry by saying its chief, Lurita Alexis Doan, did nothing improper last summer when she tried to arrange for a study by a company run by a woman with whom she had a 'close professional relationship.' In a Feb. 2 response to Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the agency said Doan was trying to promote diversity when she signed a 'service order' for the $20,000 project. That July 25 document was intended to authorize a company, Diversity Best Practices, run by Edie Fraser, to write a 24-page report and analysis concerning the GSA's use of businesses owned by minorities or women." GSA Associate Administrator Kevin Messner "rejected 'the implication that her intentions were improper' and said the project was stopped before any money changed hands."

VA Secretary Shuts Down Research Centers After Loss Of Hard Drive. The AP (2/16, Evans) reports Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson "has suspended activities at seven specialized research centers across the country after an unprotected computer hard drive disappeared from one of the facilities in Alabama last month. In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, Nicholson called the department's latest data breach 'tragic' and ordered the VA's Research Enhancement Award Programs to shut down until they are certified as meeting security standards." The New York Times/AP (2/17, A11) carried an abbreviated version of this story.

WSJournal Notes Portman's Guidance On Formerly Earmarked Projects. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A8, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "On Thursday, White House budget director Rob Portman issued little-noticed guidance to all federal departments and agencies that no Congressional requests for spending should be accommodated unless they are 'specifically identified in statutory text' -- which is to say, the law. This may sound like it ought to be regular practice, but it's a revolution in the Beltway. That's because, in order to dodge the legislative earmark limits…Members have been speed-dialing executive branch officials and asking them to fund their specific earmark requests out of agency budgets even though they were purged from the larger budget bill. This Congressional lobbying can be hard for the average federal bureaucrat to refuse, since he doesn't want to offend those on Capitol Hill who control his budget. Mr. Portman's directive is intended to stiffen these backbones against such Congressional extortion."

OTHER NEWS:

Monthly Housing Starts Fall To Lowest Level In A Decade. ABC World News (2/16, story 8, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The struggling housing market has just turned in another weak showing. New home construction plunged more than 14% last month, to the lowest level in 10 years. Bad weather gets some of the blame. But permits for future construction were also down in January." The CBS Evening News (2/16, story 3, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) also said the "housing market is in a slump. Just today, the government reported that builders were putting up new homes last month at the slowest pace in nearly ten years. And with demand for homes down, prices are falling as well." NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 8, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the decline in housing starts.

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, Bater, Blackstone, 2.04M) puts the story on its front page, saying "builders slashed construction of new homes last month to the lowest level in nearly a decade, a move that underscores the severity of the sector's slump and signals it will likely continue to be a drag on the economy at least through midyear." The Washington Post (2/17, D2, Schneider, 690K) says housing starts fell to "the slowest annual rate since the late 1990s." The New York Times (2/17, C3, Peters, 1.16M) says economists "seemed to agree that most of the drop-off in residential construction indicated that builders were pulling back from a market that was oversaturated with unsold homes and short on buyers." The New York Times (2/17, A10, Robbins, 1.16M) also runs a feature on the housing situation in Montana, where a boom has had the reverse effect, creating a shortage.

NYTimes Says Lenders, Regulators Must Step In. The New York Times (2/17, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "There is no sugarcoating the latest news on the United States housing market. The slump in home prices from the end of 2005 to the end of 2006 was the biggest year-over-year drop since the National Association of Realtors started keeping track in 1982. There are no reasons to believe that's the worst of it. … The bust will slow job growth this year in construction and related industries and with it, consumer spending. The severity of these economic side effects will depend on the strength of the overall job market and the stability of interest rates -- both of which are anybody's guess. Squarely in harm's way, however, are low- and middle-income homeowners. … Lenders and regulators should prepare to do all they can to help."

Stocks Essentially Unchanged Friday. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, Ossinger, 2.04M) reports stocks "took a breather after three straight days of gains, lagging most of the day, but pulled a quick move higher in the last hour to virtually break even." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "rose 2.56 to 12767.57, hitting a record for a third straight day with its late move into the black. The S&P 500 lost 1.27 to 1455.54," while the Nasdaq "was off 0.79 to 2496.31." NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 6, :10, Williams, 9.87M) briefly reported the numbers. In addition, the Wall Street Journal (2/17, B4, Norman, 2.04M) says treasury-bond markets "chalked up gains Friday."

Crude Oil Climbs Above $59. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, B4, Farivar, 2.04M) reports crude oil futures "rallied 2.4% and climbed above $59 after the government warned about more militant attacks in Nigeria" and the OPEC secretary-general said producers "were showing compliance with the group's new oil-production target." The March crude-futures contract "jumped $1.40 to $59.39 a barrel" in New York.

LATimes Says Bernanke Compares Favorably To Greenspan. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill this week was so clear and succinct — and bullish — that investors may soon forget about his predecessor, Alan Greenspan. Bernanke's message that the economy is enjoying healthy growth, low unemployment and little inflation soothed financial markets, but it was his forthright, substantive answers that awed members of the Senate and House committees that oversee the nation's central bank. Indeed, Bernanke, who's been on the job just over a year, performed better than he should have, politely answering too many questions."

McCain Faces Problems With Home State GOP. A front-page New York Times (2/17, Steinhauer, 1.16M) story headlined "Back At Home, McCain Annoys The G.O.P. Right" looks at what Arizona Republicans think about Sen. John McCain. The Maricopa County Republican Committee chairman "has in his possession a bright yellow button with a black line slashed through the name McCain," just one sign of the "vocal slice of the state's most conservative Republicans, reflecting concerns about Mr. McCain held by some conservatives nationwide," who "are agitating against him in a way that they hope might throw off his incipient presidential campaign." McCain's critics "now hold leadership positions in Maricopa County, the state's most Republican enclave and biggest media market, which includes Phoenix. Their passion about the immigration issue, their flirtations with other candidates and their persistent harping underscore the skepticism about Mr. McCain that already exists among many hard-line conservatives here and around the nation."

McCain To Discuss Abstinence In South Carolina. The AP (2/16, Davenport) reports McCain will be in South Carolina Sunday night to address "about 1,500 middle and high school students about abstaining from premarital sex. Abstinence and abortion loom large as issues in this first-in-the-South primary state in the heart of the Bible Belt." McCain "is courting Christian conservatives in his bid for the GOP nomination."

Giuliani Raises Funds In Richmond. Richmond's WDBJ7.com (2/16) reports Rudy Giuliani "met with some of Virginia's Republican Party before heading to a Richmond dinner designed to fatten his war chest. … As someone who's seen first hand what terrorist are capable of on American soil, Giuliani says now is no time for the U.S. to show weakness in the Middle East."

Romney Discusses 1992 Primary Vote For Democrat Tsongas. ABCNews.com (2/16, Greenberger) reports Mitt Romney "offered a new explanation today for why he supported a Democrat in 1992." Romney, "then a registered independent, voted for former Sen. Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Democratic presidential primary. He told ABC's George Stephanopoulos, in an interview that will air Sunday on 'This Week,' that his vote was meant as a tactical maneuver aimed at finding the weakest opponent for incumbent President George H.W. Bush." However, "12 years ago, the Boston Globe reported that Romney was giving a different explanation for his vote for Tsongas. 'Romney confirmed he voted for former U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas in the state's 1992 Democratic presidential primary, saying he did so both because Tsongas was from Massachusetts and because he favored his ideas over those of Bill Clinton,' the Boston Globe's Scot Lehigh and Frank Phillips wrote on Feb. 3, 1994. 'He added he had been sure the G.O.P. would renominate George Bush, for whom he voted in the fall election.'"

Voters Urged To Look Beyond Romney's Mormonism. In the Washington Post (2/17, A31, 690K), Stephen Stromberg writes that while Gov. George Romney's 1968 presidential campaign "fizzled," what "did not ruin" his "aspirations was his faith. Like his son Mitt, George Romney was a devout Mormon. Religion, as the truism goes, is far more influential in American politics today than it was in the 1960s." But a "candidate's faith, like that of an L.A. high school student or anyone else is ultimately a complex and personal phenomenon, even in the context of a highly centralized religious organization. … No one but Romney can know how his beliefs might affect his judgment. Instead of focusing on his faith, it would be much more worthwhile for voters to judge Mitt Romney on his evolving political agenda -- as Republicans did when George Romney ran in 1967."

Arkansas Ethics Panel Dismisses Complaint Against Huckabee. The AP (2/16, Davenport) reports, "Arkansas' ethics panel dismissed a complaint Friday against former Gov. Mike Huckabee over the presidential candidate's destruction of computer hard drives from his office. By a 3-0 vote, the commission voted to dismiss the complaint filed last month against Huckabee." Huckabee "has defended the destruction of the drives, saying it was done to protect sensitive information such as employees' or constituents' Social Security numbers and credit card information."

Obama Making Headway With Hollywood, Silicon Valley Players. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A2, Harwood, 2.04M) reports, "Campaign debates often turn on values. Next week, some important political players in Hollywood and Silicon Valley will demonstrate theirs: they like what's hip, new, attractive and future-oriented. In the 1990s, that was Bill Clinton's breakthrough baby boomer presidency. In 2007, it's Barack Obama's multiracial, post-boomer candidacy. That is why three luminous Hollywood names -- the Dreamworks trio of Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen -- are hosting an Obama fund-raiser in Los Angeles Tuesday. And it's why one of Mr. Obama's guides through Silicon Valley is Wade Randlett, an early Democratic force there through the TechNet advocacy group."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/17, Vargas, 690K) reports on the role Facebook.com is having in recruiting young volunteers and supporters for presidential campaigns. The piece focuses largely on Obama.

Obama Makes First South Carolina Visit. Gannett (2/17, Barnett) reports Obama "made his first campaign stop Friday in South Carolina, delivering a rousing can-do message to an enthusiastic crowd of 3,000 at Columbia's convention center." Obama "told supporters he doesn't believe those who say a black man can't be elected. 'Twenty years ago, nobody would have believed this crowd in South Carolina,' he said of the racially mixed group."

Edwards Makes Pitch To Prospective Silicon Valley Donors. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/17, B2, Marinucci, 384K) reports John Edwards, "in an informal living room discussion this week with about 150 Silicon Valley insiders, said the Bush administration has failed America by demonstrating 'enormous incompetence' at home in areas such as responding to Hurricane Katrina and abroad in Iraq." His "shirtsleeves appeal during an intimate evening of dinner and conversation was delivered in the Woodside home of influential venture capitalist Andy Rappaport and his wife, Deborah."

Virginia Democratic Chairman Backing Edwards. The AP (2/16, Davenport) reports Virginia Democratic Party Chairman C. Richard Cranwell will back Edwards, making the announcement "two days after officials with close ties" to

Gov. Tim Kaine said the governor will back Sen. Barack Obama. Cranwell said, "This indicates that Virginia is in play for the presidential sweepstakes for the first time in a long time."

Richardson Says New Hampshire Must Be "Breakthrough State For Me." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/17, DiStaso) reports Gov. Bill Richardson "says he will focus more time, staff and resources to New Hampshire than to any other early primary or caucus state." Richardson "said that as a Westerner, he 'must do well' in Nevada, where the Democratic National Committee has scheduled a new caucus after Iowa's traditional lead-off event but before the New Hampshire primary. But, he said, 'for me, New Hampshire is going to be my main state to concentrate on, staff-wise, resources. I consider this a breakthrough state for me.'" The AP (2/16, Wang) says Richardson campaigned in New Hampshire "after raising $2 million at a fundraiser in New Mexico on Thursday. The total puts him in good standing in the Democratic race although he isn't as well known as some of his rivals."

Richardson Says Congress Should "Stop Voting On Resolutions That Mean Nothing." In another report, the New Hampshire Union Leader (2/17, DiStaso) says Richardson also said Congress "should stop focusing on nonbinding resolutions and should vote instead on whether to take back from President Bush its 2002 authorization for the U.S. participation in the war in Iraq. … Richardson said lawmakers 'should stop voting on resolutions that mean nothing.'"

Biden Says He Is Only Democratic Contender With An Iraq Plan. The AP (2/16, Jackson) reports Sen. Joseph Bide, in Iowa Friday, said he is "the only Democratic presidential candidate who has a plan for Iraq, dismissing the ideas of other contenders as tactics that would leave the Middle East in peril." Biden said, "They have tactics, not a plan. What are they going to do, stop the civil war? ... There's a lot of people who have ideas about how to get out, but not many ideas about how to leave something more stable behind."

Cornyn's Support For Bush Said To Leave Him Potentially Vulnerable. The Washington Post (2/17, A5, Murray, 690K) reports, "In a sea of Republican doubt," Sen. John Cornyn "is all about certainty. He is certain that President Bush's decision to send more troops into battle is the right move. He is certain that Democratic war thinking is wrong. Despite the growing misgivings of so many GOP lawmakers, Cornyn is certain that the United States should stay in Iraq until the job is done. The freshman senator is such a throwback to the early days of GOP fealty to Bush that his Senate Web site includes a 'compassionate conservatism' link." According to the Post, Cornyn "is a favorite at the White House, but his unalloyed defense of Bush's Iraq policies have some back home wondering whether he has gone too far. … The lack of daylight between Bush and Cornyn, particularly over the war, has raised a few eyebrows among Democrats and within Texas political circles." The Texas Blue, a "progressive" Web site, "raised the question of Cornyn's potential vulnerability. The evidence: two years of monthly tracking polls that showed Cornyn's job approval rating barely breaking 45 percent and a random sample of Texas residents conducted in December that detected a slight shift in favor toward Democrats."

California Dispenses $45 Million In Stem Cell Research Grants. The New York Times/AP (2/17, A10) reports, "California's stem cell agency gave out nearly $45 million in research grants to about 20 state universities and nonprofit research laboratories on Friday, far exceeding the federal government's annual outlays for stem cell work." The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Engel, 850K) reports, "The funding is a fraction of the decade-long, $300-million-a-year juggernaut voters approved under 2004's Proposition 71, the Stem Cell Research and Cures Act. But it signaled the determination of the voter-created California Institute for Regenerative Medicine to make the state a player in the nascent field even as the bonds remain frozen by litigation. 'We can't afford to wait when it comes to advancing a life-saving science,' Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday at a news conference. To tide the state over during the lawsuits, Schwarzenegger arranged the $150-million state loan last summer on the day that President Bush vetoed legislation aimed at loosening federal funding restrictions."

Fox News Channel To Premiere Conservative "Daily Show" Rival. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Miller, 850K) reports, "Intended by its conservative creators as a counterbalance to 'The Daily Show' and 'The Colbert Report' on Comedy Central, 'The 1/2 -Hour News Hour' premieres Sunday" on the Fox News

Channel "and will satirize current events and pop culture from a distinctly right of center viewpoint. Much like the 24-hour news channel itself, the show is out to fill a void in the marketplace, which the show's creators perceive as decidedly liberal." The Politico (2/16, Andrews) reports, "Produced by Joel Surnow, the brains behind Fox's hit '24,' 'The Half-Hour News Hour' is a mock news satire (but for conservatives) that will hopefully make everyone forget about Comedy Central's 'The Daily Show.' Washington Post (2/17, C1, 690K) reviewer Tom Shales says the show "definitely has its moments," and the New York Times (2/17, Stanley, 1.16M) also has a review.

Bush Telephones Abdullah, Olmert Ahead Of Rice's Middle East Mission. AFP (2/17) notes a White House announcement that President Bush "discussed the situation in the Middle East with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah." Those "telephone talks came just before" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "headed to the Middle East to host a rare summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders that she hopes will break new ground in reviving peace negotiations frozen for nearly seven years." The statement said that "Monday's meeting with Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas and Olmert was the focus of Bush's talks with" Olmert. Bush "also 'discussed the situation in Iraq and developments in Israeli-Palestinian affairs' with the Saudi king."

The Financial Times (2/17, Morris) says "officials have set the bar so low" for Rice's effort "that even a modest step towards a revival of the moribund peace process is likely to be spun as a giant leap." The Administration, "bogged down in Iraq and assailed in Congress, badly wants to hear some good news from the Middle East. The timing, however, could hardly be worse." Abbas' "embrace of Hamas, the Islamist group, has raised questions of the Palestinian Authority president's suitability as a peace partner, while a domestic crisis of confidence in [Olmert] has cast doubt on his ability to break the deadlock."

Bush Budget Would Trim Andean Counterdrug Program. The Washington Times (2/17, Arostegui, 88K) reports President Bush's FY08 budget request "calls for deep cuts in the leading U.S. program to fight drug trafficking in the Andean region, amid growing clashes over drug policy between Washington and leftist governments in Venezuela and Bolivia. The cuts to the Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI) affect every country in the region except Colombia." The proposed funding levels "have been criticized by governments in the area, as well as by U.S. counternarcotics officials and some lawmakers on Capitol Hill." The Times says the request for $442.8 million for ACI is "down 23 percent from the estimated spending for the current fiscal year and off nearly 40 percent from $727.2 million in fiscal 2006."

Colombian President's Domestic "Scandals" Said To Strain US Support. The Washington Post (2/17, A28, Forero, 690K) notes the "widening scandal" facing Colombian President Alvaro Uribe and his allies "raises skepticism" within Congress of aid programs to Bogota. Noting Thursday's arrest of four senators including the foreign minister's brother, the Post notes, "Officials in Washington said Uribe's support for the foreign minister would not help the Colombian government in its negotiations with U.S. lawmakers." Rep. Sander Levin "said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia." The Post adds, "Though lawmakers in Washington remain intensely focused on Iraq, it is not lost on policymakers that Colombia remains the biggest recipient of U.S. assistance outside of the Middle East and Afghanistan." Notably, "for Uribe, the scandal couldn't have come at a worse moment." While the "Bush administration has reiterated its support for Uribe," the "latest disclosures have drawn heated criticism, from organizations such as Human Rights Watch and from some of Capitol Hill's more influential shapers of U.S. policy in Latin America, including" Senate Appropriations Foreign Operations Subcommittee Chairman Patrick Leahy.

Battling Inflation, Shortages, Chavez Cracks Down Price Control Violators. The New York Times (2/17, A3, Romero, 1.16M) reports, "Faced with an accelerating inflation rate and shortages of basic foods like beef, chicken and milk, President Hugo Chávez has threatened to jail grocery store owners and nationalize their businesses if they violate the country's expanding price controls." Some experts believe those "measures…are likely to backfire and generate even more acute shortages and higher prices for consumers." Chavez "seemed unfazed by criticism of his policies. Appearing live on national television, he called for the creation of 'committees of social control,' essentially groups of his political supporters whose purpose would be to report on farmers, ranchers, supermarket owners and street vendors who circumvent the state's effort to control food prices." Despite 10 percent economic expansion in 2006, "economists who have worked with Mr. Chávez's government say that soaring public spending is overheating Venezuela's economy, generating imbalances in the distribution of products from sugar to basic construction materials like wallboard."

Economic Factors Conspire To Slow Mexican Growth. Under the front-page headline, "Mexico's Economy Loses Steam," the Los Angeles Times (2/17, Dickerson, 850K) reports the Mexican economy "slowed in the last three months of 2006, and that could have consequences in the United States: Tough times in Mexico typically fuel immigration north of the border." The "deceleration was blamed largely on a sluggish factory sector and a slowdown in exports to Mexico's principal customer, the United States." The year-long GDP growth of 4.8% was "the strongest since 2000," as "high oil prices pumped record tax revenue into government coffers" and Mexico "had a banner year in job creation." However, the Times says "the economy of the United States, Mexico's biggest trading partner, is weakening. Mexico's inflation has been rising, its oil production is slipping, and the nation's bellwether auto sector has hit a speed bump."

Prominent Chinese AIDS Doctor To Attend Washington Ceremony. The New York Times (2/17, A4, Yardley, 1.16M) notes Beijing "gave in to international pressure on Friday and agreed to release a prominent AIDS doctor from house arrest so she can attend an awards ceremony in Washington next month." Gao Yaojie, who has been under house arrest since the first of the month, will be honored by Vital Voices Global Partnership. Sen. Hillary Clinton, "an honorary co-chairwoman of Vital Voices, announced China's decision on Friday after receiving the news from the Chinese ambassador in Washington." Gao "is famously outspoken, and although China has taken a more open approach toward AIDS in recent years, officials were apparently worried she might say something provocative or embarrassing in Washington."

NATO Calls Missile Defense Worries Unfounded. The New York Times (2/17, A8, Dempsey, 1.16M) reports in a five-sentence brief, "Gen. John Craddock of the United States Army, who recently took over as the NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, said Russia had nothing to fear from a planned antimissile system that the United States wants to install in Poland and the Czech Republic. 'It's been clearly stated what the U.S. intention is," he said, "and that is to provide defense against missiles from a rogue nation.' Although he did not name any country, the antimissile site would be designed to stop attacks by Iran against the United States and its European allies."

Turkish Court Sentences 2003 Istanbul Bombers. The New York Times (2/17, A7, Arsu, 1.16M) reports a Turkish court "sentenced seven Muslim men to life in prison and several dozen other people to lesser terms for their involvement in the deadly bombings of Jewish and British sites [in Istanbul] in 2003." Those car "bombings killed more than 60 people and wounded hundreds more." The "life sentences were given to those who were determined to have been masterminds of the plot. Six of the seven denied any links with Al Qaeda and sought acquittal. The judge sentenced 41 other defendants to prison terms ranging from 3 to 18 years on a variety of charges, while 26 defendants were acquitted." BBC.com (2/16) adds the court "sentenced seven people to life in prison for the 2003 Istanbul bombings which killed 58 people including the UK consul-general."

French Judge Implicates Rwandan President In Assassination That Sparked Genocide. A 2,000-word piece on the front page of the Los Angeles Times (2/17, Rotella, 850K) discusses French Magistrate Jean-Louis Bruguiere's controversial report implicating Rwandan President Paul Kagame in the 1994 assassination for former President Juvenal Habyarimana and his Burundian counterpart. His "investigation includes allegations that U.S. and U.N. officials helped quash earlier inquiries to protect Kagame, an ally of the United States. The French judge's report, which was obtained by The Times, has caused an uproar in Africa and Europe, and led Kagame's government to break off relations with France." While Bruguiere and his colleagues "do not claim that the assassination was the sole cause of the genocide," he "alleges that Kagame sacrificed fellow Tutsis in a brutal 'political calculation' aimed at toppling the Hutu-dominated government." Kagame "adheres to the contrasting theory that extremist Hutus angry about the peace deal with the Tutsis killed Habyarimana." Notably, "former U.N. investigators who initially looked into the assassination told Bruguiere that their bosses had blocked efforts to pursue leads implicating Kagame."

UN's Ban Says Split Peacekeeping Department Would Improve Operations. The Financial Times (2/17, Turner) notes UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "warned that an unprecedented global surge in UN peacekeeping operations had left its leadership 'impossibly overstretched' and unable to cope without serious reform." The Times calls Ban's plan "an ambitious restructuring proposal," and says he seeks "to split the peacekeeping department in two by creating a new department for field support. This would also take in parts of the UN that deal with personnel management and recruitment, and free peacekeeping operations officials to focus on strategy." The Times warns that Ban "faces a deep reluctance by governments to cede any authority to UN bureaucracy. After a troubled first month, he was beset by complaints from rich and poor countries alike that he was not consulting enough and that his team did not appear to understand how the UN worked."

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Arrests New York Man In Terror-Funding Sting. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/17) reported, "A businessman was charged Friday with secretly trying to pass along thousands of dollars to buy night vision goggles and other equipment for a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan. Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, was accused in Manhattan federal court of financing terrorism and material support of terrorism. The indictment said he accepted an unspecified amount of money between June and December to transfer $152,000 that he believed was being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support an Afghanistan terrorist training camp." The New York Post (2/17, Cornell) noted Alishtari "was nabbed by the FBI Thursday and charged with providing material support to terrorists, as well as money-laundering and wire-fraud charges, which carry a maximum of 95 years in prison. Prior to his arrest, Alishtari…had agreed to cooperate with law enforcement. But the deal fell through before he provided substantial assistance, according to a source close to the case."

The White Plains Journal News (2/17, O'Connor) reported, "A woman who answered the phone at Alishtari's home yesterday and identified herself as his wife cried when informed of the charges against her husband. She said she last saw him Thursday when he left in a cab for a business meeting. FBI agents later raided the family's home, she said, without telling her why they were there." The Journal News noted, "On his blog and on an MSN group titled 'atalishtarispeeches,' Alishtari calls himself a 'conservative Republican' and a 'Reagan Republican' devoted to peace, dedicated to halting child slavery as well as 'Internet fraud, violence and online scams hurting innocent children, women, and families so help me God.'" The New York Daily News (2/17, Zambito) and Newday (2/17, DeStefano) also briefly reported on Alishtari's arrest.

Al-Arian Plans To Continue Hunger Strike. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/17) reported, "A former Florida university professor who has stopped eating in prison to protest his treatment sounds fine and doesn't intend to give up his nearly monthlong hunger strike, his wife said Friday." Sami al-Arian "stopped eating Jan. 22 after federal officials told him he had to testify before a grand jury about Muslim charities in northern Virginia that had helped finance his think tank in Tampa, Fla." The AP added, "al-Arian wants to be released so he can leave the United States, his wife said in a telephone interview Friday. 'We worry about Sami, but at the same time we try to do our best to get him out of this whole situation,' Nahla al-Arian said during an interview."

Italian Court Indicts 25 CIA Officers Over "Extraordinary Rendition." ABC World News (2/16, story 4, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Italy, a judge ordered 26 Americans, most of them CIA agents, to stand trial in the case of a terrorism suspect who said he was kidnapped, flown to Egypt, and then tortured. This would be the first trial of its kind."

The Washington Post (2/17, A1, Delaney, Whitlock, 690K) reports, "An Italian judge gave approval Friday for what will be the first overseas criminal trial of CIA officers involved in a covert counterterrorism operation, as a court in Milan indicted more than two dozen Americans on charges of kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric four years ago. After a judicial hearing that lasted two months, the court handed down indictments against 25 CIA operatives, a U.S. Air Force lieutenant colonel and five Italian spies who are accused of grabbing an imam, Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, off the street and stuffing him into a white van as he walked to noonday prayers Feb. 17, 2003. Nasr was taken from Milan to his native Egypt, where he claims he was tortured in prison for more than three years."

The Financial Times (2/17, Barber) reports, "The centre-left government of Romano Prodi, prime minister, is unwilling to meet prosecutors' demands to seek the extradition of the Americans so that they appear in court in Milan."

The Washington Times/AP (2/17, Barry) reports the Italian prosecutors "think that many of the American names in the indictment are aliases, and even if Italy requests the Americans' extradition -- a move that would strain U.S.-Italian relations -- it is unlikely that the agents, who have all left Italy, would be turned over for prosecution. All the U.S. agents have court-appointed attorneys, who say they have had no contact with their clients. In Italy, defendants can be tried in absentia."

The New York Times (2/17, A1, Fisher, 1.16M) reports the indictment "marked a turning point in Europe, where anger is high at the American program of 'extraordinary renditions.' … Though the Italian indictment is the first in which such a case was ordered to trial, this week the Swiss government approved an investigation into the flight that was said to have carried Mr. Nasr from Italy to Germany, through Swiss airspace. The flight reportedly then went from an American air base in Germany to Egypt. Late last month, a German court issued an arrest warrant for 13 people suspected of involvement in the kidnapping in Macedonia of a German citizen of Lebanese descent. There are also investigations into extraordinary renditions in Portugal and Spain. In the meantime this week, a European Union parliamentary committee issued a detailed report into what it said were 'at least' 1,245 secret C.I.A. flights in Europe, some of them involving extraordinary renditions."

Navy Brig Personnel Ordered To Testify Regarding Padilla's Treatment. The Washington Post (2/17, A17, Whoriskey, 690K) reports, "Officials at the Navy brig where terrorism suspect Jose Padilla was held for 3 1/2 years as an enemy combatant were ordered Friday to testify at a hearing to determine his psychological competency, a ruling that allows the defense to press its claims that sensory deprivation and torture in confinement have rendered the alleged al-Qaeda operative unfit to stand trial. … Federal prosecutors objected strenuously to allowing the testimony, arguing that the focus of the competency hearing should be on Padilla's psychological state, which they believe is adequate, and not necessarily on what past events might have caused post-traumatic stress disorder, as defense attorneys allege. During a hearing Friday, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke grew tired of the government's objections."

The New York Times (2/17, A11, News, 1.16M) reports Cooke "ordered eight Defense Department and Justice Department officials to appear for questioning at Mr. Padilla's competency hearing next Thursday. The eight were previously interviewed for a United States Bureau of Prisons report that prosecutors cite as evidence that Mr. Padilla is mentally competent."

History Of US Military Commissions Explored. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/17, A15, 1.16M), historian Stephen Budiansky writes, "This week President Bush issued a final executive order authorizing military commissions to begin trying suspected terrorists. Under rules drafted by the Pentagon last month, the commissions would be permitted to sentence defendants to imprisonment or even death on the basis of hearsay or coerced testimony. This lack of basic legal protections provided by civilian courts or courts-martial has brought condemnation at home and abroad as an abandonment of this nation's historic commitment to liberty and the rule of law. Yet when military commissions -- an American invention -- were first instituted 150 years ago, they were hailed around the world as an advance for humanity and principles of justice."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Port Authority Clears Dubai Ports World Selloff. The New York Times (2/17, B2, Belson, 1.16M) reports, "A day after two United States senators called the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey greedy and obstructionist, the agency signed off on a deal that would let DP World, a Dubai-based port operator, sell its leases to A.I.G. Global Investment Group. In return for its consent, the Port Authority will receive $10 million from A.I.G. to help pay for an overpass that will make it easier for trucks to deliver containers from the company's terminal to train lines. A.I.G.

DOJ_NMG_0134339

also agreed to spend more than $40 million to improve operations at its terminal at the Port of Newark. The agreement was somewhat of a compromise by the Port Authority, which had asked for $30 million to cover investments it had made on behalf of DP World and a $50 million commitment from A.I.G. to spend on the port."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, 2.04M) reports DP World "agreed in December to sell its U.S. ports operations to AIG Global Investment Group, following months of criticism that the UAE firm couldn't be trusted running the security-sensitive shipping apparatus. That deal suddenly foundered this week when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal." The Financial Times (2/17, Grimes) reports Sen. Charles Schumer "said on Thursday that the authority's demands amounted to a 'ransom fee' and threatened not to back future requests if it persisted with its demands."

States Use Driver's License Databases To Fight Crime. The New York Times (2/17, A10, Liptak, 1.16M) reports seven states "have or are working on…enormous databases of driver's license photographs. Coupled with increasingly accurate facial-recognition technology, the databases may become a radical innovation in law enforcement. Other biometric databases are more useful for now. But DNA and fingerprint information, for instance, are not routinely collected from the general public. Most adults, on the other hand, have a driver's license with a picture on it, meaning that the relevant databases for facial-recognition analysis already exist. And while the current technology requires good-quality photographs, the day may not be far off when images from ordinary surveillance cameras will routinely help solve crimes. Critics say the databases may therefore also represent a profound threat to privacy."

WAR NEWS:

House Passes Nonbinding Iraq Resolution, With 17 Republicans In Support. Even though the outcome was long expected, broadcast networks led with the House vote on the two-line resolution expressing disapproval of President Bush's planned deployment of more troops to Iraq, and most major newspapers put the story on the front page. Many reports say the vote was a "rebuke" of the President. While coverage throughout the past week has examined how many Republicans were likely to support the resolution, with estimates ranging from 20 to 60, few reports focus on the fact that just 17 Republicans voted for the nonbinding measure, or that the number was lower than expected. With two Democrats voting against the resolution, it passed 246-182. Republicans voting yes were Reps. Michael Castle, Howard Coble, Tom Davis, Jimmy Duncan, Phil English, Wayne Gilchrest, Bob Inglis, Timothy Johnson, Walter Jones, Ric Keller, Mark Kirk, Steve LaTourette, Ron Paul, Tom Petri, Jim Ramstad, Fred Upton, and James Walsh. Democrats voting no were Reps. Jim Marshall and Gene Taylor.

ABC World News (2/16, lead story, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) said the House issued a "strong rebuke to the President's policy in Iraq" with the vote, saying that while "opposing a president during a time of war is historic, so was this vote merely symbolic, for what the House did today does not actually restrict the President in any way." ABC (Tapper): "It was the first official opposition to the war in Iraq in congressional history." NBC Nightly News (2/16, lead story, 3:05, Williams, 9.87M) introduced its report by saying the "White House today said the President was too busy with other matters to watch live television coverage of the vote that is tonight being called the start of an epic confrontation, between Congress and the Commander-in-Chief."

The CBS Evening News (2/16, lead story, 2:12, Couric, 7.66M) said, "The words were simple and clear. After four days of debate, the House passed a resolution today that says it disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush to deploy more than 20,000 additional US combat troops to Iraq. … The vote was symbolic, but it's just the beginning of a campaign by congressional opponents of the war to try to stop it." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi: "This resolution today sets the stage for that new direction, one in which we will focus on other than military initiatives." Also on the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 2,:50, 7.66M), White House correspondent Jim Axelrod said, "The President is dug in on this, and the surge is actually already under way. So what's going to settle all this, it would seem, is what happens on the streets of Baghdad."

The Washington Post (2/17, Weisman, 690K) headlines its front-page report "House Rebukes Bush On Iraq," saying the House, "capping four days of passionate, often angry debate," delivered Bush "its first rebuke since the Iraq war was launched nearly four years ago." While the resolution "is nonbinding, proponents and opponents delivered outsized predictions of the vote's consequences. Democrats asserted that it will begin to turn the political tide so decisively that the president will have no choice but to begin bringing U.S. forces home, while Republicans warned darkly that the House has emboldened murderous Islamic terrorists at the expense not only of American lives but also of America's way of life." The Washington Times (2/17, Ward, 88K) leads its front-page reports by saying Republicans said the "nonbinding but symbolic action…is defeatist and a step backward in the war on terrorism."

The New York Times (2/17, Zeleny, Luo, 1.16M) runs its story under the front-page headline "A Divided House

DOJ_NMG_0134340

Denounces Plan For More Troops," saying the "sharply divided" House passed a measure "formally repudiating President Bush's decision" to send more troops to Iraq. The Times says passage "was never in doubt, but the debate, lasting full days and much of three nights, brought nearly every member to the floor to declare, briefly but often vehemently, where they stood on a short, resolution affirming support for the troops but denouncing Mr. Bush's new approach to the war. … With 392 members speaking, the debate lasted twice as long as when Congress voted in 2002 to authorize the use of force against Iraq." The Times is one of the few sources to prominently point out that "the number of Republicans who joined them was only about half of what some Democrats had predicted." Minority Leader John Boehner said, "Republicans may have lost the vote on this nonbinding resolution. But we won the debate." NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 2, 2:15, Gregory, 9.87M) said officials at the White House said the 17 Republican defections were "fewer defections than they actually expected," but the "response over here was still muted. It was certainly a political blow."

The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Simon, 850K) says the "sharp partisan split was a disappointment to Democratic leaders, who had hoped for more GOP support, and it lessened the vote's political impact. Still, the vote marked a milestone in the declining public support for the nearly 4-year-old war, and it signified the growing Democratic determination to press for a de-escalation of U.S. involvement in the conflict." The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, Rogers, 2.04M) overlooks the earlier GOP defection estimates, saying the "Republican defections and new Democratic unity underscore how much the political landscape has changed in the past year. Eight months ago, only three House Republicans opposed a similar resolution supporting the war effort and warmly praising the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. By comparison, even Republicans who stood with the president in this week's debate were often critical of Mr. Maliki and leery of committing more U.S. forces."

The Chicago Tribune (2/17, Fang, Bendavid, 617K) says the "rhetoric on the House floor Friday was emotional, sweeping and at times agonized, with orators on both sides speaking of honoring the dead, staying true to the nation's mission and respecting the Constitution. In a chamber that often sees a lone congressman addressing an empty chamber, many seats were filled, and particularly eloquent speeches were met with standing ovations. It was perhaps the closest Congress had come in three decades to the impassioned debates that animated the nation during the Vietnam War." The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Gaouette, 850K) says "Democrats and Republicans alike crowded the chamber by midafternoon to cheer their sides during the final appeals for votes. Spectators waiting to enter the third-floor public galleries lined the halls and the marble stairs."

Newsday (2/17, Phelps, Gordon) says that while to supporters, "Friday's Iraq vote in the House was the historic answer to the embarrassments of 1964 and 2002, when Congress overwhelmingly approved wars in Vietnam and Iraq that would become unpopular," to its "opponents, the nonbinding statement of disapproval of the president's war plan was at best a meaningless gesture, at worst a terrible precedent or even a solace to America's enemies." The San Francisco Chronicle (2/17, Epstein, 384K) called it a "double-barreled confrontational message" from the House to the President, "telling him it opposes his latest buildup of troops in Iraq and in the next few weeks will try to start curtailing military operations in the war zone."

The Houston Chronicle (2/17, Mittelstadt, 530K) calls it a "symbolic but stern repudiation," while the Dallas Morning News (2/17, 500K) says "war opponents hope Friday's vote will serve as a turning point, the first of several actions that the Democratic-led Congress will take to pressure the president to redeploy troops to Afghanistan, the Middle East or elsewhere, or bring them home."

Among the other sources reporting on the debate and vote are the Financial Times (2/17, Luce), AP (2/16, Espo), the Web site of The Hill (2/16, Marre, Kucinich), RollCall.com (2/16, Stanton), CNN.com (2/16), and BBC.com (2/16).

Symbolic Vote Could Be Just The Beginning Of Democrats' Efforts. In a front-page analysis, the Washington Post (2/17, Baker, 690K) reports says while the resolution "specifically renounced" the troop increase, "by extension, the 246 to 182 vote passed judgment on Bush's overall stewardship of the war in Iraq and, more broadly, on his leadership in the world. At a time when the president is confronting Iran over its nuclear enrichment program, the House vote demonstrates that he has far less latitude to take aggressive action than he might have had in the past." But the vote "signaled peril for the Democratic congressional leadership as well. Despite deep Republican discontent with the course of the war, Democrats were unable to persuade more than 17 members of the president's party to register that dissatisfaction with their votes. If Democratic leaders could not build a broader bipartisan coalition for a symbolic vote, it may prove much harder to attract Republican support for proposals to limit Bush's options in Iraq."

A New York Times (2/17, A6, Stolberg, 1.16M) analysis piece also looks at what the symbolic vote portends, saying the "act of Congressional defiance…lays the groundwork for an even more bitter and ultimately more consequential clash over whether and how lawmakers might restrict President Bush's authority to prosecute the war." It is still unclear whether congressional Democrats have the "political resolve to rein in Mr. Bush. But by emboldening critics of the Iraq war, the vote has made the debate over financing, which would have been unthinkable even six months ago, a virtual certainty."

Members Of Congress Discuss Their Votes. Rep. Patrick Murphy said on CNN's Newsroom (2/16, Harris), "I believe that we need a new direction in Iraq. I served there in Iraq in 2003 and came home in 2004, literally three years ago. And I believe that, still, the Iraqis are sitting on the sideline. And it's time for them to step up and really fight for their country. … Gen. Petraeus is a great leader. And Secretary Gates, I like the fact that he's been much more open and has been very open with this Congress, which is needed."

Rep. Joe Sestak said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/16, Matthews), "I voted for this resolution because I don't believe doubling down on a bad military bet. We have tried this before, we have increased troops by 12,000 since August and it hasn't worked. More than that, every day that I was forward deployed, leading men and women into harm's way, whether it was while I was on the ground in Afghanistan or with my battle group over in combat in Afghanistan or in Iraq, I wanted to know that back here the men and women, the policy makers are thinking about the best use."

Rep. Peter King said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/16, Matthews), "I strongly oppose the resolution. I think it's absolutely wrong for Congress to be injecting itself into a strategic battlefield decision. The Senate unanimously confirmed Gen. Petraeus. I've been to Iraq with Gen. Petraeus. He's our finest commander over there. He says this plan can work, he wants to make it work, he's already implementing it and for us to be in effect undermining him, and that's what we're doing by saying that the plan won't work, we're substituting our decision for that of Gen. Petraeus. And also, the logical sequence, or the logical connection, between today's vote and the next vote would have to be, I believe, a vote toward cutting off funds, which by the way is what Jack Murtha and Nancy Pelosi are already talking about, by imposing so many conditions on the next appropriations bill, to in effect make it impossible to pay for the troops that will be there."

Rep. Tim Walberg said on CNN's Newsroom (2/16, Harris), "Whether or not it's binding or nonbinding, it is making a statement. And just as General Washington came back from the Revolutionary War to the Congress and said send me help and support and encouragement, and they denied that, General Washington and the troops went back and won the war. And of that we are grateful. I think the same will take place here. But with this resolution, we are saying to the troops, we support you, we don't support your mission. And that's my concern."

Rep. Virgil Goode said on Fox News' Your World (2/16, Cavuto), "I wish the vote had been different, but it was closer than many anticipated. And I think the arguments against the resolution were gaining ground. … I believe that those on the ground in Iraq, the terrorists, and those with al Qaeda are encouraged by it. They say it shows a lack of unity in the United States."

Senate Cloture Vote Expected To Fail. ABC World News (2/16, story 2, 1:20, 8.78M) anchor Charles Gibson asked George Stephanopoulos, "The Senate comes in to vote tomorrow." ABC's Jake Tapper "says they don't have the votes to pass it. Why go through the exercise?" Stephanopoulos: "Because Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, wants to put pressure on those Republicans in the Senate who actually support the surge. Both Republicans and Democrats agree that there are probably about 55 votes for this resolution right now, but not the 60 that it would take to break the filibuster and get it to the floor. So, Mr. Reid wants to put the pressure on those senators who support this resolution and don't support the surge." Gibson: "Bottom line, what you're telling me is Democrats don't have the votes overall in Congress, to pass even a nonbinding resolution opposing the war." Stephanopoulos: "They don't. They don't right now, even though there is a majority in the House and the Senate in support of this resolution."

The Politico (2/16, Bresnahan, Budoff) also says that while Senate Democrats "will try again Saturday to force debate" on their resolution, "their second attempt in two weeks appears unlikely to succeed." Several Republicans including John Warner "intend to vote with Democrats." But Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said he "did not expect Democrats to stitch together the 60 votes necessary to move the Senate toward a debate on the anti-surge resolution approved by the House."

Hagel To Vote For Cloture. Sen. Chuck Hagel said on PBS' NewsHour (2/16, Lehrer), "I will vote for cloture tomorrow, and the reason I will is this is just another procedural vote. We do need to move this forward now. We've given the two leaders two weeks to try to resolve this. They have, at least so far, been unable to do it. We need to have the next series of votes. This is a procedural vote, and I will vote to move the procedure along. … I doubt if there will be 60 votes tomorrow. But, again, I think we should keep our eye focused on the issue here, and that is debate of resolutions and votes on those resolutions."

More Commentary On House Vote. The Washington Post (2/17, A30, 690K) editorializes, "Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has a message for anyone who spent the week following the House of Representatives' marathon debate on Iraq: You've been distracted by a sideshow." But "the House vote does matter: It ought to increase the pressure on Mr. Bush and the Iraqi government to follow through on their pledges to accompany the military campaign with tangible steps toward political accords and economic reconstruction. Senate leaders would be wise to reach an agreement today allowing a similar debate. And both chambers should aggressively conduct oversight hearings aimed at holding the administration to its promise to link continued U.S. troop deployments to Iraqi performance."

The New York Times (2/17, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "President Bush lost touch long ago with Iraq's political reality -- not to mention Americans' anguish and disbelief at his mismanagement of the war. So we welcome the House of Representatives' long-overdue attempt to shake some sense into Mr. Bush with a resolution opposing his decision to send another 20,000 combat troops to fight this disastrous war without any plan to end it. Yet yesterday's vote, in which 17 Republicans joined the Democrats to produce a margin of 246 to 182, was the easy part. It takes no great courage or creativity for a politician to express continuing support for the troops and opposition to a vastly unpopular and unpromising military escalation. Even if the Senate manages to overcome its procedural self-hobbling and approve a similar resolution, the war and the mismanagement will go on. The next necessary steps will require harder thinking and harder choices."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A8, 2.04M) editorializes, "A funny thing happened yesterday on the way to the House of Representatives' vote to 'support' the troops but assail their mission in Iraq: The majority for this 'non-binding' attempt at gathering political cover was a lot smaller than advertised. Yes, the Democrats carried the day, 246-182, and thus can say to their antiwar supporters that they 'sent a message,' or something, to President Bush and the Iraqis. But the margin was smaller than media speculation had predicted, with only 17 Republicans heading for the tall grass. … Yesterday's vote showed that if Democrats want to execute this cynical duck-and-run, they will have to do it without much Republican help."

The Los Angeles Times (2/17, 850K) editorializes, "Fortunately for Congress, actions speak louder than words -- even symbolic actions such as the House of Representatives' approval Friday of a nonbinding resolution opposing the 'surge' of U.S. troops to Iraq. The surge is necessary, but the resolution may be as well -- as a way to hold President Bush to his commitment that U.S. involvement in Iraq is not open-ended. Still, the world will little note, nor long remember, the words that were uttered by House members before the 246-182 vote. Congress is often a cave of winds, but with a few exceptions the House's Iraq debate was a blowhard's paradise."

Rice On Unannounced Visit To Baghdad. WashingtonPost.com (2/17) reported early today that Secretary of State Rice "made an unannounced visit to Baghdad Saturday for meetings with U.S. and Iraqi officials, arriving in the embattled capital as the Iraqi government reported initial success in a new security effort." Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor announced that Rice "was expected to hold a town hall-style meeting with U.S. Embassy and military personnel in the heavily fortified Green Zone and later meet with senior Iraqi government officials." Rice arrived at about 11:30 a.m. Baghdad time, or 3:30 a.m. EST, and "planned to brief reporters on her visit" this afternoon. She "made the previously unannounced stop as part of a trip to the Middle East."

A late AP (2/17, Gearan) piece notes Rice said in Baghdad that "the success of a new security crackdown in Baghdad will be measured largely on how well the U.S.-backed government capitalizes on any respite of sectarian violence." She "made an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital to check on the early days of the campaign to put down tit-for-tat violence between Sunnis and Shiites that has consumed Baghdad and contributed to the exodus of an estimated 3.8 million Iraqis from their homes."

Rice Said To Face Skeptical House Appropriations Subcommittee. The Washington Post (2/17, A16, DeYoung, 690K) reports Rice was "grilled" by the House Appropriations Subcommittee on State, Foreign Operations and Related Programs. "Skeptical lawmakers yesterday demanded a detailed accounting of how [Rice] plans to spend $6 billion in supplemental funds that the administration has asked for the State Department this year, much of it for Iraq and Afghanistan." Members from both parties "asked pointed questions about the rising cost of efforts that seem to be failing, despite newly announced U.S. strategies for both countries."

Maliki Touts Plan's "Fabulous Success" To Bush. In a conversation with President Bush yesterday, the Washington Post (2/17, A20, Ernesto Londono, 690K) reports, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said "the relative lull in violence is a promising sign that the Baghdad security plan is off to a good start." He "assured President Bush that the three-day-old plan 'has achieved fabulous success,' according to an account of the conversation released by the prime minister's office. Speaking by secure video link-up, Maliki also told Bush that officials will be 'firm in dealing with any side that breaks the law, regardless' of their sect."

The New York Times (2/17, Santora, 1.16M) says Maliki "told President Bush on Friday that the increased effort to provide security in Baghdad had gone exceedingly well so far." Also, "across Baghdad, there were signs of the heightened troop presence, as cars were searched at new checkpoints and raids resulted in the arrest of at least 35 people." Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil Jr. "told reporters on Friday that there had been a substantial reduction in violence in the past 48 hours, which he attributed both to the increased troop presence and the decision by Sunni and Shiite militants to keep a low profile."

"Jury Remains Out" On Crackdown's Success. The AP (2/17, Murphy) reports, "As a military offensive seeks to bring Baghdad from the brink of anarchy, a top Iraqi security officer tried Friday to measure its early stages using the grim logic of a place with daily bloodshed: by counting the bodies arriving at the morgue. A total of 10 corpses were collected off the streets ... This was the basis for an upbeat message by [Qassim] Moussawi, a spokesman for the joint U.S.-Iraqi security sweep that began this week and has so far faced limited resistance. But his American counterparts remain much more guarded. ... The contrasting [US and Iraqi outlooks cut across the entire mission, dubbed Operation Law and Order, which seeks to reclaim the streets."

Sadr Commanders Flee Iraqi Crackdown. The Financial Times (2/17, Khalaf) reports, "Iraqi officials on Friday reported an 'exodus' of commanders from the Shia Mahdi army, as armed groups seek to protect themselves from the US military crackdown in Baghdad and preserve their organisations. Mystery has swirled over the whereabouts of Moqtada al-Sadr, the fiery cleric whose Mahdi army is accused by the US of a leading role in the sectarian violence that has devastated the capital. ... It is not clear how long the Mahdi commanders will stay away. In previous security crackdowns in the capital, militias and Sunni insurgents faded but re-appeared when US forces retreated."

Sunni Insurgents Carry Fight North Of Baghdad. The AP (2/17, Frayer) reports, "Sunni insurgents have been streaming out of Baghdad to escape the security crackdown, carrying the fight to neighboring Diyala province where direct fire attacks on Americans have nearly doubled since last summer, U.S. soldiers say. That has led to sharp fighting only 35 miles north of the capital in a province known as 'Little Iraq' because of its near-equal mix of Sunni and Shiite Arabs as well as Kurds. ... Some U.S. officers suspect the advance publicity for the Baghdad security plan may have encouraged extremists — both Sunnis and Shiites — to flee the capital for surrounding provinces, including Diyala, where fewer U.S. troops are stationed."

Gates Proves "Less Combative" Than Rumsfeld. The Financial Times (2/17, Sevastopulo) reports, "Before Robert Gates held his first Pentagon press conference as defence secretary, reporters were curious how his modus operandi would differ from Donald Rumsfeld's, his predecessor. When he opened with something Mr Rumsfeld rarely gave - an apology - it was clear a new era had dawned." Gates proved "almost shy" compared to the "charismatically antagonistic" Rumsfeld, but "In a sign Mr Gates may be seeing his honeymoon draw to a close, he came under pressure over recent contradictory statements by members of the military and Bush administration officials about the extent to which top Iranian officials had approved attacks on US solders in Iraq."

Some US Forces In Surge To Deploy Ahead Of Schedule. NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 3, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Thousands of US troops are either already on their way to Iraq or about to deploy for there. That is the case with the US Army Third Infantry division, which you'd recall led the original march into Baghdad, the tip of the spear, now going back months ahead of schedule." The Washington Times/AP (2/17) reports, "The Pentagon said yesterday it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq. The 3rd Infantry Division headquarters staff will deploy from Fort Stewart, Ga., next month -- about three months earlier than planned, according to an Army statement."

ABC World News (2/16, story 3, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Ironically, while the Congress debates the advisability of the President's surge, the surge itself has begun. US and Iraqi troops have launched the increased security crackdown this week. And so far, there are encouraging signs, as they've met little resistance so far." ABC (Karl): "The new effort to secure Baghdad isn't even a week old. But already, the Iraqi military says violence is down. Iraqi officials offer a morbid statistic. Only 10 bodies showed up at the Baghdad morgue today, compared to the usual average of forty to fifty a day."

Children Of Troops Endure Parents' Absence. The CBS Evening News (2/16, story 7, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News In Focus : The home front.. As Americans in uniform fight overseas, their families need the courage to carry on without them: 163,000 US servicemen and women are serving in Iraq and Afghanistan, and according to the Pentagon, these American heroes have at least that many children back in the States." CBS (Bowen): "By all appearances, Chloe Clark elementary school is typical, until you take a closer look." Coley Fannin: "How many of us are from military families?" Bowen: "Half the 300 students here come from Army families. ... And counselor Coley Fannin's job is to help them learn how to cope. He holds weekly group sessions. ... So they learn to cope, but that doesn't mean 10-year-old Trey Nesbit likes it."

Al Qaeda's Abuses Swing Anbar Sunnis To US Side. The Washington Times (2/17, Hess, 88K) reports on its front page, "Sunni tribes in troubled Anbar province have begun working closely with U.S. and government forces, contributing nearly 2,400 men to the police department and 1,600 to a newly organized tribal security force, authorities say. ... By a U.S. count, 12 of the Ramadi area's 21 tribes are cooperating in the security effort, six are considered neutral, and three are actively hostile. That is almost the reverse of the tribal posture last June, when three were cooperative and 12 were hostile."

Suicide Bomber Kills Nine In Kirkuk. The AP (2/17, Murphy) reports, "A suicide car bomber rammed into a crowded market in northern Iraq moments after a booby-trapped vehicle exploded Saturday, killing at least nine people and injuring 60, police said. The back-to-back blasts in the oil hub of Kirkuk broke a brief lull in major violence around the country as U.S. and Iraqi forces try to regain control of Baghdad and other key areas from gangs and militias."

Quds Force Remains A Mystery. The New York Times (2/17, A1, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "Like so much else about the Iranian state, the Quds Force, which conducts overseas operations for Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, remains remarkably mysterious even to those who closely study the country. The Quds Force is under intense scrutiny by American intelligence agencies because it is suspected of supplying sophisticated explosives to Iraqi militants." Defense Secretary Gates is quoted as saying, "We know that the Quds Force is involved." The Times continues, "But the Quds Force is cloaked in secrecy inside Iran and is the subject of considerable guesswork from scholars in the United States, who in interviews this week offered estimates of its size ranging from 3,000 to 50,000 men. The true number, along with details of the strength and budget of the entire Revolutionary Guard, is hidden even from the Iranian Parliament, said [scholar Abbas] Milani, according to legislators he has spoken with. Some specialists even question whether the Quds Force exists as a formal unit clearly delineated from the rest of the Revolutionary Guard."

Businessman Sentenced For Role In Iraq Scheme. The New York Times/AP (2/17, A11) reports in a four-sentence brief, "An American businessman whose companies made more than $8 million in Iraq reconstruction money through a gifts-for-contracts scheme was sentenced to 46 months in prison. The businessman, Philip H. Bloom, who has lived in Romania for many years, pleaded guilty last year to bribery and conspiracy to commit money laundering."

Iraqi Reporter Describes Search For Missing Father And Brother. In a first-person account for the Wall Street Journal (2/17, A1, 2.04M), Iraqi emigre Sarmad Ali writes, "My father had left home in Baghdad that morning to go to the auto-repair shop across town where he works. Fifteen minutes after he left, car bombs exploded on his route to work and he hasn't been seen since. ... I feel responsible for my family, but at the same time helpless. I am not a U.S. citizen, or a permanent resident. My guest status here prevents me from being able to bring my family to join me." Ali now fears his brother may have been killed in a bombing: "He did not pick up his phone. Not the next day either. I recently reached a friend in Iraq, who said he had seen my brother. But I'm still waiting for him to call back."

Baghdad Girls Find Haven In School. The Washington Post (2/17, A18, Partlow, 690K) reports, "In Baghdad alone, 38,766 people have been driven from their homes by the daily sectarian killing, the United Nations reports, and the echoes of this mass migration resonate every day at Amil High School for Girls in Baghdad. Located in the relatively safe Shiite area of Kadhimiyah, along the western bank of the Tigris River, the whitewashed concrete schoolhouse has become a haven for Shiite Muslim students fleeing with their families from the religious segregation now pulling apart many of Baghdad's neighborhoods. In the past three months, Amil High School has accepted 135 new students, pushing the school's population over 1,000, and more families show up each day. Iraq's Human Rights Ministry has sent employees to distribute skirts, backpacks and shoes to the new pupils."

Al Qaeda Releases Afghan Attack Video. The AP (2/16, Mortimer) reports, "Al-Qaida posted today a video showing what it claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of U.S. and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan. The video appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage U.S. claims to be winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan. ... The narrator, who sounds like the American al-Qaida member Adam Gadahn, claims that the [depicted] position is 'liberated' by the insurgents. However, the film does not show the insurgents capturing the target -- a compound of mud-plastered buildings in a valley -- during the night-time battle. It only shows the insurgents walking through the compound in daylight."

Lawmakers Introduce Bill To Let Death Benefit Go To Guardian. The Washington Post (2/17, A6, George, 690K) reports, "Lawmakers introduced companion bills in the House and Senate yesterday that would allow grandparents and other relatives raising children of fallen troops to be designated as beneficiaries of a $100,000 'death gratuity.' The bills, by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Rep. Tom Latham (R-Iowa), followed a story yesterday in The Washington Post that profiled Susan Jaenke, an Iowa woman who is raising a 9-year-old granddaughter after Jaenke's 29-year-old daughter, Petty Officer 2nd Class Jaime S. Jaenke, was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq. Susan Jaenke could not collect the $100,000 benefit her daughter thought she had assigned to her because of strict next-of-kin regulations."

Injured Marine Becomes Minor League Pitcher. ABC World News (2/16, story 11, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally tonight, our 'Person of the Week,' someone moving into the world of sport that we can all root for." Cpl. Cooper Brannon: "They say Marines don't cry, right? You know, this is one of my biggest dreams of my whole life. You know?" Gibson: "Twenty-two-year-old Cooper Brannan is trading one uniform for another. Just this week, the Marine Corporal signed a minor league contract to pitch for the San Diego Padres. ... He sustained serious wounds to his left hand. Three fingers were severed. Doctors were only able to reattach two of them."

Dowd Says Self-Help "Secret" Has War Policy Relevance. New York Times (2/17, A15, 1.16M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes mockingly, "Oprah did her second show in eight days on 'The Secret,' the self-help book (and DVD) by Rhonda Byrne, an Australian reality-TV producer. ... A main tenet of The Secret is learning to avoid the chain reaction of churlishness, which begins with a single thought: 'The one bad thought attracted more bad thoughts, the frequency locked in, and eventually something went wrong. Then as you reacted to that one thing going wrong, you attracted more things going wrong.' It's an apt description of Iraq policy. A bad thought that led to more bad thoughts, and the negative frequency is now locked in on Iran, which is responding with its own negative frequency."

Former Rove Aide Will Not Seek Arkansas US Attorney Post. The Washington Post (2/17, A10, Eggen, 690K) reports Tim Griffin, "a military lawyer who previously worked for presidential adviser Karl Rove and for the Republican National Committee," said "he will not seek the nomination to be chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock. Griffin "was appointed interim U.S. attorney in Little Rock in December on the White House's recommendation. The Justice Department said it intended to nominate Griffin for the job permanently. But Griffin said yesterday that he would be unlikely to be confirmed for the job because of opposition from key Democratic senators, including Mark Pryor (Ark.) and Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.). … Griffin's decision, which was reported by the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, is the latest development in the controversy over the abrupt firings of seven U.S. attorneys. The dismissals angered lawmakers of both parties and have prompted a battle over the attorney general's power to name replacements." The New York Times (2/17, A12, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "On Thursday evening, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called several Arkansas lawmakers to advise them that Mr. Griffin's name would be withdrawn, Congressional aides said."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/17, Taylor) reports, "Griffin, 38, said he would be willing to remain interim U.S. attorney until a replacement is named. Under a change in the law last year, that means he could stay in office until the end of President Bush's term. … 'I will be here as long as the White House and Department of Justice wants me here,' he said. 'Under the law, I could be here, hypothetically, until end of 2008 or early 2009.'" McClatchy adds, "Justice Department officials described Griffin as a talented and experienced lawyer, and accused Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., of trying to block Griffin from becoming a permanent U.S. attorney. Justice Department officials said Friday that the administration would work with the Arkansas delegation to find a replacement. Gonzales has told senators that he'll submit all U.S. attorney candidates for Senate confirmation. … 'Given Tim's strong qualifications, the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation,' Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said." McClatchy notes, "Administration officials have been forced to defend the firings in recent weeks after critics raised concerns that well-respected U.S. attorneys were being removed to make way for handpicked candidates who would be less likely to buck the White House. .. Gonzales called Pryor on Thursday night to tell him that the Justice Department would not ask the Senate to confirm Griffin. … Gonzales promised that the administration would seek confirmation for another candidate, but he didn't say when an announcement would be made, said Michael Teague, Pryor's spokesman."

WPost Decries DOJ And Interior Officials' Ties To Lobbyist. The Washington Post (2/17, A30, 690K), ina n editorial, writes, "It's the kind of story that seems to confirm everything people believe is sleazy about the way Washington works. Last March, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then the head of the Justice Department's environmental division, bought a $1 million vacation home with Don R. Duncan, the top lobbyist for oil company ConocoPhillips. Nine months later, Ms. Wooldridge signed off on a settlement agreement that let ConocoPhillips delay the installation of pollution-control equipment and the payment of fines. Just to make matters cozier, the third owner of the beach house is J. Steven Griles, the former No. 2 official at the Interior Department who's now the target of a Justice Department criminal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Oh, and Ms. Wooldridge, who lives with Mr. Griles, once worked with him at Interior, where she gave Mr. Griles ethics advice and defended his actions during an inspector general investigation. … Ms. Wooldridge has left the department, but Justice…said yesterday that its Office of Professional Responsibility was looking into the matter."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Seeks Civil Resolution Of Enron-Related Case. The Houston Chronicle (2/17, Hays) reports, "Three former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives whose 2004 fraud and conspiracy convictions in an Enron case were overturned last year may avoid facing another jury." The Chronicle continues, "Upon informing U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein on Friday that the government wanted to retry the case 'sooner rather than later,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Arnold Spencer said prosecutors also would 'continue our conversations' with defense attorneys to resolve it without a second trial. … Spencer declined to elaborate, as did attorneys for two of the defendants. But one of the defense attorneys, Dan Cogdell, said he was 'looking for a civil resolution, not a criminal resolution,' such as a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Chronicle adds, "Werlein, who presided over the first trial, encouraged some sort of nontrial resolution. He said prosecutors should 'at least ponder' where the government's time, money and energy is best spent. … 'So I wish you well in your conversations. I hope you will be able to be successful,' the judge said." The Chronicle notes, "Friday's hearing came nearly six months after a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals threw out most jury convictions of Daniel Bayly, James Brown, Robert Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs. … The case involves a year-end 1999 deal in which the government contends the brokerage pretended to buy three power plants on barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have met quarterly earnings targets. The defendants claimed the deal was proper. … Jurors acquitted in-house Enron accountant Sheila Kahanek while convicting the four Merrill defendants and Dan Boyle, a former Enron finance executive."

FBI Serves Subpoenas On New Jersey Lawmakers In Widening Probe. The Newark Star-Ledger (2/17, Sherman, Whelan) reported, "New Jersey legislative officials were hit with a volley of federal subpoenas" Friday, "in a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie. The subpoenas were served on both the Democratic and Republican leadership in the Senate and the Assembly -- seeking information on how millions in public funds were handed out over the last three years." The Star-Ledger added, "The subpoenas, delivered by FBI agents late Friday afternoon as lawmakers were heading home, left many in Trenton thunderstruck. 'Trenton is on fire,' declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole (R-Essex), as news of the subpoenas broke. … Lawmakers and other Statehouse veterans could not recall a federal probe ever going as deeply into the state's budget process." The Star-Ledger noted, "Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether some lawmakers have sought, through the state budget process, to steer money to nonprofit organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families."

Payments To Woman Who Had Affair With San Francisco Mayor Under Probe. The New York Times (2/17, McKinley) reports from San Francisco, "In the latest development in a lingering political scandal, the city attorney here is investigating whether any laws were broken in a payment to a married woman who had an affair with Mayor Gavin Newsom." The Times continues, "The woman, Ruby Rippey-Tourk, worked full time in City Hall as the mayor's appointments secretary until last May, when she took a three-month unpaid leave to seek treatment for a substance abuse problem. … While she was on leave, several unidentified city employees donated their sick time to Ms. Rippey-Tourk under a program that allows city employees to transfer sick time to other city employees. After she returned from leave, Ms. Rippey-Tourk formally resigned, and was paid out the cash equivalent of that accumulated time, a little more than $10,000." The Times adds, "Sam Singer, a spokesman for Ms. Rippey-Tourk, said he was not at liberty to say who had transferred their time, but that the mayor had not. Mr. Singer added that the payment was 'acceptable and legal.' … But on Thursday, the city attorney, Dennis Herrera, said he would examine the payment to make sure it had been 'done properly under city laws and procedures.' … Peter Ragone, a spokesman for the mayor, said his office welcomed the review. 'We are confident the matter was handled appropriately and humanely,' Mr. Ragone said." The Times notes, "The inquiry comes as Mr. Newsom is trying to shake off the damage from his admission last month that he had a brief sexual relationship with Ms. Rippey-Tourk in late 2005, when he was in the process of getting a divorce. Ms. Rippey-Tourk is married to Alex Tourk, who had been managing Mr. Newsom's campaign for a second term until the affair prompted his resignation."

Connecticut Attorney Accused Of Destroying Evidence In Child Porn Case. The New York Times (2/17, Malone) reports from Greenwich, CT, "A well-known lawyer was indicted on Friday on charges that he obstructed justice and destroyed evidence in the investigation of a former church choir director whose laptop computer contained images of naked boys." The Times continues, "The lawyer, Philip D. Russell, 48, of Stamford, appeared in United States District Court in Bridgeport and pleaded not guilty. He was released on $100,000 bail. … Mr. Russell is accused of destroying a laptop computer containing pornography that was owned by Robert F. Tate, the longtime music director at Christ Church here. Mr. Tate pleaded guilty in January to possessing 150 to 300 images of naked boys and faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison." The Times adds, "The indictment said that two unidentified church officials and Mr. Russell, who was acting as a lawyer for the church, confronted Mr. Tate in October after a church employee who had been using the laptop discovered the pornographic images. Mr. Tate admitted that the images were his and promptly resigned. … Mr. Russell then took the laptop and dismantled it, the indictment said. … Prosecutors said Mr. Russell and the church officials allowed Mr. Tate to remove his possessions from his church apartment and arranged for him to fly from Connecticut to California. He was later arrested in Los Angeles." The Times notes, "It is unclear whether there will be other indictments. Several people affiliated with the church have hired lawyers, and the Rev. Jeffrey Walker, the church's rector, has been called before the grand jury at least twice. Prosecutors did not return calls seeking comment. … Some legal observers say Mr. Russell's case could be a test of a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law that places greater responsibility on lawyers to preserve evidence in situations that may become the subject of criminal prosecutions."

San Francisco Police Issue Warrant In Wiesel Attack. The New York Times (2/17, Marshall) reports, "The San Francisco Police Department issued an arrest warrant for a man suspected of attacking Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize." The Times continues, "The man, Eric Hunt, 22, of Sussex County, N.J., is accused of assaulting Mr. Wiesel, 78, on Feb. 1, as he was attending an interfaith conference." The Times adds, "Mr. Hunt, who is not yet in custody but has been located, will be charged with a hate crime, the police said in a statement. He was identified as a suspect, the police said, after claiming to be the attacker in an Internet posting."

House Democrats Back Federal Shield Law. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/17, Coile) reports, "House lawmakers, with the support of top Democratic leaders, are preparing to fast-track long-stalled legislation that would shield reporters in most cases from having to reveal their sources to federal prosecutors." The Chronicle continues, "The move follows the Justice Department's decision this week to withdraw a subpoena for two Chronicle reporters after a defense lawyer pleaded guilty to leaking grand jury transcripts in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative investigation, in which top athletes testified they had used illegal steroids." The Chronicle adds, "Reps. Mike Pence, R-Ind., and Rick Boucher, D-Va., plan to reintroduce their federal media shield legislation next month with the support of House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich. Conyers has pledged to move the bill through his committee quickly and to the House floor. … Sens. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., and Richard Lugar, R-Ind., are preparing to reintroduce a similar bill in the Senate, although proponents suggest it may be tougher to get a filibuster-proof 60-vote majority in the Senate, given the Bush administration's opposition. … The Chronicle case has been used by the bill's supporters as Exhibit A for why Congress should pass a law protecting journalists from having to name their sources or turn over materials to the government."

Doolittle Defends Wilkes In Cunningham Bribery Probe. The Sacramento Bee (2/17, Whitney) reports, "Rep. John Doolittle, R-Roseville, said Friday that he believes in the innocence of a close friend and political supporter indicted this week on charges related to the bribery of former San Diego-area Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The Bee continues, "Brent Wilkes, a Poway defense contractor whose business Doolittle had helped land a $37 million contract, was indicted on corruption charges, including paying bribes and providing prostitutes for Cunningham, who's now in prison. … Wilkes entered a not guilty plea to the charges, handed up by a federal grand jury, in a federal court in San Diego on Wednesday. He later sent out an e-mail proclaiming his innocence. … 'The investigation and its accompanying deliberate leaks of false rumors has destroyed my reputation and inflicted critical wounds on all of my business interests,' Wilkes said. 'Let me say loud and clear: I never bribed Duke Cunningham or anyone else.'" The Bee notes, "Doolittle said in an earlier interview that he befriended Wilkes though Ed Buckham, a former staff member for then-Rep. Tom DeLay who became a lobbyist for the Alexandria Strategy Group and was a close associate of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Doolittle also has described Abramoff as a close friend. … Over the course of their relationship, Wilkes and his wife, Regina, together with his companies and associates, contributed tens of thousands of dollars to Doolittle's re-election committee and political action committee. … In April 2005, Wilkes' corporate jet was used to fly DeLay to Las Vegas for a fundraiser at the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino for Doolittle's PAC, the Superior California Federal Leadership Fund. Wilkes contributed $10,000 to Doolittle at that event. … Later, Doolittle acknowledged he included a $37 million item in the Defense Department's budget to pay for a contract to one of Wilkes' companies, PerfectWave. He also said he tried to win a House contract for another Wilkes company, ADCS. … Asked about Wilkes' indictment during a telephone news conference Friday, Doolittle said he has read his friend's statement, and believes him."

Michigan Lawmakers Await DOJ Standards On Sex Offender Registry. The Lansing (MI) State Journal (2/17, Adams) reports, "A Senate bill would amend the state's 1994 sex offender registry law to follow federal registry requirements. … But unfortunately, federal officials haven't revealed those requirements." The Journal continues, "The bill would expand information about ex-cons on the State Police public sex offender registry to include details about vehicles they own, their places of employment and convictions for other crimes. … That would comply with a 2006 federal mandate that requires standardization of information in state registries so they can be integrated into the National Sex Offender Registry. … However, the U.S. Justice Department hasn't announced what standardization would entail. It's up to that department to read what Congress ordered and determine exactly what it means, said Sgt. Matt Bolger, legislative liaison for the State Police. … 'Federal law is nowhere near as easy to read as state law is,' he said. … 'We're kind of waiting on that determination from the Department of Justice on what our duties are going to be.'" The Journal notes, "Once those duties have been determined, Michigan lawmakers can amend state law to comply, Bolger said."

Judge's Order Regarding Plame's Status Questioned. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/17, A31, 690K) the National Review's Byron York writes, "At the end of each witness's testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, after prosecutors and defense attorneys examined and cross-examined, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton asked jurors to write down any questions they had. Walton would then look through the papers, decide which questions were appropriate and pose them to the witness. … But last week there was a moment when we got a hint not from a question that Walton asked, but from one he refused to ask. After the testimony of star prosecution witness Tim Russert, Walton scanned the jurors' queries and announced, 'There is going to be one question I'm not going to ask. I've concluded that that question is not appropriate and therefore you should not speculate as to what the response would have been.' What was he talking about? A moment later, Walton told the jurors: 'What Mrs. Wilson's status was at the CIA, whether it was covert or not covert, is not something that you're going to hear any evidence presented to you on in this trial.' 'Whether she was, or whether she was not, covert is not relevant to the issues you have to decide in this case,' he said. It is The Thing That Cannot Be Spoken at the Libby trial. … The result is that jurors have heard constant suggestions that some sort of crime, committed by the administration and perhaps by Libby himself, lies at the bottom of the case. An air of accusation hangs over the courtroom. But the accusation can't be discussed."

GE To Book $115 In Asbestos Claims Expenses. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, Kranhold) reports, "General Electric Co. said it will record a $115 million after-tax expense in the first quarter after losing a decade-long battle with its insurers over payments for thousands of asbestos-related claims." The Journal continues, "In a decision released this week, the New York State Court of Appeals upheld lower-court rulings preventing GE from tapping secondary insurance to cover claims brought mostly by individuals exposed to asbestos-insulated turbines. The Court of Appeals is the state's highest court." The Journal adds, "To date, GE, based in Fairfield, Conn., has paid more than $500 million to settle asbestos-related cases, according to court documents. GE said 509,000 asbestos-related claims were filed against the company through 2006; 40,000 are pending. GE said claims settled to date have mostly been covered by both GE's primary and secondary carriers; the rest are being covered by GE. GE didn't make the asbestos but used it to insulate turbines. … GE spokesman Gary Sheffer said, in a statement, GE was 'disappointed in the decision, which is contrary to how the majority of courts have ruled.' Mr. Sheffer said GE is reviewing its options. … Mr. Sheffer said the expense, amounting to about one cent per share, would have no impact on GE's financial forecast for the first quarter. GE has said it expects net income of between $4.5 billion and $4.6 billion, or 43 cents to 45 cents a share. … The lawsuit centered on whether GE's asbestos-related claims should be treated as one incident under its insurance policies issued between 1965 and 1985 or whether each claim should be treated individually."

DC Circuit Panel Hears Suit Over Tire-Pressure Monitors. The Detroit News (2/17, Shepardson) reports, "A three-judge federal appeals court panel today expressed skepticism toward tire makers and an auto safety group who say federal regulators have watered down rules requiring tire pressure monitoring systems in all new vehicles starting this fall." The News continues, "Tire makers and Public Citizen argue the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's regulation, aimed at making automakers install tire-pressure warning systems, falls far short of what Congress intended when it passed a 2000 law requiring that all vehicles be equipped with such monitors by Sept 1." The News adds, "The legislation came in the wake of a recall of 13 million tires on Ford Explorers and other vehicles that were linked to nearly 280 deaths. … A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia heard the challenge to the NHTSA rule today, more than three years after another appeals court threw out NHTSA's first tire pressure regulation, issued in 2002. … Judges David Sentelle, Brett Kavanaugh and A. Raymond Randolph questioned whether the tire makers and Public Citizen had the legal right or 'standing' to file the suit. … Marc Machlin, a lawyer for Public Citizen, noted that more than 78,000 accidents yearly are caused by under inflated tires." The News notes, "The plaintiffs must overcome several hurdles: one is showing that there is a 'non-trivial' higher risk from the rule NHTSA imposed versus the type of tire monitoring rules they are seeking. They also must show they have a legal right to file the suit. … Sentelle said if there is only a general risk for everyone, the matter is best decided by 'the political branches' -- i.e. Congress and the White House. Sentelle said under the Public Citizen theory, drivers, passengers and pedestrians -- basically everyone in the United States -- would have a right to sue. … But Kavanaugh also asked some tough questions of Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III. He said it was 'odd' that NHTSA could 'water down' or effectively eliminate some of the requirements that Congress set in its statute. … Byron said Congress couldn't have meant to mandate an 'impossible' requirement, namely that automakers certify that their systems work with all replacement tires."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Backs Florida Sober House Suit. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/17, Franceschina) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice filed a legal brief Friday contending that a Boca Raton ordinance banning so-called sober houses from residential neighborhoods clearly violates federal housing law." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "The Justice Department brief was filed in a lawsuit by a sober house operator against the city that went to trial last month. It asks a federal judge to declare the ordinance invalid and prevent the city from enforcing it. The ordinance, passed by the City Council in May 2002, would require the sober houses to move into areas of the city zoned for medical centers and hotels." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "The ordinance has never been enforced because of the threat of litigation. Steve Manko, the owner of two large sober house apartment complexes -- Boca House for men and Awakenings for women -- sued the city in March 2003. The American Civil Liberties Union, representing former and current Boca House clients, also was involved in the case. … Manko's attorney, William Hill of Miami, said he was encouraged by the Justice Department filing because it supports the plaintiffs' position. The plaintiffs contend that the ordinance violates the federal Fair Housing Act and also the Americans with Disabilities Act. Under those federal provisions, people who are in recovery from alcohol or drug addiction are considered to be disabled or handicapped, providing them with housing protections. … 'I'm ecstatic,' Hill said. 'It could not be clearer. The Department of Justice is saying what we have been saying all along: This ordinance violates the Fair Housing Act on its face. The city should have realized this was wrong years ago and not put us through this. Instead, the city has been putting forth a defense that is not legal under the Fair Housing Act.' … Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the Justice Department filing did not raise any new issues. … The Justice Department filed a separate suit against the city over the alleged housing violations in September. That case is pending. The judge hearing Manko's suit invited the Justice Department to file Friday's brief. … Justice Department attorney Nancy Langworthy wrote that the city's ordinance 'singles out for regulation housing for disabled persons and is discriminatory on its face.' Langworthy asked the judge to award damages to several former and current residents of Boca House and to impose a fine on the city 'to vindicate the public interest.'"

NYTimes Urges New York To Curb Police Camera Use. The New York Times (2/17) editorializes, "The New York Police Department has generally had the public on its side when it comes to securing the city since the Sept. 11 attacks. For their part, New Yorkers seem perfectly willing to put up with inconveniences, including traffic stops and bag searches. But the police have more and more overstepped their bounds by routinely and indiscriminately videotaping demonstrations of every kind, even peaceful ones. A federal judge was right this week to order the police to curb this conduct." The Times continues, "The practical effect of the order is to compel law-enforcement officers to obey guidelines that require them to state a reason to suspect unlawful activity before they videotape demonstrators. They must also get department authorization. That's a modest requirement. The city contends the current practice is not strictly unconstitutional, but the prospect of being photographed by police while merely protesting can have a chilling effect on free speech." The Times concludes that the city government "should now move quickly to ensure the court, and the public, that it will protect New Yorkers' civil liberties."

GM Reportedly Discussing Buyout Of DaimlerChrysler. The Washington Times (2/17, Lengell) reports, "The world's largest automaker is set to expand further, as General Motors Corp. is negotiating to buy the struggling Chrysler division from its German parent, DaimlerChrysler AG, sources with knowledge of the talks said." The Times continues, "GM and DaimlerChrysler officials have denied the existence of any talks. … 'We're not going to comment on speculations concerning [any] discussions between [DaimlerChrysler] and GM,' GM spokesman Tom Wilkinson said yesterday. 'As we've said in the past, we've frequently discussed areas of mutual interest with other carmakers, and in a lot of cases, these discussions don't lead anywhere.'" The Times adds, "Nevertheless, Detroit and Wall Street were buzzing after the German business publication Manager Magazin reported Wednesday that GM and DaimlerChrysler were negotiating a buyout of Chrysler. … Speculation of a buyout intensified yesterday after the U.S. trade publication Automotive News reported that 'high level talks' of a buyout between DaimlerChrysler and GM executives are being held."

The Washington Post (2/17, D1, Freeman) reports, "Shares of DaimlerChrysler climbed yesterday after media reports that General Motors was in talks to buy the German firm's Chrysler division." The Post continues, "Chrysler officials in Germany played down the reports, saying the primary focus now for Chrysler was a restructuring aimed at returning it to profitability. And U.S. industry executives struggled yesterday to assess how GM would benefit from an alliance with Chrysler. GM is in the process of shrinking its operations in an attempt to increase its profit. … Other potential Chrysler suitors include European or Asian carmakers seeking a bigger foothold in North America. Renault-Nissan Motor chief executive Carlos Ghosn, who unsuccessfully sought to enter into an alliance with General Motors last year, has said he is open to new partners. He has not, however, publicly expressed interest in Chrysler."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, B3, Stoll, Berman) reports, "GM and Chrysler are discussing joining forces to develop a large sport-utility vehicle and possibly a small car made in Korea, several people familiar with the matter said, adding that a 'production deal' is the most likely scenario. … On Wall Street, the focus also turned to Detroit's labor negotiations with the United Auto Workers. As so much of the industry's future is based around this contract, the issue presents a chicken-and-egg paradox for potential buyers." The Journal adds, "Many people discounted the idea of a spinoff, saying that it would do little to fix Chrylser's main problems of cost structure and product appeal. That said, these people pointed out that what is best for the remaining Daimler side of the company may not be best for Chrysler's side. … DaimlerChrysler investors clearly favor the idea of selling Chrysler, long the smallest of Detroit's Big Three and now even smaller than Toyota Motor Corp. in the U.S. market. … A deal linking GM, the world's largest auto maker, and Chrysler would likely face many hurdles, including antitrust questions, integration challenges and opposition from workers."

The Financial Times (2/17, Reed, Milne, Simon) reports, "Analysts expressed scepticism on Friday that GM's shareholders would support the idea of a tie-up with Chrysler, the most focused of Detroit's Big Three, at a time when both face declining sales in the world's biggest car market. … GM has not made a full car-company acquisition in its recent history, although, like other groups, it forms ad hoc alliances and joint ventures."

The New York Times (2/17, Maynard) reports, "The willingness by DaimlerChrysler to cut loose its Chrysler Group, ending its nine-year trans-Atlantic partnership, is drawing cheers from investors. … Shares of the German company rose nearly 14.4 percent this week, capped by a climb on Friday that was fueled by speculation that General Motors and Chrysler were holding talks. DaimlerChrysler ended the week at $73.33, up $3.08." The Times continues, "The talk is doing little for G.M., however. Its shares rose less than 1 percent this week, closing Friday at $36.34, down 10 cents. … On Wednesday, DaimlerChrysler said it was keeping all its options open for Chrysler, refusing to rule out a sale or a strategic partner for its American unit." The Times adds, "At Friday's close, DaimlerChrysler stock was within $1.20 of a 52-week high, prompting some analysts to predict it could be headed much higher, to levels rarely seen since the heady days after the 1998 merger. … That alone is reason enough to keep the rumors swirling a little longer, analysts said, giving DaimlerChrysler time to see whether any potential suitors come forward for Chrysler. It has hired JPMorgan as a strategic adviser."

Banco Bilbao To Buy Compass Bancshares. The New York Times (2/17, Werdigier) reports, "Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria, Spain's second-largest bank, after Santander, agreed to buy Compass Bancshares of the United States for $9.6 billion, making its biggest acquisition abroad in a market where it seeks to strengthen its foothold." The Times continues, "Banco Bilbao, or BBVA, said Friday that Compass shareholders can choose to receive either $71.80 in cash or 2.8 new BBVA shares for each of their current Compass shares. The offer represents a premium of about 16 percent to the average Compass share price during the last 10 days and 8 percent above Friday's closing price." The Times adds, "Spain's banks have profited from significant growth in the Spanish economy and a sharp increase in mortgage lending, even to foreigners who are buying holiday homes in the country. BBVA, based in Bilbao, in northern Spain, and Banco Santander Central Hispano, the country's largest bank, have used their profits to expand into Latin America, where economic growth has spurred demand for banking services. … BBVA owns BBVA Bancomer, the largest bank in Mexico by assets, while Santander has spent a total of $17 billion on various Latin American acquisitions since 1996. Santander now owns Mexico's No. 3 bank, Serfin, and Brazil's seventh-largest lender, Banespa."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, B1, Johnson) reports, "Spain's two main retail banks have moved from the bush leagues to become among the largest, most efficient, most profitable in the world. And one of them just made a big play to take on two U.S. giants in a lucrative American market." The Journal continues, "Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's agreement to buy Alabama-based Compass Bancshares Inc. for $9.6 billion, announced Friday, would give it hundreds of branches in the South and West, including 163 in Texas, a fast-growing market. That would pit Madrid-based BBVA against Bank of America Corp. and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., the Lone Star State's two biggest banks. … That deal follows Spain-based Banco Santander Central Hispano SA's acquisition last year of a 25% stake in Philadelphia-based Sovereign Bancorp, which has almost 800 branches in nine states." The Journal adds, "BBVA was all bluster in announcing the deal. BBVA 'is much more advanced than the Citis or the J.P. Morgans' at nuts-and-bolts retail banking, said Chairman and Chief Executive Francisco González. … The U.S. rivals are expected to put up a fight. 'They're competing against some of our best retail banks,' said Jefferson L. Harralson, a bank analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods. 'It's going to be hard for them to move market share, and it's going to be hard for them keep market share.' … The deal follows a string of acquisitions that have turned BBVA and Santander into the world's 15th-largest and ninth-largest banks respectively by stock-market value. Both reported record full-year profits this month."

The Financial Times (2/17, Mulligan) reports, "Analysts voiced concerns about the dilutive effect of the planned €4bn capital increase to part-fund the deal, which comes just three months after a €3bn share issue aimed at improving the balance sheet. … There were also worries about the erosion of BBVA's core capital ratios. 'History shows investors should be wary of acquisitive companies,' UBS said."

Tribune Moves Toward "Self-Help" Auction Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A2, Ellison) reports, "As the auction for Tribune Co. limps to a close, it is becoming clear that newspaper publishers can't sell their way out of their current woes." The Journal continues, "Tribune's board of directors is scheduled to meet late this coming week, and while it is uncertain they will emerge from the meeting with an announcement, company management and advisers are casting aside outside offers and working on what is being billed as a 'self-help' plan. … That is another way of saying that nobody came to Tribune's rescue." The Journal adds, "Typically, if a company avoids a takeover, employees and management breathe a sigh of relief and go back to business as usual. But if this auction ends as many expect, Tribune will have to self-inflict the kinds of harsh changes that normally come from an outside buyer. That will mean even steeper cost cutting and asset sales. … That is partly because Tribune, along with many other newspaper players, waited too long to take the dramatic action that now is being thrust upon them. Tribune was forced into the auction process by its largest shareholder, the Chandler family, which pushed for action just as panic was building about the industry's prospects. The irony is that the Chandlers were too late. They are angling to remove themselves from the newspaper business they should have gotten out of years ago, when they sold Times Mirror Co. to Tribune in 2000. Today, the options are much more limited. … Under the current plan, at least Tribune's fate is all in the Chicago family. Sam Zell, a Windy City real-estate mogul, and the Chandlers are still circling Tribune, though any chance of either party making a successful offer is unlikely. Tribune isn't comfortable with either proposal being proffered, and neither party seems willing to increase the terms."

New England Ski Resorts To Be Sold. The Boston Globe (2/17, Reidy) reports, "Two New England ski resorts, Mount Snow in Vermont and Attitash in New Hampshire, are set to be sold for $73.5 million." The Globe continues, "American Skiing Co. of Utah said yesterday it has entered into an accord to sell Mount Snow and Attitash to Peak Resorts Inc. of Missouri. … Included in the proposed sale of Mount Snow and Attitash are the commercial cores of the Grand Summit Hotels at both locations, said American Skiing, which added that the buyer will assume $2 million in debt and other liabilities." The Globe adds, "Saying that the sale is expected to close on or before April 30, American Skiing said it plans to use the proceeds to reduce existing debt and for working capital. … The deal will give Eureka, Mo.-based Peak Resorts its first major ski areas. That company operates half a dozen tiny ski areas in Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, and New Hampshire. … The sale will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah. … American Skiing already has agreed to sell Colorado's Steamboat Springs resort to Canadian resort operator Intrawest Corp. for $265 million. David Hirasawa, the company's investor-relations manager, said Steamboat is expected to change hands by March. … Both resorts sit partly on national forest land, and the sale will require the consent of the US Forest Service. Stockholder approval also will be required. … Hirasawa said the sale also is subject to an antitrust review by the US Justice Department."

The AP (2/17, Foy) reports, "The sale is set for the end of April and will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah. … American Skiing already has agreed to sell Colorado's Steamboat Springs resort to Canadian resort operator Intrawest Corp. for $265 million. Hirasawa said Steamboat is expected to change hands by March." The AP adds, "American Skiing has been investing heavily in The Canyons, its flagship 3,700-acre resort in Park City, which added terrain and lifts this winter. It also owns Killington and Pico, neighbors in central Vermont, and Maine's Sunday River and Sugarloaf/USA. … The company said Dover's Mount Snow, the closest major Vermont resort to the New York City metro area, is the fifth most popular eastern U.S. ski area. It has an 18-hole golf course."

IG Finds Interior Ethics Lapses Are Rarely Punished. The Boston Globe (2/17, Donnelly) reports, "Officials at the US Interior Department received free golf outings, dinners, hunting trips, and box seats at sporting events from companies they monitored, but were rarely punished for the ethics violations, other than being ordered to attend two-hour ethics courses, the department's inspector general told a House panel yesterday." The Globe continues, "Testifying before the House Natural Resources Committee, Earl E. Devaney said the ethical lapses were part of a department-wide culture 'replete with a lack of accountability.' … Devaney, who for seven years has been the independent overseer of a department that manages oil leases, national parks, and Native American affairs, has been in charge of numerous investigations inside the Interior Department, including one probe that has drawn intense scrutiny: What was behind the omission of royalty payments to the government in oil and gas contracts from 1998 to 1999. … He said the loss of the payments, which kick in when oil and gas prices reached certain levels, could cost taxpayers 'tens of billions of dollars' over the lifetime of the contracts. Six criminal investigations were now under way by the Justice Department relating to unethical behavior in the department, Devaney said." The Globe notes, "Asked why the Interior Department has had so many ethical and management problems, Devaney suggested it was simply greed. … 'Outside of the money at the Treasury Department, everything else [of value] that someone would want is at Interior -- oil, gas, mines, land, and water,' he said. 'It's been my experience that when a lot of money is at stake, bad people will show up eventually.' … Still, he told the committee that '99.9 percent' of department employees were dedicated and ethical and that Dirk A. Kempthorne , the current department secretary, has in the past year tried to tackle a multitude of serious problems."

California Seen As Model For States Seeking To Conserve Energy. The Washington Post (2/17, A1, Mufson, 690K) reports California "uses less energy per capita than any other state in the country, defying the international image of American energy gluttony. Since 1974, California has held its per capita energy consumption essentially constant, while energy use per person for the United States overall has jumped 50 percent. California has managed that feat through a mixture of mandates, regulations and high prices. The state has been able to cut greenhouse-gas emissions, keep utility companies happy and maintain economic growth. And in the wake of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change report on global warming, California serves as a model for other states seeking a similar path to energy reduction. Now California is pushing further in its effort to cut automobile pollution, spur use of solar energy and cap greenhouse gases."

NYTimes Praises Johanns Farm Bill Proposals. The New York Times (2/17, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "Mike Johanns, the secretary of agriculture, has unveiled his proposals for a new farm bill, which on the whole seems remarkably promising. Mr. Johanns seems to have little desire to protect entrenched subsidies and a very strong desire to improve the environment. The question is whether Congress will listen to him or to the lobbyists. … The bill also calls for $7.8 billion over 10 years to help protect the environment — which makes it the most generous conservation program the Bush administration has offered in the last six years."

LATimes Pleased By Stevens' Shift On CAFE Standards. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, 850K) editorializes, "Sen. Ted Stevens' resistance to fighting climate change is melting faster than his home state's glaciers. The senior senator from Alaska proposed a bill last month aimed at raising automotive fuel economy standards, in some ways higher than a competing bill backed by such traditional environmentalists as Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) Stevens' about-face on fuel economy (he voted against a bill two years ago similar to the one he just introduced) is welcome, even if many of his proposal's details aren't. Across-the-aisle initiatives like his are part of the reason this Congress stands a good chance of making the most meaningful improvements to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards since they were created during the last fuel crisis in the 1970s."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Played No Role In Neo-Nazi Rally Organized By Florida Informant. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Orlando Sentinel (2/17, Curtis) reported, "The FBI played no role in staging a neo-Nazi rally last year in Orlando, a statement released Friday says. Questions about the bureau's possible involvement were raised earlier this week when a hearing in federal court disclosed that a paid FBI informant and member of the National Socialist Movement organized the white supremacist march. 'In no way did the FBI initiate, organize, or sponsor the NSM rally,' the statement from the agency's Orlando office says." The Sentinel added, "Many agencies use informants, and in its statement Friday, the FBI explained some of the benefits. 'By the nature of its investigative mission, the FBI . . . must aggressively pursue intelligence avenues that bring it into contact with individuals and/or organizations in unsavory and/or illegal activity,' the statement says." However, the Sentinel noted, "The FBI has a long history of using informants and occasionally getting burned by them. One of the most notorious examples was James 'Whitey' Bulger, still on the 10 Most-Wanted List in connection with 18 murders."

Baseball's Bonds Chases Record While Legal Problems Mount. The New York Times (2/17, Chass) reports, "When Babe Ruth broke Roger Connor's career home run record, no one paid much attention. Connor had hit 138 home runs in the 1880s and 1890s, and Ruth passed him in 1921 with little or no fanfare. Much was made of Henry Aaron eclipsing Ruth's record in 1974, but even then probably the most notable thing that happened was that Aaron shoved a box of strawberries in a reporter's face. … But Barry Bonds's threat to Aaron's record of 755 couldn't generate more of a sideshow." The Times continues, "Bonds's pursuit of the record — he needs 22 home runs to break it — is entwined with the issue of steroids. Did he or did he not use them to slug 213 home runs in a four-season span from 2000 through 2003? Or did he just use a good grade of flaxseed oil?" The Times adds, "One act of the sideshow was written out of the script when Bonds signed his $15.8 million contract for the 2007 season the other day, 10 weeks after he and the Giants agreed to its terms and two weeks after he first signed it. … A second version of the contract became necessary when the commissioner's office struck an appearance clause from the original version. Bonds became upset by another clause in the contract after it leaked out. That clause says the Giants can void the contract if Bonds is indicted." The Times notes, "Any indictment would be put together by the United States attorney's office in San Francisco, which has a new interim head, Scott N. Schools, who replaced Kevin V. Ryan. Schools is a career federal prosecutor who previously served as a general counsel in the Justice Department. For now, he will run a San Francisco office that was apparently divided last summer over whether to push right then and there for an indictment of Bonds. … The term of the federal grand jury that was meeting at that point was about to expire, and lawyers involved in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid-distribution case say there was a split among assistant United States attorneys about seeking an indictment before that jury was dismissed. The lawyers said their understanding was that Ryan decided not to go forward."

IMMIGRATION:

Movement To Free Imprisoned Border Guards Gains Momentum. The Washington Post (2/17, A2, Fears, 690K) reports, "Early this week, the Bush administration urged angry conservatives to remain calm over the convictions of two former Border Patrol agents who shot an unarmed Mexican drug smuggler, but petitions for their release continued to flood the White House. It did not help that one the lawmen, Ignacio Ramos, was attacked by Latino gang members in his cell…and beaten bloody. Days after prison officials confirmed the beating on Feb. 8, Department of Homeland Security officials admitted that an inspector general's report erroneously quoted Border Patrol agents as saying Ramos and his partner, Jose Compean, intended to kill Mexicans." Rep. Tom Tancredo "visited Ramos in prison and told him of the movement against his incarceration." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher "threatened to call for impeachment proceedings against President Bush if the agents were harmed in prison." Sen. Dianne Feinstein "promised to look into the matter."

Chertoff Touts Guest Worker Program In Mexico. The New York Times (2/17, A8, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "On his first official visit to Mexico, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he considered an expanded guest-worker program for Mexican migrants as key to stopping terrorists and criminals from slipping into the United States. 'Every time a Border Patrol officer is transporting a load of future housekeepers and landscapers to some place to be returned, he's not looking for drug dealers or drug loads,' Mr. Chertoff said after two days of meetings with Mexico's top security officials."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Small Business Tax Breaks As Part Of Minimum Wage Deal. The Washington Post (2/17, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports the House "overwhelmingly approved a modest package of tax breaks for restaurants and small businesses, moving Congress one step closer to approving the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nearly a decade. On a vote of 360 to 45, the House agreed to extend and expand credits and deductions to save taxpayers $1.3 billion over 10 years. It would adjust the tax code to increase collections by a similar amount. The measure would also guarantee that restaurant owners could keep a tax credit worth an estimated $500 million over 10 years. The measure now moves to the Senate, which passed a far more generous $8.3 billion tax package this month under pressure from Republicans who refused to support a higher minimum wage unless it included tax relief for small businesses."

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A3, Lueck, 2.04M) reports Sen. Charles Grassley "called the House package 'puny.' There is common ground on the substance of some breaks . Both the House and Senate bills would extend a credit for businesses that employ disadvantaged workers and a deduction for small companies' equipment expenses. 'I know there are differences between the bills, but I'm confident they'll be worked out,' said Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. The bill would raise the minimum wage by $2.10 an hour -- from $5.15 to $7.25 -- over two years."

The New York Times (2/17, A10, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "Lawmakers are not expected to reconcile the difference until after their 'Presidents' Day District Work Period' next week, and it remains unclear how difficult those negotiations will be. Further muddying the outlook is a split between small-business groups and big-business groups over which bill to support. 'I would not say we're surprised at the delay,' said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan. 'But I would say we are chagrined.' Few lawmakers doubt that Congress will eventually approve the higher minimum wage, which was last raised 10 years ago. The battle is over how much business groups and Republicans can demand in return."

The Washington Times/AP (2/17) reports, "Groups representing small businesses, such as the National Federation of Independent Business, prefer the larger Senate bill. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce supports the House bill because it objects to the Senate's revenue provisions, particularly the plan to eliminate deductions for payments in lawsuits."

Two Moles Removed From Bush's Left Temple. The Washington Post/AP (2/17, A11) reports President Bush "had two moles removed from his left temple yesterday. His doctors say they expect tests on the skin growths to show that they are noncancerous. The five-minute procedure, called a shave biopsy, was performed in the White House office of Bush's official physician, Richard J. Tubb. Stephen Krivda, a dermatologist from Walter Reed Army Medical Center, performed the procedure, for which only a local anesthetic was required." ABC World News (2/16, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M), the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 8, Couric, 7.66M), and NBC Nightly News (2/16, Williams, 9.87M) all ran brief items on the procedure.

Cheney Departing For Asia With Many Worries But Also Bush's Confidence. Two reports on Vice President Cheney's trip to Asia this week cast Cheney's role and influence in starkly different terms. Under the headline "Controversy Likely To Follow Cheney To Asia," the Los Angeles Times (2/17, Reynolds, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports says with Cheney "set to depart Monday for a weeklong trip to Asia," many in Washington "are wondering whether he might be grateful for an excuse to high-tail it out of town. The past few weeks have not been kind to the vice president -- or at least to his public image."

But the Chicago Tribune (2/17, Silva, 617K) headlines its story "Cheney Tours With Bush's Confidence," and while, like the Times piece, it recounts Cheney's recent woes, the story says Cheney "has not lost his influence with President Bush, who often has counted on his sharp-tongued No. 2 to launch the most searing offensives against political and administration critics. And, since the retirement of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and a recasting of the administration, Bush has counted even more on the hardest of his hard-liners to hold the White House line." With the Bush Administration now "besieged by congressional critics of the war in Iraq yet boasting of sudden progress in a nuclear standoff with North Korea, Cheney will make a weeklong tour of the Pacific. He will offer a nod of thanks to Bush's supporters in the 'war on terror,' but also pointed reminders of the risks still posed by powers intent on undermining Western democracy."

Low Judicial Pay Said To Discourage Top Candidates. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/17, A15, 1.16M) University of Wisconsin law professor Anne Althouse writes, "It's hard to ask for a raise, especially when you're a judge. Look at poor Justice Anthony Kennedy supplicating before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Valentine's Day. With stilted locutions — 'it's frankly most awkward for me' — he staked out pedantic points about the constitutional scheme of separation of powers, and lumbered toward a conclusion that federal judges need to make more money. … If the pay is low, the judges will be the kind of people who don't care that much about money. They might be monkish scholars, or they might be ideologues who see in the law whatever it is they think is good for us. … Low judicial pay should trouble us not because the judges will somehow lack 'excellence.' It should trouble us because the law will be articulated by ideologues and recluses."

Pelosi Gives Jefferson Seat On Homeland Security Panel. The Washington Post (2/17, A9, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, "who yanked embattled Rep. William J. Jefferson off a powerful tax committee last year, has decided to put him on the Homeland Security panel, aides to the Louisiana Democrat confirmed yesterday. The move infuriated some Republicans, who accuse him of being a potential security risk. Jefferson has been the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation related to a telecommunications deal in Africa."

Bill Giving FDA Power To Regulate Tobacco Garners Bipartisan Support. The Washington Post (2/17, A8, Lee, 690K) reports, "After years of falling short, advocates of requiring the Food and Drug Administration to regulate tobacco are again waging that fight in Congress -- and this time, they say, the odds are in their favor. … A bipartisan group of lawmakers introduced legislation last week to grant the FDA authority over the manufacturing, marketing and sale of tobacco products, including the power to restrict advertising, require stronger warning labels, and regulate the amount of nicotine and other ingredients. The agency would not be able to ban tobacco." The Post notes the FDA "claimed the authority to regulate tobacco in the mid-1990s…but the effort was challenged by tobacco companies and overturned by the Supreme Court in 2000. What followed were several attempts to pass legislation in Congress, many of which attracted broad-based support -- including from cigarette maker Philip Morris USA. But invariably the bills hit an impasse and died. … 'This is the year when we can pass meaningful legislation,' said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, the lead GOP sponsor in the House, whose father died of emphysema. Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the top Republican sponsor in the Senate, said 54 percent of smokers take up the habit before age 18. The legislation 'is the best way to address the public health concerns and the marketing concerns we have about children being targeted and addicted to a drug like nicotine,' he said."

GSA Responds To Waxman Inquiry Regarding Noncompetitive Contract. The Washington Post (2/17, A4, Higham, O'Harrow, 690K) reports the U.S. General Services Administration "has responded to a congressional inquiry by saying its chief, Lurita Alexis Doan, did nothing improper last summer when she tried to arrange for a study by a company run by a woman with whom she had a 'close professional relationship.' In a Feb. 2 response to Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the agency said Doan was trying to promote diversity when she signed a 'service order' for the $20,000 project. That July 25 document was intended to authorize a company, Diversity Best Practices, run by Edie Fraser, to write a 24-page report and analysis concerning the GSA's use of businesses owned by minorities or women." GSA Associate Administrator Kevin Messner "rejected 'the implication that her intentions were improper' and said the project was stopped before any money changed hands."

VA Secretary Shuts Down Research Centers After Loss Of Hard Drive. The AP (2/16, Evans) reports Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson "has suspended activities at seven specialized research centers across the country after an unprotected computer hard drive disappeared from one of the facilities in Alabama last month. In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, Nicholson called the department's latest data breach 'tragic' and ordered the VA's Research Enhancement Award Programs to shut down until they are certified as meeting security standards." The New York Times/AP (2/17, A11) carried an abbreviated version of this story.

WSJournal Notes Portman's Guidance On Formerly Earmarked Projects. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A8, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "On Thursday, White House budget director Rob Portman issued little-noticed guidance to all federal departments and agencies that no Congressional requests for spending should be accommodated unless they are 'specifically identified in statutory text' -- which is to say, the law. This may sound like it ought to be regular practice, but it's a revolution in the Beltway. That's because, in order to dodge the legislative earmark limits…Members have been speed-dialing executive branch officials and asking them to fund their specific earmark requests out of agency budgets even though they were purged from the larger budget bill. This Congressional lobbying can be hard for the average federal bureaucrat to refuse, since he doesn't want to offend those on Capitol Hill who control his budget. Mr. Portman's directive is intended to stiffen these backbones against such Congressional extortion."

OTHER NEWS:

Monthly Housing Starts Fall To Lowest Level In A Decade. ABC World News (2/16, story 8, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The struggling housing market has just turned in another weak showing. New home construction plunged more than 14% last month, to the lowest level in 10 years. Bad weather gets some of the blame. But permits for future construction were also down in January." The CBS Evening News (2/16, story 3, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) also said the "housing market is in a slump. Just today, the government reported that builders were putting up new homes last month at the slowest pace in nearly ten years. And with demand for homes down, prices are falling as well." NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 8, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the decline in housing starts.

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, Bater, Blackstone, 2.04M) puts the story on its front page, saying "builders slashed construction of new homes last month to the lowest level in nearly a decade, a move that underscores the severity of the sector's slump and signals it will likely continue to be a drag on the economy at least through midyear." The Washington Post (2/17, D2, Schneider, 690K) says housing starts fell to "the slowest annual rate since the late 1990s." The New York Times (2/17, C3, Peters, 1.16M) says economists "seemed to agree that most of the drop-off in residential construction indicated that builders were pulling back from a market that was oversaturated with unsold homes and short on buyers." The New York Times (2/17, A10, Robbins, 1.16M) also runs a feature on the housing situation in Montana, where a boom has had the reverse effect, creating a shortage.

NYTimes Says Lenders, Regulators Must Step In. The New York Times (2/17, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "There is no sugarcoating the latest news on the United States housing market. The slump in home prices from the end of 2005 to the end of 2006 was the biggest year-over-year drop since the National Association of Realtors started keeping track in 1982. There are no reasons to believe that's the worst of it. … The bust will slow job growth this year in construction and related industries and with it, consumer spending. The severity of these economic side effects will depend on the strength of the overall job market and the stability of interest rates -- both of which are anybody's guess. Squarely in harm's way, however, are low- and middle-income homeowners. … Lenders and regulators should prepare to do all they can to help."

Stocks Essentially Unchanged Friday. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, Ossinger, 2.04M) reports stocks "took a breather after three straight days of gains, lagging most of the day, but pulled a quick move higher in the last hour to virtually break even." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "rose 2.56 to 12767.57, hitting a record for a third straight day with its late move into the black. The S&P 500 lost 1.27 to 1455.54," while the Nasdaq "was off 0.79 to 2496.31." NBC Nightly News (2/16, story 6, :10, Williams, 9.87M) briefly reported the numbers. In addition, the Wall Street Journal (2/17, B4, Norman, 2.04M) says treasury-bond markets "chalked up gains Friday."

Crude Oil Climbs Above $59. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, B4, Farivar, 2.04M) reports crude oil futures "rallied 2.4% and climbed above $59 after the government warned about more militant attacks in Nigeria" and the OPEC secretary-general said producers "were showing compliance with the group's new oil-production target." The March crude-futures contract "jumped $1.40 to $59.39 a barrel" in New York.

LATimes Says Bernanke Compares Favorably To Greenspan. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill this week was so clear and succinct — and bullish — that investors may soon forget about his predecessor, Alan Greenspan. Bernanke's message that the economy is enjoying healthy growth, low unemployment and little inflation soothed financial markets, but it was his forthright, substantive answers that awed members of the Senate and House committees that oversee the nation's central bank. Indeed, Bernanke, who's been on the job just over a year, performed better than he should have, politely answering too many questions."

McCain Faces Problems With Home State GOP. A front-page New York Times (2/17, Steinhauer, 1.16M) story headlined "Back At Home, McCain Annoys The G.O.P. Right" looks at what Arizona Republicans think about Sen. John McCain. The Maricopa County Republican Committee chairman "has in his possession a bright yellow button with a black line slashed through the name McCain," just one sign of the "vocal slice of the state's most conservative Republicans, reflecting concerns about Mr. McCain held by some conservatives nationwide," who "are agitating against him in a way that they hope might throw off his incipient presidential campaign." McCain's critics "now hold leadership positions in Maricopa County, the state's most Republican enclave and biggest media market, which includes Phoenix. Their passion about the immigration issue, their flirtations with other candidates and their persistent harping underscore the skepticism about Mr. McCain that already exists among many hard-line conservatives here and around the nation."

McCain To Discuss Abstinence In South Carolina. The AP (2/16, Davenport) reports McCain will be in South Carolina Sunday night to address "about 1,500 middle and high school students about abstaining from premarital sex. Abstinence and abortion loom large as issues in this first-in-the-South primary state in the heart of the Bible Belt." McCain "is courting Christian conservatives in his bid for the GOP nomination."

Giuliani Raises Funds In Richmond. Richmond's WDBJ7.com (2/16) reports Rudy Giuliani "met with some of Virginia's Republican Party before heading to a Richmond dinner designed to fatten his war chest. … As someone who's seen first hand what terrorist are capable of on American soil, Giuliani says now is no time for the U.S. to show weakness in the Middle East."

Romney Discusses 1992 Primary Vote For Democrat Tsongas. ABCNews.com (2/16, Greenberger) reports Mitt Romney "offered a new explanation today for why he supported a Democrat in 1992." Romney, "then a registered independent, voted for former Sen. Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Democratic presidential primary. He told ABC's George Stephanopoulos, in an interview that will air Sunday on 'This Week,' that his vote was meant as a tactical maneuver aimed at finding the weakest opponent for incumbent President George H.W. Bush." However, "12 years ago, the Boston Globe reported that Romney was giving a different explanation for his vote for Tsongas. 'Romney confirmed he voted for former U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas in the state's 1992 Democratic presidential primary, saying he did so both because Tsongas was from Massachusetts and because he favored his ideas over those of Bill Clinton,' the Boston Globe's Scot Lehigh and Frank Phillips wrote on Feb. 3, 1994. 'He added he had been sure the G.O.P. would renominate George Bush, for whom he voted in the fall election.'"

Voters Urged To Look Beyond Romney's Mormonism. In the Washington Post (2/17, A31, 690K), Stephen Stromberg writes that while Gov. George Romney's 1968 presidential campaign "fizzled," what "did not ruin" his "aspirations was his faith. Like his son Mitt, George Romney was a devout Mormon. Religion, as the truism goes, is far more influential in American politics today than it was in the 1960s." But a "candidate's faith, like that of an L.A. high school student or anyone else is ultimately a complex and personal phenomenon, even in the context of a highly centralized religious organization. … No one but Romney can know how his beliefs might affect his judgment. Instead of focusing on his faith, it would be much more worthwhile for voters to judge Mitt Romney on his evolving political agenda -- as Republicans did when George Romney ran in 1967."

Arkansas Ethics Panel Dismisses Complaint Against Huckabee. The AP (2/16, Davenport) reports, "Arkansas' ethics panel dismissed a complaint Friday against former Gov. Mike Huckabee over the presidential candidate's destruction of computer hard drives from his office. By a 3-0 vote, the commission voted to dismiss the complaint filed last month against Huckabee." Huckabee "has defended the destruction of the drives, saying it was done to protect sensitive information such as employees' or constituents' Social Security numbers and credit card information."

Obama Making Headway With Hollywood, Silicon Valley Players. The Wall Street Journal (2/17, A2, Harwood, 2.04M) reports, "Campaign debates often turn on values. Next week, some important political players in Hollywood and Silicon Valley will demonstrate theirs: they like what's hip, new, attractive and future-oriented. In the 1990s, that was Bill Clinton's breakthrough baby boomer presidency. In 2007, it's Barack Obama's multiracial, post-boomer candidacy. That is why three luminous Hollywood names -- the Dreamworks trio of Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen -- are hosting an Obama fund-raiser in Los Angeles Tuesday. And it's why one of Mr. Obama's guides through Silicon Valley is Wade Randlett, an early Democratic force there through the TechNet advocacy group."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/17, Vargas, 690K) reports on the role Facebook.com is having in recruiting young volunteers and supporters for presidential campaigns. The piece focuses largely on Obama.

Obama Makes First South Carolina Visit. Gannett (2/17, Barnett) reports Obama "made his first campaign stop Friday in South Carolina, delivering a rousing can-do message to an enthusiastic crowd of 3,000 at Columbia's convention center." Obama "told supporters he doesn't believe those who say a black man can't be elected. 'Twenty years ago, nobody would have believed this crowd in South Carolina,' he said of the racially mixed group."

Edwards Makes Pitch To Prospective Silicon Valley Donors. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/17, B2, Marinucci, 384K) reports John Edwards, "in an informal living room discussion this week with about 150 Silicon Valley insiders, said the Bush administration has failed America by demonstrating 'enormous incompetence' at home in areas such as responding to Hurricane Katrina and abroad in Iraq." His "shirtsleeves appeal during an intimate evening of dinner and conversation was delivered in the Woodside home of influential venture capitalist Andy Rappaport and his wife, Deborah."

Virginia Democratic Chairman Backing Edwards. The AP (2/16, Davenport) reports Virginia Democratic Party Chairman C. Richard Cranwell will back Edwards, making the announcement "two days after officials with close ties" to Gov. Tim Kaine said the governor will back Sen. Barack Obama. Cranwell said, "This indicates that Virginia is in play for the presidential sweepstakes for the first time in a long time."

Richardson Says New Hampshire Must Be "Breakthrough State For Me." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/17, DiStaso) reports Gov. Bill Richardson "says he will focus more time, staff and resources to New Hampshire than to any other early primary or caucus state." Richardson "said that as a Westerner, he 'must do well' in Nevada, where the Democratic National Committee has scheduled a new caucus after Iowa's traditional lead-off event but before the New Hampshire primary. But, he said, 'for me, New Hampshire is going to be my main state to concentrate on, staff-wise, resources. I consider this a breakthrough state for me.'" The AP (2/16, Wang) says Richardson campaigned in New Hampshire "after raising $2 million at a fundraiser in New Mexico on Thursday. The total puts him in good standing in the Democratic race although he isn't as well known as some of his rivals."

Richardson Says Congress Should "Stop Voting On Resolutions That Mean Nothing." In another report, the New Hampshire Union Leader (2/17, DiStaso) says Richardson also said Congress "should stop focusing on nonbinding resolutions and should vote instead on whether to take back from President Bush its 2002 authorization for the U.S. participation in the war in Iraq. … Richardson said lawmakers 'should stop voting on resolutions that mean nothing.'"

Biden Says He Is Only Democratic Contender With An Iraq Plan. The AP (2/16, Jackson) reports Sen. Joseph Bide, in Iowa Friday, said he is "the only Democratic presidential candidate who has a plan for Iraq, dismissing the ideas of other contenders as tactics that would leave the Middle East in peril." Biden said, "They have tactics, not a plan. What are they going to do, stop the civil war? ... There's a lot of people who have ideas about how to get out, but not many ideas about how to leave something more stable behind."

Cornyn's Support For Bush Said To Leave Him Potentially Vulnerable. The Washington Post (2/17, A5, Murray, 690K) reports, "In a sea of Republican doubt," Sen. John Cornyn "is all about certainty. He is certain that President Bush's decision to send more troops into battle is the right move. He is certain that Democratic war thinking is wrong. Despite the growing misgivings of so many GOP lawmakers, Cornyn is certain that the United States should stay in Iraq until the job is done. The freshman senator is such a throwback to the early days of GOP fealty to Bush that his Senate Web site includes a 'compassionate conservatism' link." According to the Post, Cornyn "is a favorite at the White House, but his unalloyed defense of Bush's Iraq policies have some back home wondering whether he has gone too far. … The lack of daylight between Bush and Cornyn, particularly over the war, has raised a few eyebrows among Democrats and within Texas political circles." The Texas Blue, a "progressive" Web site, "raised the question of Cornyn's potential vulnerability. The evidence: two years of monthly tracking polls that showed Cornyn's job approval rating barely breaking 45 percent and a random sample of Texas residents conducted in December that detected a slight shift in favor toward Democrats."

California Dispenses $45 Million In Stem Cell Research Grants. The New York Times/AP (2/17, A10) reports, "California's stem cell agency gave out nearly $45 million in research grants to about 20 state universities and nonprofit research laboratories on Friday, far exceeding the federal government's annual outlays for stem cell work." The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Engel, 850K) reports, "The funding is a fraction of the decade-long, $300-million-a-year juggernaut voters approved under 2004's Proposition 71, the Stem Cell Research and Cures Act. But it signaled the determination of the voter-created California Institute for Regenerative Medicine to make the state a player in the nascent field even as the bonds remain frozen by litigation. 'We can't afford to wait when it comes to advancing a life-saving science,' Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Friday at a news conference. To tide the state over during the lawsuits, Schwarzenegger arranged the $150-million state loan last summer on the day that President Bush vetoed legislation aimed at loosening federal funding restrictions."

Fox News Channel To Premiere Conservative "Daily Show" Rival. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Miller, 850K) reports, "Intended by its conservative creators as a counterbalance to 'The Daily Show' and 'The Colbert Report' on Comedy Central, 'The 1/2 -Hour News Hour' premieres Sunday" on the Fox News Channel "and will satirize current events and pop culture from a distinctly right of center viewpoint. Much like the 24-hour news channel itself, the show is out to fill a void in the marketplace, which the show's creators perceive as decidedly liberal." The Politico (2/16, Andrews) reports, "Produced by Joel Surnow, the brains behind Fox's hit '24,' 'The Half-Hour News Hour' is a mock news satire (but for conservatives) that will hopefully make everyone forget about Comedy Central's 'The Daily Show.' Washington Post (2/17, C1, 690K) reviewer Tom Shales says the show "definitely has its moments," and the New York Times (2/17, Stanley, 1.16M) also has a review.

Bush Telephones Abdullah, Olmert Ahead Of Rice's Middle East Mission. AFP (2/17) notes a White House announcement that President Bush "discussed the situation in the Middle East with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah." Those "telephone talks came just before" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "headed to the Middle East to host a rare summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders that she hopes will break new ground in reviving peace negotiations frozen for nearly seven years." The statement said that "Monday's meeting with Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas and Olmert was the focus of Bush's talks with" Olmert. Bush "also 'discussed the situation in Iraq and developments in Israeli-Palestinian affairs' with the Saudi king."

The Financial Times (2/17, Morris) says "officials have set the bar so low" for Rice's effort "that even a modest step towards a revival of the moribund peace process is likely to be spun as a giant leap." The Administration, "bogged down in Iraq and assailed in Congress, badly wants to hear some good news from the Middle East. The timing, however, could hardly be worse." Abbas' "embrace of Hamas, the Islamist group, has raised questions of the Palestinian Authority president's suitability as a peace partner, while a domestic crisis of confidence in [Olmert] has cast doubt on his ability to break the deadlock."

Bush Budget Would Trim Andean Counterdrug Program. The Washington Times (2/17, Arostegui, 88K) reports President Bush's FY08 budget request "calls for deep cuts in the leading U.S. program to fight drug trafficking in the Andean region, amid growing clashes over drug policy between Washington and leftist governments in Venezuela and Bolivia. The cuts to the Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI) affect every country in the region except Colombia." The proposed funding levels "have been criticized by governments in the area, as well as by U.S. counternarcotics officials and some lawmakers on Capitol Hill." The Times says the request for $442.8 million for ACI is "down 23 percent from the estimated spending for the current fiscal year and off nearly 40 percent from $727.2 million in fiscal 2006."

Colombian President's Domestic "Scandals" Said To Strain US Support. The Washington Post (2/17, A28, Forero, 690K) notes the "widening scandal" facing Colombian President Alvaro Uribe and his allies "raises skepticism" within Congress of aid programs to Bogota. Noting Thursday's arrest of four senators including the foreign minister's brother, the Post notes, "Officials in Washington said Uribe's support for the foreign minister would not help the Colombian government in its negotiations with U.S. lawmakers." Rep. Sander Levin "said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia." The Post adds, "Though lawmakers in Washington remain intensely focused on Iraq, it is not lost on policymakers that Colombia remains the biggest recipient of U.S. assistance outside of the Middle East and Afghanistan." Notably, "for Uribe, the scandal couldn't have come at a worse moment." While the "Bush administration has reiterated its support for Uribe," the "latest disclosures have drawn heated criticism, from organizations such as Human Rights Watch and from some of Capitol Hill's more influential shapers of U.S. policy in Latin America, including" Senate Appropriations Foreign Operations Subcommittee Chairman Patrick Leahy.

Battling Inflation, Shortages, Chavez Cracks Down Price Control Violators. The New York Times (2/17, A3, Romero, 1.16M) reports, "Faced with an accelerating inflation rate and shortages of basic foods like beef, chicken and milk, President Hugo Chávez has threatened to jail grocery store owners and nationalize their businesses if they violate the country's expanding price controls." Some experts believe those "measures…are likely to backfire and generate even more acute shortages and higher prices for consumers." Chavez "seemed unfazed by criticism of his policies. Appearing live on national television, he called for the creation of 'committees of social control,' essentially groups of his political supporters whose purpose would be to report on farmers, ranchers, supermarket owners and street vendors who circumvent the state's effort to control food prices." Despite 10 percent economic expansion in 2006, "economists who have worked with Mr. Chávez's government say that soaring public spending is overheating Venezuela's economy, generating imbalances in the distribution of products from sugar to basic construction materials like wallboard."

Economic Factors Conspire To Slow Mexican Growth. Under the front-page headline, "Mexico's Economy Loses Steam," the Los Angeles Times (2/17, Dickerson, 850K) reports the Mexican economy "slowed in the last three months of 2006, and that could have consequences in the United States: Tough times in Mexico typically fuel immigration north of the border." The "deceleration was blamed largely on a sluggish factory sector and a slowdown in exports to Mexico's principal customer, the United States." The year-long GDP growth of 4.8% was "the strongest since 2000," as "high oil prices pumped record tax revenue into government coffers" and Mexico "had a banner year in job creation." However, the Times says "the economy of the United States, Mexico's biggest trading partner, is weakening. Mexico's inflation has been rising, its oil production is slipping, and the nation's bellwether auto sector has hit a speed bump."

Prominent Chinese AIDS Doctor To Attend Washington Ceremony. The New York Times (2/17, A4, Yardley, 1.16M) notes Beijing "gave in to international pressure on Friday and agreed to release a prominent AIDS doctor from house arrest so she can attend an awards ceremony in Washington next month." Gao Yaojie, who has been under house arrest since the first of the month, will be honored by Vital Voices Global Partnership. Sen. Hillary Clinton, "an honorary co-chairwoman of Vital Voices, announced China's decision on Friday after receiving the news from the Chinese ambassador in Washington." Gao "is famously outspoken, and although China has taken a more open approach toward AIDS in recent years, officials were apparently worried she might say something provocative or embarrassing in Washington."

NATO Calls Missile Defense Worries Unfounded. The New York Times (2/17, A8, Dempsey,

1.16M) reports in a five-sentence brief, "Gen. John Craddock of the United States Army, who recently took over as the NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, said Russia had nothing to fear from a planned antimissile system that the United States wants to install in Poland and the Czech Republic. 'It's been clearly stated what the U.S. intention is," he said, "and that is to provide defense against missiles from a rogue nation.' Although he did not name any country, the antimissile site would be designed to stop attacks by Iran against the United States and its European allies."

Turkish Court Sentences 2003 Istanbul Bombers. The New York Times (2/17, A7, Arsu, 1.16M) reports a Turkish court "sentenced seven Muslim men to life in prison and several dozen other people to lesser terms for their involvement in the deadly bombings of Jewish and British sites [in Istanbul] in 2003." Those car "bombings killed more than 60 people and wounded hundreds more." The "life sentences were given to those who were determined to have been masterminds of the plot. Six of the seven denied any links with Al Qaeda and sought acquittal. The judge sentenced 41 other defendants to prison terms ranging from 3 to 18 years on a variety of charges, while 26 defendants were acquitted." BBC.com (2/16) adds the court "sentenced seven people to life in prison for the 2003 Istanbul bombings which killed 58 people including the UK consul-general."

French Judge Implicates Rwandan President In Assassination That Sparked Genocide. A 2,000-word piece on the front page of the Los Angeles Times (2/17, Rotella, 850K) discusses French Magistrate Jean-Louis Bruguiere's controversial report implicating Rwandan President Paul Kagame in the 1994 assassination for former President Juvenal Habyarimana and his Burundian counterpart. His "investigation includes allegations that U.S. and U.N. officials helped quash earlier inquiries to protect Kagame, an ally of the United States. The French judge's report, which was obtained by The Times, has caused an uproar in Africa and Europe, and led Kagame's government to break off relations with France." While Bruguiere and his colleagues "do not claim that the assassination was the sole cause of the genocide," he "alleges that Kagame sacrificed fellow Tutsis in a brutal 'political calculation' aimed at toppling the Hutu-dominated government." Kagame "adheres to the contrasting theory that extremist Hutus angry about the peace deal with the Tutsis killed Habyarimana." Notably, "former U.N. investigators who initially looked into the assassination told Bruguiere that their bosses had blocked efforts to pursue leads implicating Kagame."

UN's Ban Says Split Peacekeeping Department Would Improve Operations. The Financial Times (2/17, Turner) notes UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "warned that an unprecedented global surge in UN peacekeeping operations had left its leadership 'impossibly overstretched' and unable to cope without serious reform." The Times calls Ban's plan "an ambitious restructuring proposal," and says he seeks "to split the peacekeeping department in two by creating a new department for field support. This would also take in parts of the UN that deal with personnel management and recruitment, and free peacekeeping operations officials to focus on strategy." The Times warns that Ban "faces a deep reluctance by governments to cede any authority to UN bureaucracy. After a troubled first month, he was beset by complaints from rich and poor countries alike that he was not consulting enough and that his team did not appear to understand how the UN worked."

Administration backed by appellate court on detainee issue

Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Guantanamo Bay detainees may not challenge their detention in U.S. courts, a federal appeals court said Tuesday in a ruling upholding a key provision in President Bush's anti-terrorism law.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit ruled 2-1 that civilian courts no longer have the authority to consider whether the military is illegally holding foreigners.

Octavian Harseu is the witness requested by journalist Ovidiu Ohanesian, one of the three Romanians kidnapped in Iraq in 2005, in the terrorism file accusing Mohammad Munaf. The Bucharest Court of Appeals decided Harseu must be brought to Romania. The Romanian Ministry of Justice and the Romanian Embassy will try to bring him from Iraq.

The court analyzed Tuesday the CDs brought as evidence by Ohanesian, but the footage was not clear.

US man again critical of Hicks

US ambassador Robert McCallum has hit out at supporters he says are painting an unduly sympathetic portrait of David Hicks, a man who left his children behind when he went to train with militants in the Middle East.

Mr McCallum, who last week described Guantanamo Bay inmates like Hicks as ruthless fanatics who would kill in the blink of an eye, defended his right to speak about the detainees .

``I'm always surprised that those who view things from a perspective that is favourable to Mr Hicks are allowed to talk about whatever they care to and make whatever allegations they care to," he said.

But Mr McCallum said when he spoke on behalf of the many American citizens traumatised by the September\l "l" 11\l "l" terrorist attacks it was viewed as prejudicial.

"(We are told) we cannot talk about anything because it might prejudice the case," he said.

Treasurer Peter Costello weighed into the debate yesterday when he claimed that Hicks could easily have killed Australian soldiers if he hadn't been caught by coalition forces.

Whistle-blower lawsuit settled

By DAVID HOLDEN Times Staff Writer

County averts trial, verdict over defunct jobs program

The Madison County Commission approved an out-of-court settlement Friday of a federal whistle-blower lawsuit that could save more than $1.3 million in taxpayers' money.

Five of the six commissioners voted to pay $53,750 as the county's part of a $110,000 settlement to end litigation that stemmed from the defunct Working Connection welfare-to-work program.

Tommie Lockhart of Huntsville, who sued in October 2001 under the federal False Claims Act, will receive 30 percent of the settlement. The government will receive a 70 percent share after payment of $45,000 to Lockhart's attorney, Kerri Riley, for legal fees.

Lockhart was executive director of the program from December 1999 to August 2000.

Commissioner Faye Dyer was absent Friday, and Commission Chairman Mike Gillespie does not vote unless there is a tie.

The Working Connection program, run out of former Commissioner Prince Preyer's District 6 office, was created in 1999 with a $4.7 million grant from the U.S. Department of Labor. The program was designed to help find jobs for parents who didn't have custody of their children, to help those parents pay child support.

The county used about $2.2 million of the grant but forfeited the remaining $2.5 million when the program closed in July 2002. The Labor Department determined that the program was being mismanaged and that not enough people were receiving help.

Madison County Attorney Julian Butler said Friday that the settlement is a good business decision. The county could have had to pay much more if the case went to trial in federal court. A trial was scheduled for March 19 before U.S. District Judge L. Scott Coogler.

The county and its insurance provider, St. Paul Travelers Insurance Co., will each pay $53,750. Abdul Jalloh and Sylvanus Ogburia, who both provided services for and received payments from the Working Connection program, will pay a combined $2,500.

Lockhart sued the commission under the federal whistle-blower law. The whistle-blower lawsuit was a sealed document in the federal court, and the commission did not learn that it was filed by Lockhart until July 2005, Butler said.

The county reached an out-of-court settlement with Lockhart, who claimed in an August 2001 lawsuit that he was wrongly fired. Lockhart alleged that he lost his $42,300-a-year job as head of Working Connection in 2000 because he accused Preyer of mis-spending the grant money.

Two federal audits of the program determined that the county owed federal agencies a total of $369,573. The commission paid the government $153,113 to cover the disputed sums.

If the county had chosen to go to court in the whistle-blower litigation and lost, it could be ordered to pay three times the original disputed amount of $369,573 identified by the audits, Butler said. The county also could be required to pay $10,000 in civil penalties for each of 28 possible false claims allegedly submitted for payment under the welfare-to-work program, he said. The county's total exposure would be $1.54 million.

The $153,113 the county has already paid to settle the audits would be subtracted from the $1.54 million, leaving a balance of $1.3 million.

Commissioner Bob Harrison, who replaced Preyer as the District 6 representative, called the handling of the Working Connection program a dereliction of duty and irresponsibility that hampers the county's ability to win similar federal grants.

"Ultimately, the only people hurt were those who live in District 6," he said.

District 4 Commissioner Dale Strong asked if it is possible to recoup the money the county had paid to settle the issue by suing Preyer, Jalloh and Ogburia. "If you look at the record," he said, "I voted to close the program long before it was closed."

Harrison asked the commission to consider Strong's question at a later date.

FBI raids hospital operator's office

By Michael Barnett

EDINBURG — FBI agents raided the Edinburg corporate offices of South Texas Health System on Friday in what company officials said was an investigation into possible Medicare and Medicaid fraud.

For several hours Friday morning, FBI agents took boxes of documents from the building at 1400 W. Trenton Road and placed them in a U-Haul truck.

Agents and other federal officials would not comment on the raid, saying they would make some information public in the coming days.

In a statement, Universal Health Services Inc., which operates South Texas Health System, said the raid was connected to an ongoing criminal investigation under the federal False Claims Act.

The investigation centers on Medicare and Medicaid rules regarding doctor employment and referrals, according to the statement. Investigators are examining what happened during a nearly six-year period ending in Nov. 21, 2005, when South Texas first received a federal subpoena

Medicaid and Medicare fraud often occurs when health care providers bill for fake patients or charge the government for services they did not render.

In several cases in the Rio Grande Valley, health-care providers have been accused of committing fraud without the knowledge of their bosses.

In December, mental health counselor Sigifredo Flores was accused of defrauding Medicaid of at least $20,000; Flores' employers, meanwhile, did not know about his alleged transactions.

In Cameron County, two men face charges that they embezzled between $20,000 and $100,000 from Medicaid while practicing medicine without licenses at a clinic.

Universal Health Services first disclosed the federal investigation into possible fraud in a report it filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission in March 2006. At the time, South Texas officials told The Monitor that they were unsure what or whom the government was targeting.

"We've asked the question whether we're a target and so on and have been told no," said Dan McLean, who was South Texas' CEO when the subpoena was served. "They play these things pretty close to the vest while they do their investigations."

Federal agents were similarly tight-lipped Friday as they went in and out of the medical company's building behind Edinburg Regional Medical Center off Trenton Road.

The building houses the CEO's office and the company's business, marketing and human resources departments, said Dalinda Guillen, spokeswoman for South Texas Health System.

Some of the employees of those departments were sent home Friday because the office was closed for the day. The raid did not interrupt hospital operations.

South Texas Health Systems also runs McAllen Medical Center, McAllen Heart Hospital and Edinburg Children's Hospital.

Judge drops suit naming MH hospital

JOANNE BRATTON
Bulletin Staff Writer

A U.S. District Court judge dismissed a claim accusing a company that operated a rehabilitation unit at a Baxter County hospital of submitting false Medicare claims from 1999 to 2000.

The lawsuit was filed in August 2000 by Dr. Gregory Kersulis and Jimmie Wilson against RehabCare Group Inc. and Baxter County Regional Hospital, now Baxter Regional Medical Center. RehabCare, based in St. Louis, Mo., managed and staffed the acute rehabilitation unit at the hospital from 1996 to 2001.

The lawsuit alleged RehabCare and the hospital, which submitted the claims for Medicare reimbursement, violated federal rules for reimbursement of Medicare and fired Kersulis and Wilson after they reported their alleged findings to superiors.

The suit was dismissed Jan. 29 by Judge G. Thomas Eisele, U.S. District Court, Western District in Little Rock, because of lack of evidence. RehabCare Group announced the judge's decision on its company Web site Friday, adding that Kersulis and Wilson agreed not to appeal the court's decision.

"We are very gratified by the decision in this case," said Nicole G. Vaccarella, vice president of Baxter Regional Medical Center. "We always believed Baxter Regional Medical Center acted properly and followed Medicare regulations, and we had faith the legal process would bear this out."

RehabCare also issued a statement in the case.

"Following several years of deliberation, we are very pleased that the court has reached a conclusion which correctly upholds our reputation and integrity and confirms our commitment to practice standards that follow the rule of the law," said David Groce, RehabCare senior vice president, in the company's news release.

Kersulis' and Wilson's lead attorney, Charles A. Banks of Little Rock, did not return a call for comment Monday.

Kersulis, a neurologist, worked as a medical director for RehabCare's rehabilitation unit at the hospital from October 1997 until he was fired in June of 2000. Wilson had worked as a physical therapist at RehabCare's facility at the hospital from 1994 until 2000. In the lawsuit, they each asked for three times the damages the government sustained and a $10,000 civil penalty for each violation. They also asked for two times the amount of back pay from their employers, plus interest, damages and attorney fees.

Military pay rules overhaul slowed by lawsuits, union concerns

By LOUIS HANSEN, The Virginian-Pilot

NORFOLK - About 2,200 white-collar civilian Navy employees have been shifted to a new personnel system, a change that eventually could affect thousands more federal workers in Hampton Roads.

The move - already being fought by unions - is part of the National Security Personnel System, an overhaul of the management and personnel rules for civilians working for the Department of Defense.

The military believes the system, known by its shorthand NSPS, will force supervisors and employees to meet more often and create formal goals.

It eliminates the 15-step general schedule, or "GS," ratings and moves employee compensation into three pay ranges. The military says it will give supervisors more discretion to reward good employees and punish poor performers.

Organized labor groups say it gives the secretary of defense the power to void union agreements and shrink the civilian work force.

The Association of Federal Government Employees, the country's largest union for federal employees with 600,000 members, and other unions have successfully sued in federal court to stop parts of the system even before it was implemented.

In February 2006, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled the D efense D epartment plan failed to ensure that civilian employees can bargain collectively. The court also found the appeals process for personnel disputes was unfair and illegal.

The D efense D epartment is appealing the decision, but the lawsuit has slowed the system from being widely implemented.

In Hampton Roads, the 2,200 employees who were switched in late January are non union and hold administrative jobs in various Navy and Joint Forces headquarters. The local Navy civilian work force totals 26,000 employees with a $1.5 billion annual payroll.

Mark Honecker, executive director and chief of staff for Fleet Forces command in Norfolk, said training for the new system has taken between four and seven days for employees and supervisors.

He believes the system will allow workers to set clear goals and create a more motivated and focused work force.

"The supervisors are going to have to spend a lot more time sitting down and talking to the employees," he said.

Employees have been most concerned about salaries, he said. No one has lost pay under the new system, and most actually have received raises, he said.

Supervisors may have more control over compensation, he said, and employees will be rewarded for their performance, not simply longevity.

Honecker acknowledged that the employees, who help prepare the fleet for training and deployments, have been skeptical. Fleet Forces has held training sessions and town hall meetings for workers since last summer.

"Change is still a hard thing," Honecker said.

Matt Biggs, a lobbyist for the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, said the plan was designed to kill unions and reduce pay for civilian workers.

"They've created an illegal personnel system," said Biggs, whose union joined the lawsuit.

Local employees are just starting to understand it.

Anna Pope, 29, spent 10 years in the Navy and an additional year working as a paralegal in two private law firms. She became a paralegal for the federal government for the benefits and stability.

So far, she likes the change: The system is closer to Navy evaluations that graded her on a performance scale.

"Pay was obviously the biggest issue," she said.

When Pope learned she would receive a raise, she concluded, "I t's a great system."

Gary Edwards, an environmental engineer with Fleet Forces, supervises nine other professional staffers. He sees the process as formalizing goals and missions within his office that used to be done informally.

It means more paperwork, he said, but he's optimistic.

He acknowledged that workers have mixed feelings but said: "T he jury's still out. Let's give it a chance."

Suicide Risk of Neurontin Kept Hidden for Years

The all-time poster child for a drug illegally promoted for off-label uses, is Neurontin, marketed by Warner-Lambert, and its Parke-Davis division, until Pfizer acquired the company in 2000.

The term "off-label" means prescribing a drug for indications not listed on the label, upping the recommended dose, prescribing a drug in combination with other medications, or using a drug with a patient population, such as children, not listed on the label.

As part of the approval process, the FDA reviews the drug's labeling, which must include the proposed claims about the drug's risks and benefits, as well as the directions for use.

If an indication is not listed, it means the drug maker has not submitted the required studies to prove the drug is safe and effective for that use. While physicians may prescribe a drug approved by the FDA for an unapproved use, it's against the law for a drug maker to influence doctors to prescribe a drug for uses outside the label.

Pfizer completed the acquisition of Warner-Lambert in June 2000, and four years later in May 2004, Pfizer pleaded guilty to illegally marketing Neurontin for unapproved uses and agreed to pay a $430 million, the second-largest settlement ever in a health care fraud prosecution, to settle charges brought by the US Department of Justice that included defrauding public health care programs.

The case specifically sought to recover the losses to public programs resulting from the off-label promotion of a drug and focused primarily on Medicaid, which spent an estimated $422 million on Neurontin between 1994 to mid-2000.

In the end, Pfizer paid $83.6 million to the federal government and $68.4 million to the 50 states and the District of Columbia. In addition, Pfizer agreed to pay the states a total of $38 million to settle liabilities under state consumer protection laws, and a $240 million criminal fine, according to the DOJ.

However, the settlement with the DOJ did not include damage awards for patients who may have been injured by Neurontin and many patients, or families representing deceased Neurontin victims, have filed lawsuits against the company.

Many of the cases are wrongful death actions based on the company's failure to warn about the risk of suicidality associated with the drug. In 2004, attorneys Derek braslow and Harris Pogust of the Pennsylvania law firm, Pogust & Braslow, began filing lawsuits on behalf of victims who became suicidal.

Pogust & Braslow represent plaintiff, Natalie Biedenbender, whose husband Mark committed suicide on July 9, 2005, at age 39, after being prescribed Neurontin off-label for back pain, in a wrongful death lawsuit.

According to the lawsuit, from July 1995 through at least August 5, 2002, the company engaged in a marketing program "to induce physicians to prescribe Neurontin, for medical conditions for which the FDA had not approved Neurontin to be used."

That program, the complaint charges, included (a) illegally promoting the sale and use of Neurontin for a variety of conditions "for which defendants had not performed the required FDA testing or established safety and efficacy;" and (b) offering and paying illegal remuneration to doctors, "either directly or through third parties, to induce them to promote and prescribe Neurontin for off-label uses."

On May 17, 2004, Andrew Finkelstein, of the New York law firm of Finkelstein & Partners, submitted a citizen's petition to the FDA requesting that a black box suicide warning be added to the label and that a Dear Doctor letter be sent out to instructing physicians to be on alert for increased depression in patients taking the drug.

Mr Finkelstein also continued to remind the FDA about the rising number of suicides. In a March 21, 2005, letter to Dr Russell Katz, he wrote in part: "Enclosed you will find two hundred fifty eight MedWatch forms ... Each represents a suicide of an American who was on Neurontin when he or she took his or her own life."

"Many of these suicides likely could have been prevented," he said, "had both the treating physician and unsuspecting families been armed with full knowledge of the risks of suicide that was known to both the FDA and the manufacturer."

But as it turns out, the FDA was fully aware of the suicidality risk when Neurontin was recommended for approval in 1992, and Dr Katz oversaw the FDA's analysis of the clinical data provided to support the New Drug Application.

According to Mr Finkelstein, the evaluation of serious adverse events during the original clinical trials showed the risk of suicide was known and a major concern. In the letter to Dr Katz, he pointed out that an FDA reviewer specifically stated in December, 1992:

Serious adverse events may limit the drug's widespread usefulness. Depression, while it may not be an infrequent occurrence in the epileptic population, may become worse and require intervention or lead to suicide, as it has resulted in some suicidal attempts during clinical trials.

In fact, in the clinical trials, Neurontin was attributed to four people actually attempting suicide, two more having depression with suicidal ideations, and 22 participants reporting depression so severe it required pharmacologic intervention. Most alarming was that 19 of the 78 participants who reported depression had no prior history of depression.

"Clearly," Mr Finkelstein told Mr Katz, "the FDA did not approve this drug with any expectation of use beyond the approved indication."

Documents that surfaced in litigation also show that the FDA was aware of the off-label marketing scheme eight years before the DOJ settlement. In July, 1996, FDA official, Lesley Frank, wrote to Parke-Davis and said in part:

Parke-Davis may be promoting Neurontin for 'off-label' uses ... in printed promotional materials, in detail or sales presentations to physicians, and through the use of company-solicited physician participation in a series of teleconferences.

These promotions of Neurontin for off-label uses included, but were not limited to, its use in chronic pain, bipolar disorders, and other psychiatric conditions. As you are aware, Neurontin's only approved indication was for adjunctive therapy in the treatment of partial seizures with and without secondary generalization in adults with epilepsy.

The documents show that after 11 months, Parke-Davis sent a written response denying all the allegations and the FDA accepted the denials and the matter was dropped.

In reality, $430 million was chickenfeed to Pfizer, considering that at the time of the settlement, Neurontin sales were up 32% from 2003, and the 2004 sales were expected to exceed the $2.7 billion mark set in 2003. In actuality, the settlement amounted to only about 15% of the gross sales of Neurontin in 2003.

By 2002, a full 94% of Neurontin sales were for off-label use and according to the August 16, 2004, USA Today, when Pfizer settled the lawsuit, the Wall Street firm Lehman Bros estimated that 90% of the sales were still off-label.

At the time, Pfizer issued a statement that said the illegal practices took place before Pfizer acquired Warner-Lambert. However, sales figures clearly show that Pfizer was still reaping the benefits of the illegal promotion of Neurontin at the time of the settlement.

"Although Neurontin is prescribed for scores of off-label indications," Attorney Braslow reports, "since 2000 off-label use continues to be most common in the areas where the company focused its illegal marketing efforts such as bipolar disorder, peripheral neuropathy and migraine headaches."

"This increase," he points out, "is most likely a direct result of sales representatives and leading physicians, who were paid by the company recommending its use for these conditions."

According to Attorney Pogust, "there are no scientific studies that support Neurontin's use for pain disorders."

"But as a result of the company's previous promotional activities," he says, "tens of thousands of patients who could use other pain killing drugs whose effectiveness has been established, are given Neurontin."

"These prescriptions for pain," Mr Pogust notes, "are still being written, as a direct result of past illegal promotional activities."

"Likewise," he points out, "the off-label prescriptions of Neurontin for bipolar disorder, attention deficit disorder, and depression are also without any scientific evidence supporting such uses."

The off-label scheme was first revealed by whistleblower, David Franklin, a former Park-Davis employee who worked as a medical liaison, in a lawsuit against Warner-Lambert and its Parke-Davis division filed under the federal False Claims Act.

By Mr Franklin's estimates, as much as 90% of prescriptions for Neurontin were written off-label as a result of the illegal scheme which prosecutors claim dates back to1995. To back up his allegations, Mr Franklin offered a voicemail he saved from his boss that stated:

I want you out there every day selling Neurontin... holding their hand, whispering in their ear, Neurontin for pain, Neurontin for monotherapy, Neurontin for bipolar, Neurontin for everything. I don't want to see a single patient coming off Neurontin before they've been up to at least 4,800 milligrams a day.

His boss concluded by stating: "I don't want to hear that safety crap either. It's a great drug"

As a whistleblower in a case to recover federal funds, Mr Franklin was entitled to a percentage of the settlement and received $24.6 million

The Drug Industry Document Archive (DIDA), created by the Center for Knowledge Management at the University of California San Francisco Library in collaboration with faculty members, contains roughly 1,000 documents drawn primarily from the case titled, United States ex rel David Franklin vs Parke-Davis, Division of Warner-Lambert, which describe all the specific details on the Neutontin off-label marketing scheme.

In settling the charges, Pfizer pleaded guilty only to conduct occurring before August 21, 1996, even though the DOJ determined that illegal activities had occurred much later, making it possible for Pfizer to continue to participate in federally funded health care programs despite a health care fraud law that went into effect on August 21, 1996, that would have required its exclusion from public programs.

Pfizer escaped the severe penalties, that many critics say would have sent a clear message to companies engaging in such conduct to knock it off or risk losing the most treasured customer base of all public health care programs, even though Warner-Lambert had been convicted of a felony in 1995, for failing to report failures concerning other drugs, which meant the new charges were second offenses "punishable as felonies without regard to proof of intent to defraud or mislead."

Initially, Neurontin was approved only to treat epilepsy in combination with another drug, and at a maximum 1800 mg daily dose. But the DOJ found the drug was being promoted for a multitude of pain uses, psychiatric conditions such as bipolar disorder and anxiety, social phobia, and general mood stabilization, as well as certain unapproved uses within epilepsy treatment. According to the DOJ, the list of unapproved uses became so long that company employees called it the "snake oil" list.

Over all, the DOJ listed the potential harm caused by the illegal scheme as: (1) public health care programs paid more in reimbursement; (2) consumers paid for ineffective, experimental use and may have been improperly medicated; (3) patient's unnecessary exposure to adverse side effects; and (4) improper medication may have resulted where Neurontin was not as effective as another approved drug.

The DOJ listed six tactics involved in carrying out the off-label scheme as: (1) Detailing by sales representatives; (2) Use of Medical Liaisons; (3) Preceptorships; (4) Consultant meetings, speakers bureaus and advisory boards; (5) Series of teleconferences to disseminate off-label uses; and (6) Control of Purportedly Independent Medical Education.

Another element of the overall scheme to increase profits was to convince doctors to prescribe Neurontin at substantially higher doses than the maximum approved dose.

The DOJ produced evidence to show that Parke-Davis had arranged hundreds of teleconferences, meetings, and educational seminars, in addition to the detailing of individual doctors by sales representatives, to promote the off-label use of Neurontin.

In 1996, a Parke-Davis sales representative created a document that said sales representatives could ask doctors if they ever used other antiepileptic drugs for painful neuropathies and then mention that approximately 35% of all Neurontin use is non-seizure. This same document, entitled "Neurontin Can Do/Can't Do," also stated that sales representatives could present lunch programs on Neurontin and pain.

According to Mr Franklin, the company gave financial incentives to hundreds of doctors by inviting them to dinners, sports outings, and weekend trips to resorts where fellow-physicians were paid to speak about the use of Neurontin for unapproved indications.

The company founded a speakers' bureau, as a method of making large payments to physicians who gave presentations and court documents show doctors were paid to listen to speeches that took place on a "Bus to Yankee Stadium," a "World Yacht Cruise," and the "Braves Stadium."

During one trip in 1996, Parke-Davis paid for 18 doctors and their spouses to stay in Atlanta for 5 days to attend the Summer Olympics. The company paid for their meals, use of a resort, and travel to the games while the agenda for the seminar listed only 10.5 hours of business meetings, including one devoted to off-label uses for Neurontin.

The DOJ determined that the company kept track of how well these marketing efforts paid off. For instance, in a memo dated June 26, 1995, a marketing executive reported that doctors who attended dinners and listened to speeches from other physicians, wrote 70% more off-label prescriptions than doctors who did not attend.

Documents show that the company intentionally hired influential doctors from major teaching hospitals to speak at these events. For instance, Dr Steven Schachter, a professor at Harvard Medical School, received $71,477 between May 1994 and September 1997, and Dr B J Wilder, a former professor at the University of Florida, was paid more than $300,000, and other doctors received more than $100,000 each.

The company also paid to disseminate papers and articles on off-label uses throughout the medical literature so that doctors would find themselves bombarded with information about the many uses for Neurontin, made to look like independent scientific papers.

For some uses, like monotherapy, the research was used to support an attempt to obtain FDA approval. But in other cases, the company's goal was to disseminate the information as widely as possible to increase off-label prescribing for conditions like pain and bipolar disorder, without ever trying to obtain approval.

To carry out this part of the scheme, Warner-Lambert hired two marketing firms to write the articles and then found doctors willing to sign on as authors. According to Mr Franklin, the PR firms were paid $12,000 per article and the doctors were paid $1,000.

The DOJ found more than twenty 20 articles published in various medical journals that were fully paid for by Parke-Davis. Critics say this tactic still affects off-label prescribing today. According to Mr Braslow, "since 1999, the types of off-label are most likely weighted in the precise areas where the drug maker focused its illegal marketing efforts: bipolar disorder, peripheral neuropathy, migraine, depression, etc."

"Because physicians were inundated with false information for years," Mr. Pogust says, "they continue to prescribe it for off-label uses for which there is no reliable scientific support."

Parke-Davis also infiltrated the continuing education arena where doctors were misled into believing that seminars on the off-label uses for Neurontin were independent educational programs, when they actually were marketing events set up by Park-Davis.

For example, prosecutors found an undisclosed relationship with a firm known as Physicians World where Parke-Davis employees transferred to the firm to run the company's speakers bureau.

At the same time, the DOJ discovered that in a division of Physicians World, known as Professional Post-Graduate Services, which purported to be an independent education provider presenting programs on anticonvulsants for pain to thousands of US doctors, Parke-Davis employees actually planned and developed the programs.

According to the DOJ, in late 1995, the company took the position that medical liaisons could discuss off-label issues with doctors, so long as the doctor asked a question about the topic first. Because physicians believed medical liaisons were persons with a scientific background and not employed to sell Neurontin, they were often able to gain access to doctors that the sales representatives could not.

For example, Mr Franklin was trained to increase the rate of prescriptions of Neurontin as monotherapy, and one of the ways he was able to gain access to doctors was by fraudulently presenting himself as a neurology specialist conducting research on epilepsy and the actions of anticonvulsant drugs.

Company records reveal an extensive pattern of misuse of medical liaisons. A January 31, 1996, memo describes a goal to "utilize the medical liaison group to target the Neurontin, Pain & Psychiatric market."

"Objective to conduct twice weekly Pain Teleconferences moderated by key Neuro Consultants," the memo states. "Goals 250 Physician participants quarterly."

One of the most alarming sales tactics identified during the DOJ's investigation was that sales representatives were allowed to review patient records, suggest an increase in Neurontin dosage, and "shadow" doctors while they examined patients, in exchange for paying the doctor a few hundred dollars a day.

According to the DOJ, at various times Parke-Davis made a conscious decision to not seek approval for a new use because it would have required solid proof from clinical trials that could not be provided.

Documents show that Parke-Davis even went to the trouble of determining how much could be made off Neurontin for a new approved use, compared to sales from marketing the drug off-label for the same use.

For example, a May 19, 1995, Marketing Assessment forecast potential revenue from Neurontin for bipolar without approval at $6 million in 1997, rising to $36 million in 1999. On the other hand, with approval, forecasted sales were almost $12 million in 1997, to over $80 million in 2002, but the company still decided not to seek approval for bipolar.

The DOJ found that similar projections were made for other uses including various types of pain but again, after evaluating the potential sales with and without approval, Parke-Davis decided to market Neurontin off-label instead of seeking approval.

The company also kept track of doctor's prescribing habits for Neurontin's competitors. In October of 1995, Parke-Davis determined that two competing epilepsy drugs, Tegretol and Depakote, had total sales of 18-27% for bipolar disorder, and up to 9% for pain, while at the time, only 1-2% of sales for Neurontin were for pain and bipolar.

The company continued to market the drug for bipolar even after studies showed it was ineffective for that use. The DOJ's sentencing Memorandum states: "One of the psychiatric uses for which Neurontin was promoted ... bipolar disorder, was particularly troubling because the Company had very weak evidence of Neurontin's efficacy in treating this condition."

"Indeed," the prosecutor wrote, "in one study ... the placebo was as effective or more effective than was Neurontin."

Yet with full knowledge of this study, medical liaisons told psychiatrists that early results from clinical trials indicated a 90% response rate for bipolar. Likewise, they told pediatricians that Neurontin was effective for children with attention deficit disorder, when no data other than occasional anecdotal evidence supported that claim.

And although no studies existed to prove that Neurontin was even as effective as inexpensive pain killers already on the market, medical liaisons told doctors that clinical trials demonstrated that Neurontin was highly effective in treating various pain syndromes and reported once again that a 90% response rate was found in the treatment of pain.

The DOJ also reports that the company continued to promote Neurontin for monotherapy even after the FDA refused to approve it. Parke-Davis sought approval in September 1996, but because one of the 2 clinical trials submitted with the application showed no demonstrable monotherapy efficacy, the application was denied.

Nonetheless, the DOJ produced evidence showing that Parke-Davis continued to promote Neurontin for monotherapy through at least 2000, without ever mentioning the rejected application, and that at one 1998 event, Parke-Davis went so far as to state that Neurontin is "now approved as monotherapy for seizures."

When caught red-handed promoting drugs for unapproved uses, drug makers always feign ignorance of the high rate of off-label prescribing. However in this instance, company documents show that Warner-Lambert regularly obtained detailed information on the number of prescriptions written for Neurontin and what indication they were written for.

Neurontin sales did finally drop to $182 million in the first quarter of 2005, but as a result of new generic competition on the market, according to USA Today on April 20, 2005.

UN wants guarantee that Canada won't repeat Arar errors

BRADLEY S. KLAPPER - Associated Press

GENEVA A United Nations anti-racism panel wants to know whether Canada can ensure that it will avoid repeating the kind of mistakes that led the United States to deport Maher Arar to Damascus, where he was tortured for nearly a year.

The committee -- a panel of 18 independent experts overseeing compliance with the UN's 38-year-old anti-racism treaty -- will hear from Canadian officials as part of its quadrennial review tomorrow.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper apologized last month for Ottawa's role in the Syrian-born Canadian's ordeal -- perhaps the best-known case of so-called 'extraordinary rendition,' in which the United States transfers foreign terrorism suspects without court approval to third countries for interrogation.

But the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination has asked what steps Canada has taken since toward new guidelines for information-sharing and monitoring of security probes so that forces 'have clear policies and more training on issues of racial, religious and ethnic profiling.'

Canada, in a 79-page submission to the committee, said it has undertaken several initiatives in recent years to combat racial profiling by police and security forces. It said its anti-terrorism measures are not directed against people of any particular religion or ethnic background.

The submission was filed with the Geneva-based committee before Mr. Harper's announcement last month that Mr. Arar would be compensated $10.5-million for his deportation and torture, which was due in part to intelligence from Ottawa that Canada acknowledges was inaccurate.

It also predates the release of a two-year public inquiry into the Arar case led by Dennis O'Connor, Associate Chief Justice of Ontario, which came up with 23 recommendations for policy changes.

Mr. Arar, a software engineer, was detained at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport in 2002 during a stopover on his way home to Canada from a vacation with his family in Tunisia.

He said he was chained and shackled for 11 days for interrogation and then flown to Syria, where he was tortured and forced to make false confessions. He was released 10 months later, with Syrian officials saying they had no reason to hold him further.

A Canadian inquiry determined that Mr. Arar was indeed tortured, and cleared him of any terrorist links or suspicions. Since then, Ottawa has been demanding a formal apology from Washington, as well as the removal of Mr. Arar's name from no-fly and terrorist watch lists, which the U.S. government insists it has reasons to keep him on.

The UN panel also questioned Canada's aboriginal policies and asked that it explain how it guarantees aboriginal groups' rights to land and resources.

Opinion: Is This America? Canada apologizes to its citizen kidnapped by CIA; U.S. keeps him on its terror list

by Nat Hentoff

February 19th, 2007 3:40 PM

We knew damn well if Maher Arar went to Syria, he'd be tortured. It's beneath the dignity of this country, a country that has always been a beacon of human rights, to send somebody to another country to be tortured . . . Let us not create more terrorism around the world by telling the world we cannot keep up to our basic standards and beliefs.
Senator Patrick Leahy, questioning Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the CIA's kidnapping of Maher Arar

On the day the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia ended in 1787, Benjamin Franklin told an inquiring citizen: "We have a Republic—if we can keep it." Two years later, in a letter to a friend, Franklin was more rhapsodic about the long-term impact of the American Revolution and its Constitution:

"God grant that not only the love of liberty, but a thorough knowledge of the rights of man, may [through our Revolution] pervade all the nations of the earth."

But on January 18, 2007, Vermont senator Patrick Leahy assessed how Bush's war on terrorism has affected many people around the world who do not hate us but no longer trust us as a lover of liberty and the rights of man. Said Leahy: "The administration's secret policies have reduced America's standing around the world to one of the lowest points in our history."

I expect that future historians of our continuing decline as a source of liberty and inspiration to the world will tell the story of Maher Arar.

In 2002, Arar, a software engineer and citizen of Canada, was kidnapped and flown by the CIA to Syria, where for 10 months he was held in an underground cell seven feet high, three feet wide, and six feet deep ("like a grave," he said). The persistent tortures he underwent finally forced him to make a false confession of connections to Al Qaeda.

On his release, Syrian officials admitted there was a total lack of evidence against him. Then, after a two-year inquiry and its 1,200-page report by a Canadian commission—in which the United States refused to participate—Dennis O'Connor, the chief justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, said, "I'm able to say categorically that there is no evidence to indicate that Mr. Arar has committed any offense or that his activities constitute a threat to the security of Canada."

The official inquiry had determined that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had given the CIA unsubstantiated, brittle "evidence" that Arar was probably some kind of Al Qaeda supporter. And that's why, when he was changing planes at Kennedy Airport on the way back to Canada after a vacation in Tunisia, Arar was abducted by the CIA and sent to his native Syria.

On December 7, 2006, the commissioner of the RCMP, Giuliano Zaccardelli, resigned because he had mishandled the case, saying he had "made a mistake" in not being aware of the false information the RCMP had given the CIA.

In this country, you will not be surprised to learn, no one—at the CIA, the Justice Department, or in Dick Cheney's office of "dark arts"—has resigned or admitted any error at all.

Instead, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked at a press conference whether the Justice Department might at least offer Arar—who can't find a job and still suffers from the effects of his stay in the grave-like Syrian cell—an apology. Astonishingly, since Arar's ordeal has been reported in detail in mainstream American newspapers as well as in the foreign press, Gonzales actually said: "We were not responsible for Mr. Arar's removal to Syria. I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the [Canadian] commission report. He was initially detained because his name appeared on terrorist lists, and he was deported according to our immigration laws."

The attorney general did not mention that his Justice Department approved the removal of Arar or the special accommodations for Arar in a CIA plane, bound not for Canada, where he is a citizen, but for Syria's torture chambers. And Gonzales has yet to answer the insistent questions on that brutal rerouting from senators Leahy and Arlen Specter.

On January 26, Canadian prime minister Stephen Harper formally apologized to Arar: "We cannot go back and fix the injustice that occurred to Mr. Arar. However, we can make changes to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again."

Moreover, the prime minister added that Arar will receive $9 million in compensation. That will settle Arar's claim against the Canadian government for its RCMP having given the CIA false information about him.

The prime minister explained that the Canadian government decided the $9 million was about what Arar would have been awarded in a lawsuit. Arar's attorneys also received $879,000 in legal fees. (Arar's lawsuit against the U.S. has been dismissed in our courts on the basis of "state secrets.")

Meanwhile, the Associated Press reported on January 27 that "public resentment in Canada swelled . . . over U.S. officials' insistence that Arar would remain on its 'watch list' of potential suspects." (That order came from Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff.)

Along with Arar on that terrorist list are his wife and two young children. The family is prohibited from flying into—or over—the United States. (Who knows what those kids would drop on us?)

At a televised news conference, Arar, with 10 Canadian flags behind him, said, according to the Los Angeles Times: "The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard. This struggle has taught me how important it is to stand up for human rights. I feel proud as a Canadian."

How proud do you feel as Alberto Gonzales insists there is secret information justifying Arar and his family being on the terrorist list? With Canada asking that they be removed from the list, Stockwell Day, the Canadian minister of public safety, went to see Chertoff and Gonzales and reviewed the whole secret dossier on Arar. He saw nothing justifying the exclusion of the Arars from this sweet land of liberty. Says Arar: "I will never be the same. The United States must take responsibility for what it did to me and must stop destroying more innocent lives with its unlawful actions."

COMMENTARY: Europe's Investigations of the CIA's Crimes

By JOANNE MARINER

A year ago, I testified before lawmakers about CIA involvement in kidnappings, enforced disappearances, and secret detentions. But rather than traveling to Washington to brief members of Congress about these practices, I headed to Brussels to participate in hearings before the European Parliament.

The topic was important, but the venue was odd. Although I appreciated European concern over CIA abuses--and understood that the complicity of European intelligence services was an important contributing factor--it seemed incongruous that Europeans, rather than Americans, were investigating these questions.

Over the past year, the contrast between European and U.S. responses has grown more stark. While the U.S. Congress has yet to hold hearings on the CIA's program of holding terrorism suspects in secret prisons, and sending others to foreign countries to be tortured, the European Parliament has just finished a thorough investigation of these activities.

Moreover, although the Department of Justice cannot seem to build a prosecution against even a single CIA operative implicated in the abuse of detainees, Italian and German prosecutors have now indicted 38 of them. In Italy, a judge is poised to go ahead with the trial of 26 Americans implicated in the 2003 kidnapping of an Egyptian imam from Milan. The man was delivered to Egypt, where he claims, very credibly, to have been badly tortured.

So if the Europeans can manage to undertake serious investigations of CIA counterterrorism abuses, why can't we?

Canada, Too

The contrast is striking. Even the U.S. courts, normally more solicitous of rights than other branches of government, have been reluctant to act. The Bush Administration has succeeded in getting suits knocked out of court on the mere possibility that they might lead to the disclosure of "state secrets" about CIA activities. In contrast, a Spanish court has just ordered Spain's intelligence service to declassify any documents it possesses pertaining to CIA flights in Spain.

It is not only the Europeans who have seriously examined these issues. In Canada, the government carried out a full-scale official inquiry into the case of Maher Arar, a dual Canadian-Syrian national who was badly tortured in Syria after the U.S. deported him there. In January, the Canadian Prime Minister offered Arar a public apology, as well as $12.5 million in compensation.

The United States, however, stubbornly refuses to take Arar off its terrorist watch list. And rather than hearing Arar's claim for compensation, a U.S. federal court dismissed his complaint last year, giving priority to what it deemed to be national security and foreign policy considerations.

Column continues below ↓

Embarrassment on Both Sides of the Atlantic

The reason that these investigations have gone forward in Europe and Canada is not simply that it's easier, politically, for them to reveal U.S. misdeeds. Indeed, these cases have also been extremely embarrassing for European and Canadian officials.

For example, in the case of Khaled el-Masri -- a German citizen who was abducted in Macedonia in 2004 and held for four months in a secret CIA prison in Afghanistan -- the German Foreign Minister has been dogged by charges that Berlin may have connived in the illegal detention. Italian officials, likewise, appear to have been implicated in the CIA's 2003 kidnapping of the Egyptian imam from Milan. Yet in these cases and others, European prosecutors, judges and legislators have pressed their governments to acknowledge responsibility for abuses.

Similarly, the official commission of inquiry that the Canadian government established to examine the case of Maher Arar concluded that Canada shared responsibility for Arar's torture in Syria. It found, specifically, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police passed false information about Arar to the U.S.

authorities without placing any conditions upon how that information might be used.

But while officials on both sides of the Atlantic are implicated in serious abuses, it is only the Europeans and the Canadians who have shown any willingness to acknowledge their responsibility. Here, even in areas where the U.S. government appears to have moderated the CIA's practices, it has never acknowledged that the abuses that were committed were morally wrong and/or illegal.

In not a single case--even those involving abduction and torture--has this administration apologized for the CIA's behavior or repudiated its tactics. In fact, the Bush Administration has consistently and vehemently defended CIA abuses. Top officials may have employed a few euphemisms to disguise the practices--speaking of "alternative procedures," not torture--and "sensitive questioning," not coercive interrogation--but their public stance has left little doubt that the CIA's treatment of terrorism suspects was approved from on high.

Oversight by the New Congress

Congress, for its part, has done almost nothing to investigate these abuses. Not only has it failed to hold hearings or otherwise exercise effective oversight over the intelligence services, it passed legislation last September that reduces the likelihood of holding CIA operatives accountable.

The question now is whether the new Congress--facing a weakened executive--will act any differently. Sen. Patrick Leahy, chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has already written Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to request a presidential directive that may have authorized CIA practices such as torture and secret detention. It's a good first step, but the real test lies in how Leahy will respond now that Gonzales has refused to supply the document.

Not only have the CIA's abusive practices done serious harm to this country's moral standing abroad, they have been counterproductive in the fight against terrorism. As a study published by the National Defense Intelligence College recently concluded, there is no scientific evidence to show that these practices produce accurate or useful information.

It is in America's interest to investigate and prosecute these crimes, as much or more than it is in the interest of other countries. These are our crimes; the responsibility of dealing with them lies with us, too.

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Win For Bush, Federal Court Upholds Law On Gitmo Detainees. The AP (2/21, Yen) reports this morning, "In a victory for President Bush, a divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Guantanamo Bay detainees cannot use the US court system to challenge their indefinite imprisonment. A Supreme Court appeal was promised." The 2-1 decision by the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit "dismisses hundreds of cases filed by foreign-born detainees in federal court and also threatens to strip away court access to millions of lawful permanent residents currently in the United States." The AP adds, "The two judges voting with the White House -- Judge A. Raymond Randolph and Judge David B. Sentelle -- were appointed by Republicans. President Reagan appointed Sentelle, and President George H.W. Bush appointed Randolph. The dissenter, Judge Judith W. Rogers, was appointed by President Clinton, a Democrat." White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino "called the decision 'a significant win' for the administration and said the Military Commissions Act provides 'sufficient and fair access to courts for these detainees.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A5, Bravin, 2.04M) reports that "in dissent, Judge Judith Rogers wrote that…Congress…had exceeded its authority. The Constitution provides that 'the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.'"

Like the AP, most media outlets describe the court's decision as a big win for Bush, although the ruling is generally being cast in a decidedly mixed light. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Havermann, 850K) says it was "a victory for…Bush in his global war on terrorism," and NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 3, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) spoke of "a victory for the Bush Administration and what it calls the war on terrorism." NBC (Pete Williams) added the ruling "says that nearly 400 detainees held at Gitmo, most of them for more than five years now, have no legal rights to plead for their freedom in federal courts in the US and only a few of them have any hope even of a hearing before a US military commission under new rules approved by Congress last year. Lawyers for the detainees say they now have nowhere to go, to claim that they were wrongly picked up in the first place." Also, "Democrats who now control Congress say they'll try to restore the authority to hear detainee appeals. And some Republicans say they'd favor that." GOP Sen. Arlen Specter was shown saying, "If Congress were to act, we could clear it up faster than the several years it will take for the Supreme Court to act on it."

ABC World News (2/20, story 3, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) said it was "a major victory for…Bush," while Fox News' Special Report (2/20, lead story, Hume) opened its broadcast last night noting that civil liberties groups "denounced the ruling, calling it a shameful example of the Bush Administration's 'anything goes' approach to the war on terror."

The Washington Times (2/21, Seper, 88K) calls the ruling a "key victory for the White House," but the Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Richey, Feldmann, 59K) says "most analysts emphasized the interim nature of the ruling. They view the 25-page panel opinion and 34-page dissent as a prelude to a major constitutional showdown at the nation's highest court."

The Financial Times (2/21, Sevastopulo) refers to a "significant legal victory" for the White House, and notes "Patrick Leahy and…Specter, the top Democrat and Republican lawmakers on the Senate judiciary committee, have introduced legislation that would restore the right of habeas to detainees at Guantanamo. … Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican senator who was instrumental in the move to strip habeas rights, yesterday welcomed the decision, which he said would prevent 'frivolous' lawsuits."

The New York Times (2/21, Labaton, 1.16M) quotes Leahy saying, "The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness." Shayana Kadidal, "a lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, said, 'This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore.'" Kadidal "said the ruling encouraged 'a contempt for international human rights law' and 'such notorious practices as extraordinary rendition': sending terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation, where, rights advocates say, they may face torture."

USA Today (2/21, 3A, Parker, 2.27M) reports Rep. Ike Skelton, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, had "announced a new review of detainees' legal protections." Pentagon spokesman Jeffrey Gordon "said the detainees at Guantanamo include some of the world's 'most vicious terrorist operatives.' He said none of Guantanamo's many critics 'have put forth a viable option to handle these dangerous men and prevent their return to terrorism.'"

The Washington Post (2/21, A1, White, 690K) reports, "Justice Department lawyers have argued for years that foreign detainees should not enjoy constitutional rights when they are detained in other countries amid accusations of terrorism against the United States and its allies. 'We are pleased with the decision of the US Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upholding the constitutionality of the Military Commissions Act (MCA) and dismissing the consolidated Guantanamo detainee cases for lack of jurisdiction,' Erik Ablin, a department spokesman, said in a statement."

The Legal Times (2/21, Goldman) reports, "The 2-1 decision was sharply critical of the plaintiffs, who had argued that the language of the act forbidding U.S. courts to hear challenges to the detention of aliens detained as enemy combatants was ambiguous and did not necessarily apply to detainees whose cases were already pending in court. … 'The arguments are creative but not cogent,' wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph. 'Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan,' wrote Randolph, referring to the 2006 decision, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which ruled that the military commissions set up by the Bush administration to try military detainees violate both international and U.S. military law. … 'To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress,' Randolph added, later calling the plaintiffs' argument 'nonsense.' … Randolph was joined in his decision by Judge David Sentelle." The Times notes, "After dispensing with the detainees' argument that the law was ambiguous, the court went on to assert the act's constitutionality. The Constitution's suspension clause, which says that the writ of habeas corpus can only be suspended for reasons of public safety during 'rebellion or invasion,' does not apply to areas outside U.S. sovereignty. And it is Cuba, the court asserted, not the United States, that has sovereignty over Guantanamo Bay. … In her dissent, Judge Judith Rogers strongly disagreed, writing that the majority opinion 'fundamentally misconstrues' the nature of the suspension clause. 'Far from conferring an individual right that might pertain only to persons substantially connected to the United States,' she wrote, 'the Suspension Clause is a limitation on the powers of Congress.'"

National Public Radio (2/21, Shapiro) reports, "The ruling is a clear blow to the Guantanamo detainees. Bill Goodman is legal director at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents a number of them. … 'Many of these people have done nothing,' Goodman says. 'They're there by accident and happenstance.' He added that not being able to 'raise the basic defense that "I've done nothing wrong" means that this is a huge trampling of rights.'" NPR adds, "This decision wipes out cases that challenged everything from lack of medical treatment at the facility to abusive interrogation tactics. David Rivkin worked in the Justice Department under President Reagan and the first President Bush. He says enemy combatants were never intended to get the same court access as criminal suspects. … 'There's been more judicial involvement in these types of decisions than in any war in American history,' Rivkin says. 'And for the critics it's still not enough.'" NPR notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos noted in a statement that the Military Commissions Act, or MCA, does give detainees some legal review. … 'The decision reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the MCA,' Scolinos said, 'permitting Guantanamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit.'"

LATimes Urges Congress To Change Military Commissions Act. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, 850K) editorializes that "a federal appeals court has presented the Democratic-controlled 110th Congress with a challenge. Does it have the fortitude to undo an injustice perpetrated by the Republican-controlled 109th? The injustice came in the 2006 Military Commissions Act, which barred detainees at Guantanamo -- now numbering 395 -- from contesting their imprisonment by seeking writs of habeas corpus. This exclusion, like Guantanamo itself, has been an embarrassment to the United States." The Times adds, "There's a good reason to suspect that the Supreme Court might actually affirm this disappointing decision: It's not the same court that ruled for the detainees in 2004. … Rather than hope that the Supreme Court will rectify the act's flaws, Congress should act on its own to undo the law's habeas restrictions. Last year, 48 members of the Republican-controlled Senate voted for an amendment by…Specter that would have allowed detainees to file such petitions. Of the 51 who voted no, six are no longer in the Senate."

Audit Finds Inaccuracies In DOJ Anti-Terror Statistics. The AP (2/21, Jordan) reports, "Federal prosecutors counted immigration violations, marriage fraud and drug trafficking among anti-terror cases in the four years after 9/11 even though no evidence linked them to terror activity, a Justice Department audit said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Overall, nearly all of the terrorism-related statistics on investigations, referrals and cases examined by department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine were either diminished or inflated. Only two of 26 sets of department data reported between 2001 and 2005 were accurate, the audit found. … Responding, a Justice spokesman pointed to figures showing that prosecutors in the department's headquarters for the most part either accurately or underreported their data — underscoring what he called efforts to avoid pumping up federal terror statistics." The AP adds, "The numbers, used to monitor the department's progress in battling terrorists, are reported to Congress and the public and help, in part, shape the department's budget. … 'For these and other reasons, it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics,' the audit concluded." The AP notes, "Fine's office took care to say the flawed data appear to be the result of 'decentralized and haphazard' methods of collection or disagreement over how the numbers are reported, and do not appear to be intentional. … Still, the errors led Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., to question whether the department had exaggerated the number of terror cases. … 'If the Department of Justice can't even get their own books in order, how are we supposed to have any confidence they are doing the job they should be?' said Schumer, who sits on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees the department. 'Whether this is just an accounting error or an attempt to pad terror prosecution statistics for some other reason, the Department of Justice of all places should be classifying cases for what they are, not what they want us to think them to be.'"

The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Zajac) reports, "Although the Justice Department and the FBI have reorganized since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to make preventing future attacks a priority, Fine found that the agencies have done a poor job of providing statistical documentation for the work they are doing. … His report reviewed 26 categories of statistics and found inaccuracies, because of either inflated numbers or undercounting, in 24 of them." The Tribune adds, "Fine did not allege a deliberate attempt to mislead. He said information was 'inaccurately reported for a variety of reasons, including that [Justice] Department components could not provide support for the numbers reported, could not provide support for a terrorism link used to classify statistics as terrorism-related, and could not document that the activity reported occurred in the period reported.'" The Tribune adds, "Dean Boyd, a spokesman for the FBI and the Justice Department, which oversees U.S. attorneys, said both agencies were under stress from having to quickly ramp up an anti-terrorism capability after the 2001 attacks and have subsequently upgraded their tracking and labeling of cases to comport with many of Fine's recommendations for improvement. … Fine also found that unlike the FBI and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, which coordinates the activities of 93 federal prosecutors in the U.S. and overseas territories, the Justice Department's Criminal Division consistently reported lower numbers of terrorism cases than it actually handled. … For instance, the criminal division recorded 195 guilty pleas or convictions in terrorism cases from Sept. 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, but Fine said there actually were 216." The Tribune notes, "Boyd said Fine's report should not be read as undercutting the Justice Department's credibility because Criminal Division figures are the ones 'used by DOJ in publicly quantifying their work.' … But Fine cautioned against taking too much comfort in the Criminal Division's understatement of its anti-terrorism work because the record-keeping behind it was so weak that there 'was no accurate basis for its reported numbers.' … The report is the latest in a string of analyses to question the accuracy of the Justice Department's terrorism data."

The Washington Post (2/21, A8, Eggen, 690K) notes, "The analysis is the latest to find serious faults with the Justice Department's terrorism statistics, some of which have been featured prominently in statements by President Bush or the attorney general as evidence of the terrorist threat and the department's successful efforts to combat it." The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Zajac, 617K) reports, "Boyd said Fine's report should not be read as undercutting the Justice Department's credibility because Criminal Division figures are the ones 'used by DOJ in publicly quantifying their work.' But Fine cautioned against taking too much comfort in the Criminal Division's understatement of its anti-terrorism work because the record-keeping behind it was so weak that there 'was no accurate basis for its reported numbers.'"

The Washington Times (2/21, Seper) reports, "Mr. Fine's office focused on terrorism convictions during fiscal 2003 and 2004 reported by EOUSA; the number of persons convicted or who pleaded guilty resulting from terrorism convictions from September 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, reported by the Criminal Division; and the number of terrorist threats tracked by the FBI in fiscal 2003 and 2004. … 'The Justice Department agrees fully with the Office of the Inspector General that the department must collect, verify and maintain accurate statistics on the important national security work being conducted at Main Justice, the FBI and in United States Attorney's Offices around the country,' according to the FBI. … The FBI said it has made improvements to its statistical reporting systems in recent years, specifically its case management and supporting information technology programs." The Times adds, "Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the EOUSA has changed the way it counts and classifies anti-terrorism cases, and that the IG's findings, with respect to U.S. attorneys' statistics, 'largely boiled down to a difference of opinion over the definition of anti-terrorism.' … He also said criminal division prosecutors and the FBI also have changed their case reporting systems to more accurately reflect terror-related cases." McClatchy Newspapers (2/21) also reports on the audit.

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/10) opened its broadcast with "a report on troubling new concerns tonight about bureaucratic blunders and outright competence in the war against radical Islamist terrorism. Government auditors today blasted both the FBI and the Justice Department for using inaccurate statistics to claim successes in the war on terror. … Bottom line – the Inspector general says that for the most part the Justice Department was just flat out wrong. … One lawmaker says it's high time the Justice Department came forward with 'solid numbers instead of sugar-coated stories.'"

Federal Judge Rejects Delay In Phone Wiretap Suits. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/21, B-10, Egelko) reports, "A federal judge rejected the Bush administration's request Tuesday to put wiretapping lawsuits against telephone companies on hold while the government asks an appeals court to dismiss the suits on national security grounds." The Chronicle continues, "The ruling came from Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker of San Francisco, who is hearing more than 40 suits from around the nation accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the government's electronic surveillance program. … Walker refused in July to dismiss the leading case, a suit accusing AT&T of sharing its telephone records and e-mail network with the National Security Agency. Walker rejected Bush administration arguments that allowing the case to proceed would expose vital secrets about the clandestine program and the company's alleged role in it." The Chronicle adds, "The Justice Department has asked the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the ruling and dismiss all the lawsuits. While that appeal is pending, government lawyers argued, any further action in Walker's court would waste time and money and increase the risk of a security breach. … But Walker ordered the companies Tuesday to respond to the suits by March 29 unless plaintiffs in particular cases agreed to a delay. … The judge also said lawyers for AT&T customers could ask him for permission to question company officials and to seek evidence on limited issues. Attorney Kurt Opsahl of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which represents the plaintiffs, said those topics could include the company's structure and operation of its networks." The Chronicle notes, "Opsahl said plaintiffs' lawyers may also ask AT&T to present to Walker, in private, any evidence of government authorization that exists for its actions -- a subject that Justice Department lawyers have described as among the most sensitive in the case. Such secret submission of evidence, a procedure spelled out by federal law, would allow the judge to determine whether any surveillance in which the company participated was legal, Opsahl said. … Walker 'is trying to advance the case while being very sensitive to national security concerns,' Opsahl said."

FBI Translating Record Number Of Intercepts, Nearly Eliminating Backlog. US News & World Report (2/20, Kaplan) reported on its Web site, "Spurred by adding hundreds of new linguists and help from allies overseas, the FBI is translating a record 34,000 wiretapped conversations a month, bureau officials tell the Bad Guys blog. Long criticized for its lack of language specialists, the FBI, they say, is finally catching up to an unprecedented intake of foreign-language surveillance recordings, electronic data, and text since 9/11. Most of the wiretaps are tied to counterterrorism and counterintelligence cases, officials say. Since 9/11, the FBI's counterterrorism agents, in particular, have collected a mother lode of intelligence. … 'We've made great strides,' says Jeff Lanza, an FBI spokesman. 'Ninety-nine percent of the backlog has been eliminated.' Nearly a third of what remains is 'white noise' not expected to yield anything of value, officials say." US News noted, "The FBI has eased its backlog by markedly increasing its reservoir of translators. … The FBI has also turned to 'the language programs of allied intelligence agencies,' as well as to contract linguists, according to testimony by FBI Director Robert Mueller."

Bail Hearing Held For American Accused Of Joining Al Qaeda Group. The New York Times (2/21, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "A thin and weakened 28-year-old American who the government says was captured last month in Kenya after joining Islamic terrorists fighting in Somalia appeared on Tuesday in federal court here to face charges of conspiring to use an unconventional weapon and receiving military training from Al Qaeda." Daniel J. Maldonado "stayed impassive as F.B.I. witnesses and prosecutors said he had admitted to having guarded a suspected spy who was later killed, to praising the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and to offering himself as a suicide bomber." However, public defender Brent E. Newton's "cross-examination suggested that he intended to make an issue of Mr. Maldonado's treatment in custody and whether his client had properly waived his rights to a lawyer before F.B.I. agents questioned him."

The Houston Chronicle (2/21, George, 530K) reports, "A federal judge cut short a hearing for accused terrorist Daniel Joseph Maldonado late Tuesday to give his lawyers time to review reports about FBI interviews with their client. … The hearing, which will determine whether the government's case will continue, is to resume at 10 a.m. today." The Chronicle notes, "In Kenya, two senior FBI officials questioned Maldonado, who gave conflicting information during later interviews with another FBI agent and a Houston police officer. … Newton argued that even if Maldonado went overseas to fight jihad, there is no evidence that he intended to affiliate with al-Qaida." The AP (2/21) adds, "Newton asked McKinley if Maldonado, while 'interrogated' by FBI agents six times after his capture during a period of a week and a half was denied an attorney even though he had asked for one and was deprived of sleep. McKinley said Maldonado agreed to talk with agents while being 'questioned' and was treated well after his capture."

KPRC-TV Houston (2/20) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "it was revealed that Maldonado was approached to return to America and recruit English-speaking women to receive training in Somalia, a notion that alarmed local Islamic leaders. … It was also detailed in court how Maldonado allegedly took part in the beating and interrogation of a flight attendant who he accused of being a spy after the flight attendant took cell phone pictures of high-ranking al-Qaida members on a flight. The FBI agent said the flight attendant was eventually killed."

Alleged Terror Fundraiser Contributed $15,000 To NRCC. The AP (2/21, Sidoti) reports, "A New York man accused of trying to help terrorists in Afghanistan has donated some $15,000 to the House Republicans' campaign committee over three years. Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari pleaded not guilty Friday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to charges that include terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering. From April 2002 until August 2004, the man also known as 'Michael Mixon' gave donations ranging from $500 to $5,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee," and NRCC spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger "said if Alishtari is found guilty, the organization would donate the money to charity."

The Hill (2/21, Blake) adds, "Democrats are asking how much access Alishtari had with Republicans and whether the NRCC would return the money. 'We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges, but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward,'…Boulanger said."

Administration Said To Ignore Terror Fundraising. In a Washington Times (2/21, 88K) op-ed, American Center for Democracy director Rachel Ehrenfeld writes, "Six years after al Qaeda attacked the United States, many policy-makers and 'terrorism experts' retain the misconception that terrorism does not require large amounts of money." Ehrenfeld criticizes the Center for American Progress Terrorism Index, saying that it does not include Saudi support for spreading Wahhabism, Iranian support of Hezbollah, Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, as well as terror funds raised through the illegal drug trade. Ehrenfeld adds, "It boggles the mind that the Bush administration continues to ignore terrorism's need for, and access to, a strong, international funding base, with large pockets even in the United States. More disturbing is the administration's unwillingness to identify the funding sources. … This willful blindness continues to undermine U.S. credibility with its allies and foes, and therefore its ability to curtail the money flow."

Muslim Groups Join Fast For Al-Arian. The Washington Times (2/21, Hudson) reports, "A coalition of Muslim groups is calling for a worldwide fast in support of Sami Al-Arian, a former college professor convicted of raising funds for a terrorist group who remains in jail on contempt charges for refusing to testify before a Virginia grand jury investigating other financiers of terrorism." The Times continues, "The American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections on Monday asked Muslims to fast every Monday, Wednesday and Friday along with Al-Arian, who has been on a hunger strike since Jan. 21." The Times adds, "Task force spokesman Agha Saeed says the response has been 'compassionate, caring, supportive and concern about Professor Al-Arian's health.' … The former University of South Florida computer-science professor was arrested in 2003 and pleaded guilty last year to assisting the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group. He was sentenced to time served and given an additional 18 months for refusing to testify against the International Institute of Islamic Thought (IIIT) and its role with the terrorist group. … The task force calls the additional sentence 'a form of harassment,' and along with Amnesty International, is demanding his release. The task force is made up of larger Muslim groups, including the American Muslim Alliance, Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), the Islamic Circle of North America and United Muslims of America."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales To Tour Supermax Prison In Colorado. The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/21, Roper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will visit the federal Supermax prison complex at Florence on Wednesday, four months after a federal inspection report cited a staff shortage as the reason for security and supervision problems there." The Chieftain continues, "Gonzales will tour the prison complex with Colorado Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, who urged him to visit the nation's highest security federal prison after a Justice Department inspector general's report found a list of security problems. The most glaring was that the mail and telephone calls for convicted terrorists being held at the prison were not always being monitored. … Allard, a Republican, and Salazar, a Democrat, both met with Gonzales earlier this year and were told that Bureau of Prisons officials had added staff to Supermax, which holds 400 of the most dangerous prisoners in the federal prison system, such as Ramzi Yousef, who led the first bomb attack on the World Trade Center."

DOJ_NMG_0134388

The Chieftain notes, "Supermax officially is known as the U.S. Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum (ADX). According to a CNN broadcast last November, the inspector general's investigation was begun when Spanish police found letters from a Supermax inmate, Mohammed Salameh, were sent to a terror cell with links to the train bombings in Madrid. … The Justice Department report found that staffing at the prison had become so short that there were times when inmate mail and telephone calls were unmonitored. Also, there were times when there were no guards available to be in some cellblocks for an entire shift - although the cellblock was still staffed at the perimeter."

The Canon City (CO) Daily Record (2/21, Vela) reports, "Correctional officer safety and terrorism concerns have worried those who have been vocal in the issue of security at Fremont County's federal institutions. A report released in October of last year by the Department of Justice's inspector general indicates that mail and phone calls received from convicted terrorists at ADX have not been totally checked by BOP staff. Also, the inspector general reported that not enough staff was sufficiently capable of monitoring phone calls in foreign languages. … These concerns could because of an overall lack of staff at the prison. In November, the Bureau of Prisons — the governing body of a federal institutions — increased staff at Supermax, but the number of those staffed still lagged behind the number the prison opened with in 1994; that number was 240 correctional officers, today it is 220. … But the staffing concerns do not stop at Supermax. Earlier this year, a riot situation was narrowly averted at the United States Penitentiary in Florence. Correctional officers from ADX and the Florence Correctional Institution came to the aid of staff at USP where seven officers were injured breaking-up fighting inmates."

KCNC-TV, Denver, CO (2/20, 10:14 p.m.) broadcasted, "US General Alberto Gonzales will be touring the Super Max in Colorado as "part of the effort to tackle human rights there." The Super Max "holds some of the most high-profile criminals and terrorists in the country." Sen. Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard and Congressman Doug Lamborn will also be on that tour. KJCT-TV, Grand Junction, Durango, Montrose, CO (2/20, 10:06 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

McConnell Sworn In As New Intelligence Director. USA Today (2/21, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush installed retired vice admiral Michael McConnell as the nation's second national intelligence director and said his challenge is to improve the quality of spy data and analysis in wartime." Bush "said the intelligence community needs significant improvements more than five years after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. He instructed McConnell to focus on finding more recruits with the language skills and cultural background to collect information on terrorist groups."

The Washington Post (2/21, A8, Pincus, 690K) notes Bush "paid tribute to McConnell's predecessor, Ambassador John D. Negroponte, who has moved back to the State Department as deputy secretary, saying he served with 'talent and distinction.' Nevertheless, Bush said that many elements of improving the intelligence community remain, including information sharing and the hiring of employees with the right language and cultural skills." McConnell "repeated yesterday a plan he disclosed to Congress at his confirmation hearing: that he will change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first- and second-generation Arabic-speaking Americans for very sensitive jobs."

Hawley Expects Full Implementation Of Secure Flight To Come In 2010. The New York Times (2/21, Lipton, 1.16M) reports TSA Administrator Kip Hawley "acknowledged" in an interview Tuesday that the federal government would not be ready to takeover "checking passenger names against terrorist watch lists, a top priority for aviation officials since the 2001 terrorist attacks, …until 2010, more than five years behind schedule." It "is the latest setback" in the "long-promised" Secure Flight program, "intended to enhance aviation safety, while reducing the number of passengers mistakenly identified as possible terrorists." Hawley said improvements to the program "will cost some $80 million" over the next year and a half and that the "enhanced system…will then require more than a year of testing, resulting in the estimate that it will be in full use sometime in 2010. Officials would not release an estimate of how much they expected to spend before the system was complete."

Survey Finds Park Police Doubt Agency Ready For Terror Attack. The Washington Times (2/21, Seper, Cella, 88K) reports, "A survey of US Park Police officers shows 97 percent of those who responded lack confidence in Chief Dwight E. Pettiford and 98 percent do not think the agency is as prepared as others to respond to a terrorist attack." The results of the survey, which also "found that 98 percent think the agency's command staff was not doing its best to protect the public" and that "94 percent said inadequate staffing makes their work sites unsafe," were described as "extremely disappointing" by James Austin of the Fraternal Order of Police, which conducted the survey. "Much of the criticism about Chief Pettiford, who was promoted to the job from a deputy position in March 2005, is that he has not pushed hard enough for funding increases. … Several field officers and supervisors, who asked not to be identified for fear of losing their jobs, say the situation is hurting the agency's ability to accomplish its mission and is understaffed by at least 20 percent."

Nichols Claims McVeigh Said FBI Orchestrated OKC Bombing. The Deseret Morning News (2/21, Fattah) reports, "The only surviving convicted criminal in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City is saying his co-conspirator, Timothy McVeigh, told him he was taking orders from a top FBI official in orchestrating the bombing. … However, one congressman who has investigated the bombings remains skeptical of Nichols' claims." Nichols' "declaration was filed as part of Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue's pending wrongful death suit against the government for the death of his brother in a federal corrections facility in Oklahoma City." The Morning News notes Nichols claims "McVeigh let slip during a bout of anger that he was taking instruction from former FBI official Larry Potts," who "retired from the FBI under intense pressure and criticism for the cover-up of an order to allow agents to shoot anyone seen leaving the Weaver cabin at Ruby Ridge. When contacted, the FBI's main office in Washington, D.C., said it could not provide immediate comment on Nichols' claims Tuesday.

FBI, DHS Launch Another Fingerprint Data-Sharing Pilot Program. Government Computer News (2/20, Dizard) reported, "The government's massive, technologically ambitious project to achieve connectivity between two critical biometric databases took a step forward as the Homeland Security Department and the FBI unveiled an additional pilot project." GCN noted, "The technological core of the data-sharing project involves modifications to the fingerprint comparison engines of the databases, among other changes. The bureau and the department already exchange data about each other's 'worst of the worst' criminal suspects, fugitives and immigration law violators. … The new pilot, which started operation on Feb. 1, will allow the sheriff's office in Harris County, Texas, to tap into additional IDENT records. In a joint press statement, the bureau and the department said that the Harris County Sheriff's Office already had 'booked a person for assault causing bodily injury to a family member and submitted the fingerprints for a background check.'"

Spitzer Supports Freedom Tower Construction, Open To Private Ownership. The New York Times (2/21, Confessore) reports on a downtown news conference of NJ Gov. Jon Corzine, Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Gov. Spitzer, who officially "changed his mind" about Freedom Tower construction, an issue he once referred to as "a white elephant." Amid criticism of the tower's "size, expense and design, as well as its failure to interest non-government tenants," Spitzer said he supported the construction of the tower, but the remarks were made "with no great enthusiasm," according to the Times. Spitzer said of his support, "This should not be interpreted to mean that this is the project I would have designed at its initiation. But where we are today, this is clearly the best and the wisest alternative." The paper adds, "Like Mr. Spitzer, Mr. Corzine and Mr. Bloomberg appeared more relieved than elated, a sign of how tumultuous the rebuilding effort has been since the Sept. 11 attacks." Spitzer also "seemed to wade" into the WTC memorial controversy by saying there was "room for discussion" when it comes to ordering the victims' names. Spitzer also promised not to hold a press conference "every time a brick is added to the foundation or a column goes up," which was an "apparent swipe" at former Gov. Pataki's public relations approach to ground zero. Pataki spokesman David Catalfamo responded, "I'm not sure if it was one too many or one too few press conferences. What I do know is that today's announcement is a reaffirmation of the vision advanced by Governor Pataki and a sign that the progress at the site will continue unabated." The AP (2/20, Westfeldt) notes that both Govs. Corzine and Spitzer support Freedom Tower construction and a proposal to sell the skyscraper to a private company. Corzine called this proposal "good public policy," but Spitzer said, "We will entertain these options if and when they arise." Like the Times, the AP notes that Spitzer changed his mind because of "a booming commercial real estate market and the need to move forward with long-delayed rebuilding." Focusing solely on the WTC Memorial, the AP (2/20) reports, "Bloomberg has said several times that his decision on how to arrange names of the dead around the Sept. 11 memorial is final. But Gov. Eliot Spitzer on Tuesday said that there was still time to talk about it."

Local Television. Teasing its lead story, NBC-TV New York (2/20, 6:00 p.m.) says Gov. Spitzer is "no longer likening the Freedom Tower to a white elephant," adding that he has "made no secret of the fact that he is not a fan." Yesterday however, Spitzer announced "he wouldn't place any roadblocks in the Freedom Tower's way," so the current design "is here to stay." Bloomberg said of Govs. Spitzer and Corzine's support, "This should put to rest any doubt about the Freedom Tower." Spitzer also said that he does not oppose, on a philosophical level, selling the Freedom Tower to a private entity that would have the responsibility of building, leasing and owning the tower. Similar reports were featured prominently in the front of several broadcasts, including WNYT-TV Albany (11:06 p.m.), RNEWS Rochester (8:01 p.m.), WCBS-TV New York (6:03 p.m.), WNYW-TV New York (6:09 p.m.), WBNG-TV Binghamton (5:33 p.m.) and WABC-TV New York (12:04 p.m.).

Enrollment Doubles For Bellevue's WTC Treatment Program. After the city gave Bellevue Hospital Center millions to treat sick people excluded from other 9/11 treatment programs, the New York Times (2/21, Depalma) says "the number of people being treated at the W.T.C. Environmental Health Center at Bellevue Hospital has doubled to more than 900. Several hundred more people are on a waiting list, including many low-income residents of Chinatown and the Lower East Side, and immigrant workers without health insurance. … Dr. Joan Reibman, a pulmonologist who directs the center, said that most of her patients had not been exposed to the dust as intensively as firefighters and workers who toiled on the debris pile, but that they might have been affected by the contaminated air nonetheless."

WSJournal Critical Of Attempt To Give Bargaining Rights To TSA Workers. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) editorializes, "Democrats figure they owe Big Labor for helping them take Congress, and now comes the payback. Tucked away in House and Senate bills that purport to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission is a provision that the Commission most assuredly did not recommend: collective bargaining rights for the Transportation Safety Administration's 43,000 airport screeners." Democrats "are betting the White House won't have the nerve to veto an otherwise popular, if ill-understood, bill over this single provision. Our guess is that if Mr. Bush did veto such a bill, he'd find public sympathy for an argument that he was protecting a vital national security function from being corrupted by union politics."

Louisiana Levee Plans Said to Leave Rural Towns With Pre-Katrina Protection. USA Today (2/21, A1, Heath, 2.27M) reports on its front page that current state and federal plans for Louisiana's levees "would sacrifice dozens of coastal communities, some with thousands of residents, to the next Katrina-sized hurricane. The reason: Protecting them would cost too much." And though Randy Hanchey of the Louisiana's Department of Natural Resources said officials "believe that it's probably not possible to provide adequate protection that people should be living down there," the state has yet to encourage "residents to move from those areas. … Most of the places that would be outside the new barriers are rural towns slung along the few remaining patches of high ground near the receding coast. A draft of the state's plan released this month shows new levees would exclude areas that were home to more than 20,000 people before hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit."

WAR NEWS:

Reid Says Senate Will Seek Modification Of War Authorization. The AP (2/21, Riley) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "said Senate Democrats may move ahead on Monday with an effort to limit the 2002 measure authorizing Bush's use of force in Iraq. That move is planned despite a warning from Senate Republicans that it's certain to be vetoed and the veto would be upheld." Reid "repeated his statement that Iraq 'is the worst foreign policy blunder in the history of our country.' He said the war can't be won militarily, and what's needed is a political and regional solution that involves those with 'a larger stake in the neighborhood,' including Iran."

Democratic Candidates Stake Out Nuanced Positions On Iraq War Authorization. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Barabak, 850K) reports Democratic presidential candidates "may be united in opposing the war in Iraq, but "that hasn't stopped them from fighting over the conflict. It is a skirmish over judgment, character and political mettle. Sen. Barack Obama "stresses his opposition to the invasion from the start and says those who voted to authorize the war, only to come around later, are at least partly to blame for today's problems. It shows, Obama says, the decision-making capacity each candidate would bring to the White House." Former Sen. John Edwards, "who has apologized for his initial war vote, suggests Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has been too measured in her opposition. Implicit is the notion that a calculating front-runner has shaped her views more out of political consideration than principle." Clinton "has sharpened her tone and stepped up her antiwar rhetoric, but has not apologized for her initial stance on the war."

Sestak Seeks Withdrawal Of US Forces In Iraq By The End Of The Year. McClatchy (2/21, Schoof) reports Rep. Joe Sestak, who "commanded a carrier battle group in combat near Afghanistan, then in the Persian Gulf in the run-up to the Iraq war," has "introduced a bill calling for withdrawing all American forces from Iraq by the end of this year, while strengthening the U.S. military presence in the region and in Afghanistan." Sestak's bill "would cut off most money for military operations in Iraq by Dec. 31. … The main reason, he said, is that the war in Iraq is hurting American national security: It's diverted resources and attention from the fight against terrorism in Afghanistan and from other challenges to U.S. interests around the world." McClatchy notes Sestak "rejects the worst-case scenario arguments that Iraq will descend into genocide and a regional war if the United States leaves. … Iraqi sectarian leaders would realize that without the American military holding down the violence, 'they would have to accept the consequences that if they go too far, the retaliation against them might go too far.'"

Bush Reportedly Confident Democrats Will Not De-Fund Iraq War. The White House Bulletin (2/20) reported that President Bush "is confident that congressional Democrats won't be able to muster support for withdrawing from Iraq no matter what legislative gambit they use, according to White House officials. Bush, believing he retains a strong position on Capitol Hill regarding the war, at least for now, is much more focused on what's happening in the field rather than on the jockeying in Congress." White House strategists predict Senate Republicans "will serve as a bulwark against unwise actions by the House over the long term." White House spokesman Tony Snow told the Bulletin, "Pretty soon Congress is going to have to make a binding commitment to support the troops." White House officials "don't think that majority Democrats, in the end, will have the votes or the gumption to vote down the funding."

Cheney Says US Won't Back "Policy Of Retreat." The AP (2/21, Talmadge) reports from Japan, "Vice President Dick Cheney reaffirmed the Bush administration's commitment to the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq during a visit to a U.S. aircraft carrier Wednesday, saying 'the American people will not support a policy of retreat.'" He "was given a 19-gun salute as he boarded the USS Kitty Hawk at [Yokosuka naval base] just south of Tokyo."

Most Vulnerable House Republicans Endorsed Bush's "Surge." The Hill (2/21, Blake) reports, "Three months ago, the unpopularity of President Bush and the Iraq war led many House Republicans to the closest reelection bids of their careers. Now, most of those with freshly painted targets on their backs have given Democrats an early vote to tie them to Bush and the war. … Nearly all of those who narrowly survived in 2006 voted with Bush, possibly providing future opponents with campaign fodder." According to the Hill, of the 17 House Republicans who voted with Democrats on the resolution, "only one of them," Rep. James Walsh, "was among the approximately 20 House Republicans who won in 2006 by less than 5 percent." Rep. Christopher Shays "beat back an anti-war challenger by 3 percent in November, while he watched his two Connecticut Republican colleagues fall," but voted against the Democrats' resolution.

White House Points To GOP Frontrunners' Support For Bush's Iraq Policies. The White House Bulletin (2/20) reported, "White House strategists are heartened that the three leading candidates for the Republican presidential nomination -- Rudy Giuliani, John McCain, and Mitt Romney -- are holding firm in support of President Bush's Iraq policy -- insisting on victory. The strategists point out that Bush remains popular with conservative Republicans across the country and the candidates don't want to alienate those voters in the primaries and caucuses by distancing themselves too much from their president. 'No one wants to run as the anti-Bush,' says one West Wing insider -- at least not the perceived frontrunners."

Right, Left-Wing Activists Target Incumbents Over Surge Resolution Votes. The Washington Times (2/21, Ward, 88K) reports, "Anti-war groups are following members of Congress home during their week off, while groups who support the war are targeting those they call 'white flag Republicans' for defeat in the 2008 elections. The anti-war movement has 'very high expectations for this Congress,' said former Rep. Tom Andrews, Maine Democrat and national director of Win Without War. … The anti-war coalition has created a list of public events for senators and representatives who support the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Mr. Andrews' group is urging anti-war activists across the country to attend these events and persuade their members of Congress to stop supporting the surge. Tomorrow, MoveOn will deliver letters to congressional offices, urging Congress to use its 'power of the purse' to stop the surge by constraining or cutting off funding." Conservative radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt's Victory Caucus is looking for primary opponents for the 17 congressmen and seven senators who opposed the president's surge plan.

Liberal Activists Upset By Centrist Democrats Target Tauscher. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Eilperin, Grunwald, 690K), in a long front-page article, reports, "The Democratic majority was only three weeks old, but by Jan. 26, the grass-roots and Net-roots activists of the party's left wing had already settled on their new enemy: Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), the outspoken chair of the centrist New Democrat Coalition. Progressive blogs…were bashing her as a traitor to her party." MoveOn.org activists "were accusing her of helping President Bush send more troops to Iraq." According to the Post, "The anti-Tauscher backlash illustrates how the Democratic takeover has energized and emboldened the party's liberal base, ratcheting up the pressure on the party's moderates. That pressure is also reaching House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Pelosi "has clashed with Tauscher in the past, but she's now eager to hold together her diverse caucus and to avoid the mistakes of GOP leaders who routinely ignored their moderates." Tauscher "has annoyed the left by supporting legislation to scale back the estate tax, tighten bankruptcy rules and promote free-trade agreements"

Few, If Any, House Members Read Full NIE On Iraq. The Hill (2/21, Soraghan) reports, "During last week's war debate, House members repeatedly cited the new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. … But it seems very few, if any, House members read the full, classified version of the report. That 90-page tome is now available to all representatives, thanks to a surprise decision by the House Intelligence Committee a week before the debate. A sampling by The Hill could not find a single House member who had trekked to the committee's secure office in the Capitol to view the classified version of the document. When asked, many said that they had read only the three-and-a-half-page declassified summary of 'key judgments' that the office of the director of national intelligence released earlier this month."

Wave Of Attacks Seen As Evidence That Iraqi Insurgents Are Adapting To US Tactics. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 3, :25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that US troops in Baghdad "are continuing a security crackdown and Iraqi militants are responding by stepping up attacks. Today, car bombs and a suicide bomber killed at least 17 Iraqi civilians. And just north of Baghdad, a bomb destroyed a tanker filled with chlorine gas. At least nine people died. 150 got sick from the fumes. Officials say the explosive was planted under the tanker."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Berthelsen, 850K) reports that "several car bombings, shootings and explosions" in Iraq yesterday "suggested insurgents were finding new ways to evade the ongoing security crackdown by U.S. and Iraqi forces. At least six people were killed in what authorities described as a crude attempt to detonate a chemical weapon in Taji, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad. Insurgents blew up a truck holding two tanks of chlorine gas, which were thrown clear of the vehicle and leaked, the U.S. military said. Scores of people suffered nausea, vomiting and irritated eyes from exposure to the gas, according to wire service reports. Prolonged exposure to high concentrations of the gas can cause deadly respiratory damage. … In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, a bomb Monday evening caused severe damage to a provincial office of the Iraqi National Accord, the party of former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who returned to Iraq last week in a bid to unify the nation's political factions."

Sophisticated SAM Used To Bring Down US Helicopter. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Tyson, 690K) reports Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, deputy U.S. commander in Iraq, "said yesterday that Sunni fighters probably used a sophisticated SA-14 or SA-16 shoulder-fired missile to shoot down a Marine helicopter on Feb. 7, killing all seven people on board. If confirmed…it would mark the first time since last summer that insurgents in Iraq struck U.S. aircraft with such an anti-aircraft missile, and it would provide fresh evidence of a new strategy of targeting helicopters. … The attack in Anbar province was the latest in a string of seven U.S. military and civilian helicopter downings in Iraq since last month. U.S. commanders say that Sunni and Shiite extremist groups have begun to use deadly strikes in a new and carefully planned effort to rally support for their causes." According to the Post, "The strategy of stepping up the targeting of U.S. helicopters, revealed in recently captured insurgent documents, was devised specifically to counter the U.S. and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad," Simmons said.

US Officials Wary Of Entering Relatively Stable Sadr City. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Daragahi, 850K) reports U.S. and Iraqi forces "have moved aggressively in the past week to combat Sunni Arab insurgents" in Baghdad neighborhoods, but now "the forces face their most sensitive challenge: whether, when and how to move into the Shiite-dominated slum of Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi army militia." Sunnis "have long accused Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki of allowing Sadr City to remain a safe haven for militias in order to maintain popular support from al-Sadr's followers. … U.S. and Iraqi military commanders "are concerned that if they move too aggressively, they could sabotage one of the few success stories in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Even amid the bloodshed across Baghdad, customers fill Sadr City's shops. Construction workers repair its streets and sewage lines. Children play soccer on its dusty fields and walk to school along newly prettified squares, verdant emblems of progress in one of Iraq's most long-deprived quarters." The Times notes, "U.S. officials in Iraq have gone to pains not to depict Sadr City as a singular source of trouble."

82nd Airborne Establishes Presence Near Sadr City As Part Of New Strategy. Fox News's Special Report (2/20, Hume) reported, "Additional US troops are already patrolling one especially dangerous neighborhood in Baghdad. Despite their unpleasant living conditions, their morale is high…and they appear to have been well received." Fox went on to report, "In an abandoned and looted shopping mall in a formerly well-to-do Baathist community is now the home of the White Falcons, part of the 82nd Airborne. … The new mission, the so-called 'surge.' Here…it actually looks like one." According to Fox, "Four more brigades are scheduled to move into Baghdad over the next couple of months, bringing the total of additional troops to 17500." The 82nd Airborne's staging area "is in some of the most contentious neighborhoods in the city. … The area of operations will include areas including and adjacent to Sadr City."

Operations In Outlying Villages Key To New Baghdad Strategy. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The security plan for Baghdad is a fight not only in the teeming streets of the capital but also in places like this, a Sunni-dominated village on the northern outskirts, where U.S. commanders say the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq is terrorizing Shiite residents, planning attacks on Americans and funneling explosives into Baghdad along a network of country roads. Hundreds of U.S. soldiers…pushed into Ibrahim bin Ali village Saturday morning for a two-day operation designed to take back the hamlet from insurgents and catalogue every fighting-age male in the village. 'This is a large part of the Baghdad security plan because this helps disrupt [al-Qaeda in Iraq] movement and foreign fighter movement into Baghdad,' said Maj. Chad Shields, a company commander."

US Officials Find Themselves In Middle Of Scandal Sparked By Rape Case. The New York Times (2/21, Santora, 1.16M) reports that "a 20-year-old Sunni woman from Baghdad appeared on the satellite television station Al Jazeera on Monday night with a horrific account of kidnapping and sexual assault at the hands of three officers in the Shiite-dominated Iraqi National Police. … Almost immediately, Shiite leaders lined up to condemn the woman, calling her charges propaganda aimed at undermining the new security campaign. Sunni politicians offered the woman their support. Whatever the truth of the accusation, though, it played to sectarian fears on both sides." The Times notes, "The Americans, who have advisers working with the Iraqi National Police, found themselves caught in the middle without answers. The woman said the Americans had rescued her from the officers and gave her medical treatment. … The American military said only that it was investigating the charges."

The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Londono, 690K) reports he woman said neighbors alerted U.S. soldiers that she had been arrested, which led to her release. She was admitted to Ibn Sina Hospital, which is run by the U.S. military. Iraqis treated there are generally admitted at the request of U.S. officials. 'The woman was here,' a hospital spokesman, 1st Lt. Justin Kocher, said Tuesday night. 'She received the care she needed,' he added, declining to elaborate." Maliki "injected himself into the case, issuing a news release announcing that the government had convened a committee to investigate and would hold the perpetrators responsible. … Hours later, Maliki reversed course, issuing another statement calling the woman an impostor and a criminal with three outstanding warrants. 'After confirming the falsehood of these claims,' it said, Maliki 'has ordered that these distinguished officers be honored.'"

Blair To Announce Partial Withdrawal Of Troops From Iraq. The New York Times (2/21, A12, Cowell, 1.16M) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair is expected to announce Wednesday "that up to 1,500 of the 7,000 British troops in southern Iraq will begin withdrawing in coming weeks," the British news media reported today, quoting unidentified sources. An official spokesman for the prime minister "declined to confirm widespread reports in newspapers and from the BBC about a withdrawal, saying that Parliament should be informed first of any such move." In Washington, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said that "while the United Kingdom is maintaining a robust force in southern Iraq, we're pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis." Johndroe added that President Bush and Blair had spoken to each another on Tuesday and that Bush "sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad." Blair's plans to reduce troop levels in Iraq is "a marked contrast" to Bush's plans to increase troop levels.

Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) also said Bush spoke to Blair yesterday and that a National Security Council spokesman says the US and great Britain "share the same goal of turning over responsibility to Iraqi forces and reducing the number of coalition troops in Iraq."

The Financial Times (2/21, Blitz) says the number will be reduced "by about 1,600," paving the way "for Iraqi forces to begin taking control of the city of Basra." In a statement to the House of Commons, Blair "will present the reduction in troop numbers as an initially modest move that does not undermine the UK's fighting capability." For Blair, Wednesday's announcement "is highly symbolic. After being dogged by the debacle in Iraq for nearly four years, today's statement allows him to leave office conveying the impression -- albeit a limited one -- that the UK intervention has had some success." However, the announcement "will be watched with anxiety by politicians across the political divide in the US" as Bush seeks support for his plan to increase troop levels.

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 2, :55, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The White House says this is no surprise." Bush and Blair "have been talking about this since last summer. … The White House spokesman says what's happening with the British troops, they'd like to have it be a model for what happens for the US troops. In other words, the Iraqi security forces are able to handle more of its own security, the need for coalition troops diminishing. We should point out, however, the area of Iraq the British troops were responsible for is much less prone to sectarian violence."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 2, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This was not a surprise at the White House but it is something they're being asked to respond to tonight." NBC (Gregory) said "this is the kind of announcement that…Bush wanted to make last spring about the gradual withdrawal of US troops. That wasn't the case and of course now there is this so-called surge in place."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, lead story, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) also asked, "What does this do to the Bush Administration's so-called troop surge as it gets underway and as more American fighters make their way now to Iraq where they may have to fight without their British partners?" NBC added that "unlike Baghdad and the Sunni triangle, the overwhelmingly Shiite population of the south is relatively calm. British casualties since the New Year there numbered just six shoulders."

The Washington Times (2/21, 88K) notes the British "handed over security responsibility for two of their four provinces to Iraqis last year and abandoned their main base in a third." Their forces are "concentrated in Basra itself and at a nearby air base. Commanders say they hope to withdraw from the city and keep a reserve force on standby at the base."

DOJ_NMG_0134394

The CBS Evening News (2/20, lead story, 1:05, Phillips, 7.66M) reported, "The British say this withdrawal is possible because they've been handing over more and more responsibility to Iraqi troops in their area. But…Blair has also been under huge political pressure at home to come up with a withdrawal plan from what has become a very unpopular war."

ABC World News (2/20, story 4, 1:20, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "the British have turned it over to the Iraqis and all I can say is it might be more secure than other areas. … The British have obligations in Afghanistan. They want to send more troops in Afghanistan. They're stretched thin. Does that sound familiar?"

The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/21, A6) notes Blair is not expected to provide a deadline for "when the rest of Britain's forces would leave Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Murphy, 850K) reports, "The expected announcement to Parliament on Wednesday, which the prime minister's office refused to confirm, follows the British government's pledge to consider drawing down troops this year as the Iraqi military and police shoulder more responsibility for quelling sectarian violence." An "important signal came earlier this week, when Blair announced that a program to place Iraqi troops to take 'main frontline control' of security in the southern city of Basra had been 'successful,' clearing the way for British troops to assume a largely supportive role." USA Today (2/21, Jackson, Stinson, 2.27M) notes "Jeffrey White, an Iraq military expert at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the move is 'not a good news story from the point of view of security.' A former Mideast analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency, White said the British presence in southern Iraq 'acted as a check on a whole slew of bad guys.'"

Maliki Government Demolishing Famous War Monument Built By Saddam. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A6, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "a Shiite with ties to Tehran," ordered the dismantling of Baghdad's "best-known landmark -- the giant crossed-sword arches built by Saddam Hussein after the Iran-Iraq War." The Journal notes, "The Shiite Muslim parties that dominate Iraq's government had quietly given orders to dismantle the statues, which have dominated the capital's skyline for 17 years. … For other Americans and Iraqis, however, it was cause for alarm -- and concern that the demolition of the monument" would "further fuel the country's intensifying sectarian strife and become another symbol of the central government's increasingly hard-line stance toward Iraq's Sunni Muslim minority." However, "Early yesterday afternoon, Iraqi officials began alerting U.S. embassy staffers that a demolition order had been given."

Deaths Of Soldiers From Small Towns Erode Support For Iraq War. ABC World News (2/20, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is new analysis of the military deaths that have occurred in Iraq. Small towns are quietly burying much of the brunt of loss. The findings by the Associated Press are not terribly surprising, as there is a disproportionate amount of troops that come from small communities in the military. But as we've seen so many times, when a small town loses a soldier, it reverberates throughout the town and affects that town in profound ways." ABC added that "nearly half the 3,100 American military fatalities in Iraq came from small towns. One out of five, from those with less than 5,000 residents, many of them poor communities. … The different reality involves dwindling support for the war in rural America, where it was once strongest. Down from 73% three years ago to 39% today."

Plan To Resettle Iraqi Christians In US Proves Controversial. Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) reported, "Since the war in Iraq began four years ago, fewer than 500 Iraqis have been permitted to live in the US, even though an estimated 2 million refugees have fled Iraq. Post 911 security concerns are cited as the main reason, but the Bush Administration recently announced a change in that policy. A change that is not sitting well with everyone." Last week, the State Department "announced that 7000 refugees will be resettled in the US in the next year." Chaldean Christian say Muslim militias "routinely bomb their churches. Last spring, the Chaldean Federation of America launched a project to resettle 200,000 Chaldeans uprooted by the war. Volunteers say 17,000 Chaldean Christians, many of whom did translation or intelligence work for US troops, submitted applications to live in the US, most of them now living in limbo in middle eastern countries." A founder of the Minuteman Project "questions why President Bush wants to roll out the welcome mat for additional Iraqi refugees." Fox notes that "also critical of the refugee resettlement" is Ohio Democratic Gov. Ted Strickland. He "says he's sympathetic, but "would not want Ohioans to accept a greater burden than they already have borne for the Bush administration's failed policies." However, "after newspaper editorials blasted him, he apologized."

Suicide Bomber Wounds Six US Soldiers In Kabul. The New York Times (2/21, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "A suicide bomber disguised as a doctor blew himself up Tuesday morning at the opening of a hospital ward built by American forces in eastern Afghanistan, wounding six American soldiers as they tackled him at the entrance, officials said. An American soldier was also killed farther north, in Kunar Province, on Monday, the United States military reported." The Times adds, "An Afghan security officer and an American soldier had stopped the man, and when he tried to escape, the soldier grabbed him, the governor said. The man was shot in the leg, and then set off the bomb, he said. A hospital staff member was wounded."

WPost Says Bush Allowing Al Qaeda A "Safe Heaven" In Pakistan. The Washington Post (2/21, 690K) editorializes, "We know now that allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven can have terrible consequences for US homeland security. And yet the Bush administration appears to be letting the threat develop again [in Pakistan]. ... Such indulgence, which has gone on for five years while [Gen. Pervez Musharraf] has tempered his action against Islamic extremists and suppressed Pakistan's pro-Western democratic parties, will be hard to defend if the consequences of allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven are unchanged."

Interim Northern California US Attorney Sworn In. The Bay City News Service (2/21) reports, "A career federal prosecutor was sworn in at a ceremony in San Francisco today as the interim U.S. attorney for Northern California." BCNS continues, "Scott Schools, 44, who previously worked for the U.S. Justice Department in South Carolina and Washington D.C., was given the oath of office by Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker. … Schools told a courtroom gathering of federal lawyers and several judges, 'I'm very excited and honored to be here.'" BCNS adds, "Schools was appointed last week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to replace Kevin Ryan, who served in the top federal lawyer's job in San Francisco for 4 1/2 years. … Schools said after the swearing-in that he was about to hold his first meeting with his staff and was planning to tell the federal lawyers 'what my hopes and expectations are' for the job. … Schools will be in charge of about 115 lawyers in San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose who handle federal criminal cases as well as civil cases involving the U.S. government in coastal California from Monterey to the Oregon border." BCNS notes, "Under a provision of the federal Patriot Act reauthorization last year, Schools can remain in office as interim chief until a presidentially appointed U.S. attorney is confirmed by the Senate, which could be for the remaining two years of the Bush Administration. … Until the law was changed last year, the U.S. attorney general could appoint an interim U.S. attorney for only four months, after which the power to make a temporary appointment moved to the local federal court. … U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, has criticized the change in the law on the ground that it can be used to bypass the Senate confirmation process."

More Commentary. The Providence Journal (2/21) editorializes, "The U.S. Senate should extend its inquiry into why the Bush administration has forced at least seven U.S. attorneys out of office. By tradition, presidents appoint these federal prosecutors when they first enter office. President Bush replaced nearly all those who had been appointed by Bill Clinton; President Clinton had done much the same before him. But it is odd for a president to remove his own choices, especially if they are performing adequately." The Journal continues, "One who got the boot, Carol Lam, oversaw the corruption investigation that put California GOP Rep. Randy Cunningham in prison. Two others targeted in the probe, Kyle Foggo and Brent Wilkes, were indicted just last week. Until retiring last spring, Mr. Foggo was the No. 3 official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Mr. Wilkes is a San Diego-area defense contractor. The indictments were handed up just a few days before Ms. Lam's scheduled departure, raising the question of whether there was more to come — and whether it will now be pursued. … Also out is Bush supporter H.E. Cummins III, a U.S. attorney in Arkansas credited with stepping up prosecutions of drug and gun cases. He is being replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former deputy to presidential adviser Karl Rove. Another casualty, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, took on backdated stock options and steroid use by Major League Baseball players." The Journal concludes, "Some Democrats are pushing for a return to the old system, which seems better insulated from executive whims. The more heavily politicized these offices become, the less independently U.S. attorneys will act. The ultimate casualty is justice."

The Tri-City Herald (Kennewick, Paco, & Richland (WA), (2/21) editorializes, "The firing of federal prosecutor John McKay of Seattle is lamentable, but the job of U.S. attorney is - always has been - steeped in politics. … And some of politics, sadly, is steeped in lying. … So the explanations out of the Department of Justice that McKay and five other U.S. attorneys were fired for 'performance' issues call into question the source." The Herald continues, "Seven months before McKay was forced to resign, he received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators, The Seattle Times reported. … Underscoring the mendacious assertions of 'performance problems' by the Washington, D.C., bureaucracy is the discovery that at least four more of the six attorneys fired had recently received similarly positive evaluations of their job performance." The Herald adds, "There's little doubt that McKay and at least most of the others weren't treated fairly. But fairness is separated from politics by more than just 605 pages in Webster's New World Dictionary. … It shouldn't work this way, but U.S. attorney appointments - and jobs - are among the most political in the country."

DOJ Among Least Trusted Federal Agencies On Privacy Matters. National Journal's Technology Daily (2/21, Noyes) reports, "The CIA, Homeland Security Department and National Security Agency are the least trusted federal agencies when it comes to protecting Americans' privacy, according to a new study by the Ponemon Institute." Tech Daily continues, "The annual survey, which will be released Wednesday, asked more than 7,000 citizens whether they believe the government takes appropriate steps to safeguard personal information. Answers were mixed, but the overall trend suggested a decline in public trust since the think tank first studied the issue in 2004." Tech Daily adds, "The NSA has suffered a substantial flogging by lawmakers and privacy advocates amid questions in the past year over its domestic spying in search of terrorists. It also was revealed recently that the CIA has been utilizing a special subpoena power of the 2001 anti-terrorism law known as the USA PATRIOT Act to comb bank and credit-card records. … Homeland Security and the Transportation Security Administration, which were evaluated separately in the survey, have experienced their fair share of controversy over the mining of information from government and commercial databases and a program that screens travelers entering the United States." Tech Daily notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office also was among the least trusted of the 74 federal entities included in the poll. … 'There's a clear correlation between bad publicity and poor privacy trust performance,' survey author Larry Ponemon said. Previous studies 'lacked a big headline negative event,' whereas this time, there were several."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Attorney Accidentally Discloses Mercury Backdating Document. The California Recorder (2/21, Graham) reports, "A fourth-year associate at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe inadvertently disclosed a sensitive document about stock option backdating that the firm has spent the last five months fighting to keep under seal." The Recorder continues, "The document -- a complaint in a shareholder derivative action against former executives of Mercury Interactive Corp. -- contains explosive allegations against the executives and quotes extensively from e-mails in which the executives allegedly discuss backdating their own stock options. … 'What do you want to do about [Chief Financial Officer Douglas Smith]'s option since the price is going up?' former General Counsel Susan Skaer is quoted asking CEO Amnon Landon in one e-mail. 'Keep waiting?'" The Recorder adds, "The complaint, Morillo v. Abrams, 1:05-cv-50710, had been filed under seal on Sept. 22 as part of a confidentiality agreement with the executives' lawyers -- but without judicial approval. The Recorder and two other news organizations have been trying since then to unseal the complaint and its supporting exhibits. … But a Dow Jones News Service reporter discovered Friday that Orrick associate M. Todd Scott had inadvertently filed the complaint publicly with a motion to stay the derivative action in October. The Wall Street Journal posted the complaint on its Web site over the weekend and wrote a story about it on page A-4 of Tuesday's print edition." The Recorder notes, "In a filing for an emergency hearing on Tuesday, Orrick partner James Kramer wrote that Scott thought the complaint had been filed under seal when Scott included it as an exhibit to his own declaration. … 'At the time the exhibit was filed, counsel for Ms. Skaer intended for the exhibit to be filed under seal, and, indeed, believed the exhibit had been filed under seal,' Kramer wrote. 'Counsel continued in this belief until the afternoon of Feb. 16, 2007, at which time the court clerk notified all parties that the exhibit had not been filed under seal and was publicly available.' … The Mercury executives -- represented by Orrick; Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati; Shearman & Sterling; and Farella Braun & Martel -- have been fighting vigorously against The Recorder, the San Francisco Chronicle and Bloomberg to keep the complaint confidential. The executives succeeded in January in getting the derivative action dismissed for lack of standing, but shortly thereafter Santa Clara County, Calif., Judge James Kleinberg ordered that the complaint be unsealed nevertheless."

Fannie Mae Won't Pay Bonuses To Executives. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Hagerty, Paletta, 2.04M) reports, "Fannie Mae, struggling to atone for a $6.3 billion accounting scandal, announced that it won't pay $44.4 million of shares in the company previously promised as bonuses to 46 current and former executives. The giant provider of funding for US home mortgages said it will 'take into income' that amount, previously expensed for unpaid share awards that were based on earnings growth that proved illusory." The decision "will cancel planned payments totaling about $11.4 million for former Chief Executive Officer Franklin D. Raines; $4.1 million for the current CEO, Daniel Mudd; and $3.4 million for a former chief financial officer, Timothy Howard, a spokesman said. … Among other current senior executives, Robert Levin, chief business officer, will miss out on about $2 million of shares; Michael Williams, chief operating officer, $1.9 million; and Peter Niculescu, executive vice president, $600,000. The planned awards were for incentive-pay cycles that ended in 2003 and 2004."

The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports, "The awards, known as 'performance shares,' were one component of overall pay packages that typically included salaries, cash bonuses, stock options and other forms of compensation. The stock awards were granted on a rolling schedule, based on the company's performance over various three-year periods. For instance, executives had already received the first installment of awards for a cycle covering 2001 through 2003, and the board is not trying to reclaim that money, spokesman Chuck Greener said. Those awards were worth $4.1 million to Raines, $1.4 million to Howard and $1.8 million to Mudd." Regulators "have alleged that Fannie Mae's senior management intentionally manipulated the company's accounting to hit earnings targets and maximize bonuses. Raines's pay totaled more than $90 million from 1998 through 2003, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said last year."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Lawyers Make Closing Arguments At Libby Trial. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 5, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that "the jury heard closing arguments in the trial of Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby is accused of lying to Federal agents and a grand jury of when he first learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson. Prosecutors told the jury today there is a cloud over the Vice President's role in the case because they say Libby obstructed justice. The defense contends Libby did nothing wrong and the case is about faulty memories." Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) noted, "Deputy prosecutor Peter Zeiderberg said that what Scooter Libby did was not a case of bad memory, but lying pure and simple. … Fitzgerald got the last word saying that the Vice President's office was obsessed with the Wilson trip and used his wife as a weapon against him."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 4, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported noted, "Once again, one of our own was a key topic today." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "Lies to protect the White House. Lies to prevent political embarrassment. Lies to save a powerful job. That's the motive prosecutors methodically laid out today against…Libby. … But in a fiery, passionate appeal for Libby's freedom, his lawyer, Ted Wells, called this prosecution madness. Wells repeatedly zeroed in on Russert's credibility," and he "urged the jury not to let politics influence its verdict. 'Don't in this case sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or the Bush Administration.' And prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald got political too, saying because Libby lied and obstructed justice, 'a cloud still hangs over the Vice President.'"

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/21, Apuzzo) reports, "Zeidenberg pointed to a flow chart showing arrows tracking information from several officials to Libby and on to other sources. With each conversation, it became less likely the CIA operative would just slip Libby's mind, Zeidenberg said. Wells presented a similar chart. Under each name and photograph, however, Wells noted their memory inconsistencies. Some changed their stories. Others seemed less certain in FBI interviews than they did on the stand." USA Today (2/21, 8A, Willing, 2.27M) notes "a tearful" Wells told jurors, "Don't … sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or about the Bush administration." However, Fitzgerald said Libby "threw sand in eyes of the FBI and grand jurors, he obstructed justice and he stole the truth from the judicial system."

Under the headline "Libby's Memory Is At The Heart Of The Case," the Los Angeles Times (2/21, Schmitt, Miller, 850K) also notes "Fitzgerald argued that Cheney's office was behind many of the prewar claims that Iraq had stockpiles of banned weapons and that it had aggressively sought to silence critics. 'Let's talk straight,' he said. 'There is a cloud over the vice president.'" The Times adds that Fitzgerald "opened his statement with an outburst. 'Madness! Madness! Outrageous!' he shouted, mocking the language of the defense attorneys who had sought to portray the case against their client as an overreach by a zealous prosecutor. The jurors, surprised by the unexpected display, perked up noticeably. But their attention waned as Fitzgerald spent an hour reviewing evidence, often talking so fast that it was hard to make out his words." The New York Times (2/21, Lewis, 1.16M) notes that "the prosecutors presented a detailed and businesslike summing up of their case," while Wells "countered with an intensely emotional defense ending in a choked sob."

The Financial Times (2/21, Daniel) and Washington Post (2/21, A4, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) similarly report on the closing arguments, while Dana Milbank writes in his Washington Post (2/21, A2, 690K) "Washington Sketch" column that Wells "may yet win an acquittal from the jury, which will start deliberations today. But it won't be because of the cohesion of his closing arguments. Libby was alternately portrayed as a man who told the truth, a man who inadvertently misspoke, and the victim of conspiracies involving everybody from President Bush to Tim Russert." Milbank notes, "Wells returned repeatedly to a note written by Vice President Cheney expressing concern that Libby was being sacrificed to protect others."

The Washington Post (2/21, C1, Weeks, 690K) also runs a generally sympathetic profile of Wells, noting that "through conversations and e-mails with friends, colleagues, his mother and others who know him well, a portrait emerges of a tough defense attorney who has mastered the balance between easygoing and hard-charging. Often he stands up for the Big Guy, comforting the comfortable. … After all, somebody has got to do it."

Isikoff Says Fitzgerald "Made It Clear" Libby Was "Protecting" Cheney. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/20, Matthews) Newsweek's Michael Isikoff said, "What today's closing arguments really underscored is why the White House was so nervous about this trial, why they were so reluctant to talk anything about it. One thing Patrick Fitzgerald said in his closing arguments that kind of stunned me, he…said 'there is a cloud on the vice president, but the cloud is there because Scooter Libby put it there. We, the prosecution, didn't put it there. Scooter Libby put it there by obstructing justice.' And then Fitzgerald ran through everything that Cheney did: writing the talking points, tearing out those articles from the newspaper and making those notes on them – 'did his wife send him a junket?' … Fitzgerald pretty much made it clear to the jury that Libby…was protecting the vice president of the United States."

Meanwhile, Tom DeFrank of the New York Daily News, also on MSNBC's Hardball (2/20, Matthews), said, "It's probably a very good week for the vice president to be in Asia right now because it hasn't been a good week for him." Fitzgerald "put the Vice President on trial, even though he was not charged with anything. But he was very much front and center in this trial from start to finish."

Justice To Launch New Focus On Export Enforcement Cases. The top counterespionage priority for the Justice Department in coming months will be so-called "export enforcement" cases, the sale or transfer of sensitive U.S. technologies to foreign entities or governments, or terrorist groups, J. Patrick Rowan, the new counterespionage and counter terrorism chief at the department told U.S News and the Bulletin. In an exclusive interview, Rowan said that one of his goals is to get the word out to federal prosecutors that the department will support them in pursuing these often complex, previously low-priority cases. "We're not talking about physical pieces of machinery as much as technology," Rowan says. He explained that foreign governments are learning that they can get more critical technical information unwittingly from U.S. graduate students and business people than under the "old model of a bunch of covert operatives sneaking around and hiding stuff behind a tree." With technology becoming increasingly sophisticated, says Rowan, and so much more portable, even a military code, or some kind of dual-use technology sold to a hostile nation or terrorist group could do a great deal of harm. A career prosecutor, Rowan is the deputy assistant attorney general for counter terrorism and counterespionage in the department's new National Security Division, which brings all of the department's national security programs under one umbrella. The division -- headed by the former U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, Kenneth Wainstein -- became operational last summer, and implements a key recommendation of the WMD commission, the presidential commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led to the war in Iraq. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

DOJ Not Planning To Reopen Berger Investigation. The Washington Times (2/21, Seper, 88K) reports the Justice Department "says it is unaware of any new facts to support a call by the former chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee for a new investigation into the theft of National Archives documents by former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger. Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling, in a letter Friday to the committee's new Democratic chairman, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California, said an 'extensive investigation' led to a guilty plea by Mr. Berger in which he admitted removing the classified documents and the department 'stands by its investigation.' … His letter was in response to a report by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and now the committee's ranking member, saying Justice gave Mr. Berger a 'free pass' in its investigation and called for the committee to investigate the matter instead."

National Archives IG's Accusations Against Berger Initially Dismissed By DOJ. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, Smith, 690K) reports, "While waving his own leg in the air in illustration, Paul Brachfeld, inspector general of the National Archives and Records Administration, asked the group rhetorically if 'something white' could be easily mistaken if it was wrapped around their legs, beneath their pant legs. Under debate during the Nov. 23, 2004, meeting was Brachfeld's contention…Berger could have stolen original, uncatalogued, highly classified terrorism documents 14 months earlier by wrapping them around his socks and beneath his pants, as National Archives staff member John Laster reported witnessing. … Brachfeld wanted the Justice Department to notify officials of the 9/11 Commission that Berger's actions -- in combination with a bungled Archives response -- might have obstructed the commission's review of Clinton's terrorism policies. The Justice Department spurned the advice, and some of Brachfeld's colleagues at the Archives greeted his warnings with accusations of disloyalty. But more than three years later, as Brachfeld and House lawmakers have pushed new details about Berger's actions onto the public record -- such as Berger's use of a construction site near the Archives to temporarily hide some of the classified documents -- Brachfeld's contentions have attracted fresh support."

DOJ Probe Of Senator Campbell's Staffers Continues. The Hill (2/21, Soraghan) reports, "It may have been forgotten by many, but the corruption investigation of the office of former Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (R-Colo.) isn't over." The Hill continues, "The FBI and the Justice Department are pursuing the case, records show, nearly three years after it was opened and more than two years after Campbell left office. But charges have yet to be levied and an explanation as to why it's taken so long to wrap up has yet to be offered. … 'I don't understand why it would take so long,' said Tom Gorman, who heads a Denver-based, anti-drug task force and complained to the Justice Department that Campbell's office pressured him to award a no-bid contract. 'It didn't seem to me to be that complicated of a case.' … Campbell, too, said he's eager to put the investigation behind him, stressing that he has been told he is not a subject of the investigation. Investigators have not interviewed Campbell. … 'Senator Campbell is eager to learn the results of the Department of Justice's investigation into the alleged actions of a former staff member,' a Campbell spokeswoman, Kate Dando, said." The Hill notes, "The 'former staffer' is Campbell's onetime chief of staff, Ginnie Kontnik, who resigned just before the allegations surfaced. The Justice Department's anti-corruption unit is investigating a no-bid contract that Campbell and Kontnik tried to steer to a company co-owned by one of Campbell's top fundraisers. More sensationally, Kontnik allegedly shook down an underling for a $2,000 kickback in 2002. … A Jan. 12 letter from the Justice Department Criminal Division, obtained by The Hill, denied a request for documents about the investigation, saying they 'relate to open and on-going law enforcement proceedings being conducted by the Public Integrity Section,' referring to the department's anti-corruption unit. … The letter said releasing documents could interfere with the investigation."

DOJ, FBI Probing Wisconsin Travel Contracts. The AP (2/21, Foley) reports from Madison, WI, "The FBI and the state Department of Justice are continuing their investigation into Gov. Jim Doyle's administration, investigators said." The AP continues, "With one state employee convicted of steering a travel contract to a company with political ties to the governor, the criminal probe "remains open," the state Division of Criminal Investigation said in a letter to The Associated Press. … The disclosure means an investigation that distracted Doyle during his first term in office and gave ammunition to his critics could continue into his second. Doyle has not been accused of wrongdoing and has defended his administration from accusations of corruption." The AP adds, "The news came in DCI administrator James R. Warren's Feb. 14 response to a public records request for documents relating to the agency's investigation of the ravel contract. … Warren turned over more than 50 pages detailing the probe that led to last summer's conviction of Georgia Thompson, a state purchasing supervisor, on federal fraud charges. … But he declined to release an additional 105 pages, including 40 pages of FBI reports, that he said involve 'persons other than those who testified at the trial of Georgia Thompson.' … Their release would undermine the probe, he said. Warren also blacked out the identities of two people from the released records." The AP notes, "Prosecutors said Thompson steered a contract to a company whose executives gave $20,000 to Doyle's re-election campaign. She is serving 18 months in prison. After her trial, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic in Milwaukee told reporters the probe was not over. … Doyle's opponent in the November election, Republican Mark Green, repeatedly claimed Doyle's administration was facing 'an ongoing FBI investigation.' But the probe seemed to fizzle out as months went by with no additional action."

FBI Tennessee Waltz Tapes Show Ford Discussing Rolex From Developer. WREG-TV Memphis (2/20) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Today there is surprising new evidence in the John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case. With video and audiotapes, the FBI says Ford took thousands of dollars in bribes. The hearing this afternoon is about the Rolex watch Ford said he received as a gift from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman. … At one point, Ford is heard saying to an undercover FBI agent that he is going to receive a $50,000 Rolex because he did Hyneman a big favor. … He is on video again later, showing off the Rolex and telling another FBI agent that he paid zero for the watch because he did the developer a big favor by saving them up to $1.5 million dollars." WPTY-TV Memphis (2/20, Buduson) noted, "Ford's lawyers say there's no proof Hyneman gave Ford the watch. On Jan. 31, 2005, Ford changed his story. Ford told an undercover FBI agent he bought the watch. FBI agents acknowledge Hyneman has not saved any money for state environmental violations he faces."

WHBQ-TV Memphis (2/20, Cowman) reported, "Judge J. Daniel Breen did deny the defense's request to suppress the watch due to the way it was seized, saying the government had the right to seize it, but the judge still wants more proof on the relevance of the Rolex before he allows it into trial. … Defense attorneys said the judge probably won't rule on whether the Rolex will be admitted until once the trial has begun." WMC-TV Memphis (2/20) noted, "Hyneman was as evasive outside court Tuesday as he was inside. He pleaded the 5th on every question concerning his relationship with Ford. In other words, he answered nothing."

Memphis Official Calls For City Council Probe Of Edmund Ford Billing Practices. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/21, Jones, 163K) reports, "Chairman Tom Marshall wants the Memphis City Council to investigate billing practices at Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division in regard to fellow Councilman Edmund Ford. The chairman's request Tuesday came the same day The Commercial Appeal reported that a federal grand jury had subpoenaed three years of utility billing information for three of Ford's accounts." The Commercial Appeal adds, "Committee chairwoman Carol Chumney said she agreed to place the matter on March 6 committee agenda. Chumney later said she was open to looking into the matter, but is reserving judgment."

Tennessee Waltz Defendant Cooper Charged With DUI. The Tennessean (2/21, Alligood) reports, "State Sen. Jerry Cooper was legally drunk when he rolled his sport-utility vehicle on Interstate 24 earlier this month after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee Highway Patrol said Tuesday." Cooper, "who was already free on bail on federal fraud charges, was charged with drunken driving and speeding in connection with the Feb. 7 one-vehicle wreck in Rutherford County." The Tennessean notes, "Cooper was seriously injured in the wreck and is convalescing at home from rib fractures, a concussion and a severe arm injury. He will be arrested or required to turn himself in 'when he is physically able,' according to the THP statement."

Man Blames Prison Confession On Alleged Twin Brother. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/21, Shiffman) reports, "Andre L. Henry - who stands accused of violent crimes against a police officer, two banks, two grand-jury witnesses, and eight fast-food restaurants - has offered jurors in his trial an unusual defense. … The man secretly recorded in a prison cell confessing? … Not him, Henry testified. It was his twin brother; they had traded cells in prison. … 'We figured, why not?' Henry told jurors. 'Who would know?'" The Inquirer continues, "A federal jury in Philadelphia is expected to begin deliberating Henry's fate this morning. If convicted of the most violent charges - including car-jacking and solicitation to murder - he probably faces life in prison. … In closing arguments yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle Rotella mocked Henry's assertion, and said the government had provided ample evidence that Henry doesn't have a twin brother. … 'His story is just absurd,' Rotella told the jury." The Inquirer adds, "Federal officials say Henry is an extremely violent man. In addition to the charges in this case, he faces state murder charges and, according to grand jury testimony, was investigated for an alleged plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall. … The alleged 2003 plot against shoppers and commuters at the Center City mall had not been previously reported. Henry was never charged with terror-related crimes; he and his lawyer, Christopher Warren, have denied that any attack was planned. … Jurors in his trial have not been told directly about the alleged Gallery plan. But during cross-examination, Henry unexpectedly began to talk about it, accusing Rotella of fabricating evidence against his family." The Inquirer notes, "The government's best evidence of a terror plot is the secret recording of Henry made by his cell mate - an unredacted copy of which was reviewed by The Inquirer. … At one point, Henry, who is a black Muslim, said on tape that the purpose of the blasts, timed for rush hour near the Market East SEPTA station, would represent 'domestic terrorism' against white Americans. … At another point on the recording, however, Henry said the purpose would be to divert Philadelphia police long enough to pull off a major bank robbery."

Delaware Man's Federal Appeal Cites Hearsay, Jury Instructions. The AP (2/21, Chase) reports from Dover, DE, "Thomas Capano's lawyer argued in a federal appeal yesterday that a judge had violated the convicted killer's constitutional right to a fair trial by refusing to let the jury consider charges other than murder and by allowing hearsay testimony." The AP continues, "In a 71-page brief supporting Capano's habeas corpus petition, attorney Joseph Bernstein said the Delaware Supreme Court had erred in upholding the judge's decision to give the 1998 jury only two options: acquittal or conviction for first-degree murder." The AP adds, "Under a 1980 U.S. Supreme Court ruling, a defendant in a capital murder case is entitled to jury instructions that include lesser offenses if any evidence supports those offenses, Bernstein told the Associated Press. … Capano, now 56, acknowledged in his trial that he had dumped the body of Anne Marie Fahey, who was Gov. Tom Carper's scheduling secretary, into the Atlantic Ocean, but said her death had been an accident. … 'If you're on a jury and you hear that, and you only have two options, what are you going to do?' Bernstein said. 'Even if you don't think it was intentional murder, you're not going to let him go.'" The AP notes, "Capano, once a wealthy and politically connected lawyer, was convicted of shooting Fahey, 30, in 1996, allegedly because she was breaking off an affair with him. … Bernstein also argued in the federal appeal that hearsay testimony by Fahey's friends and psychotherapists should have been excluded from the trial. … In 2001, the state Supreme Court upheld Capano's conviction, his death sentence, and Judge William Swain Lee's decision to reject lesser offenses such as manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide."

New York Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette (2/21) reports, "John R. Maggese, 44, pleaded guilty today to a felony charge of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice." The Star-Gazette continues, "Maggesse was accused of having child pornography on a computer he owned from July 2003 through August 2005, the release stated. He received the images over the Internet; some of the images showed children under 12 years old. … Maggese is scheduled to be sentenced at 2 p.m. May 24 in U.S. District Court in Rochester. The charges carry a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment, a $250,000 fine, or both."

Investigator Pleads Guilty To Defrauding Law Firms. The New York Law Journal (2/21, Hamblett) reports, "A Montana man Tuesday pleaded guilty to defrauding law firms involved in major litigation by claiming to have proof of illegal activity by opposing counsel and parties." The Journal continues, "Michael Lair, 46, headed consumerdefense.com Inc., which held itself out as a consumer complaint investigator and researcher for large fraud cases. Tuesday, Lair admitted to defrauding attorneys and litigants of more than $311,000 in 2003 and 2006 as he pleaded guilty to four counts of wire fraud before Southern District of New York Judge John Keenan. … Under a plea agreement with Assistant U.S. Attorney Helen Cantwell, Lair is expected to be sentenced to serve somewhere between 2 years and 3 months to 2 years and 9 months in prison." The Journal adds, "The victims of the fraud included two of Manhattan's top litigation firms, Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason; Anello & Bohrer; and Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman. … While the guilty plea Tuesday covered the litigation involving the Morvillo and Kasowitz firms, prosecutors had been prepared to obtain a superseding information that would have charged Lair with attempting to defraud 10 other firms in litigation in New York and other parts of the country. … Tuesday, with defense attorney Leonard Joy by his side, Lair told Judge Keenan, 'I agreed with a number of law firms to supply information about the parties involved in legal actions in which the law firms were involved. I charged the firms' fees knowing that I did not have and could not have obtained such information.'"

New York Lawyer Pleads Guilty To Stealing $20 Million From Bank, Client. The AP (2/19) reported, "A lawyer pleaded guilty to stealing more than $20 million from a bank and at least one client, spending the loot on vacation homes, a wedding and generous salaries for his employees, authorities said. Under a deal with prosecutors," Anthony Bellettieri of White Plains "faces more than a decade in prison after admitting in federal court to bank and mail fraud dating to at least 2003. Bellettieri, a real estate lawyer, stole the funds through check kiting." The AP noted, "According to J.P. Morgan Chase, the primary victim, the tactic worked partly because he used checks with a printed error. The scheme fell apart after the bank issued correct checks in November."

Five Plead Guilty In "Cult-Like" California Investment Fraud Scheme. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/18, Thornton, 324K) reported, "Five men have pleaded guilty in federal court to defrauding investors of $20 million in a long-term scam that preyed mostly on churchgoers. John Harrell, the ringleader of the scam, admitted he recruited investors with bogus schemes and then spent all the money on himself and other members of the enterprise, said prosecutor Jason Forge." The Union-Tribune noted, "'Mr. Harrell and his co-conspirators utilized a complex fraud scheme to steal millions through promises of high rates of return with no risk,' said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego. 'He also preyed on his victims' religious faiths and their suspicion of government. Today's result will make others think twice before defrauding the American public.' … Authorities described the organization as 'a cult-like investment scheme' that operated out of San Diego beginning in the late 1980s."

Former California Judge Sentenced For Child Pornography Possession. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Hanley) reports, "A former Orange County judge collapsed in a Los Angeles federal courtroom Tuesday moments after being sentenced to 27 months in prison for possessing child pornography, bringing a dramatic end to a case that tested privacy rights and nearly fell apart because of a computer hacker's role in the investigation." The Times continues, "Ronald C. Kline was standing with his hands in his pockets and swaying slightly as U.S. District Judge Consuelo B. Marshall indicated he would do prison time. Kline's knees suddenly buckled and he fell backward, with his eyes closed, into the arms of one of his attorneys. … A nurse and paramedics rushed to the courtroom. . They monitored his heart and administered other tests on the 66-year-old Kline. He was on his feet about a half-hour later, and his attorneys said he was well enough to sit through the rest of the hearing." The Times adds, "When it resumed, Marshall also ordered Kline to serve three years' of strictly supervised probation. During that time, he cannot use the Internet or possess any technology — including a cell phone—that would allow Internet access without prior written approval. … Other conditions bar him from lingering within 100 feet of schools, parks and other common gathering points for children under 18. He must also register as a sex offender for the rest of his life. … Marshall said she based her ruling on a variety of factors, including a recommendation by probation officers that Kline serve between 27 and 33 months, the seriousness of the offense, Kline's lack of prior criminal history and his acceptance of responsibility." The Times notes, "Asst. U.S. Attorneys Gregory W. Staples and Deirdre Z. Eliot said they were satisfied with the ruling, even though they had asked for the maximum 33 months."

Woman In Prostitution Probe Pressures US To Drop Case. The Washington Times (2/21, Mcelhatton) reports, "A California woman who is the target in an ongoing criminal probe into the operation of her District-based escort agency has told federal authorities she will 'make life miserable' for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped, government attorneys say. … 'I cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this case (civil and/or criminal) will set off, if permitted to advance for both sides,' Deborah Jean Palfrey wrote in an e-mail to the U.S. Attorney's Office. 'The press will have a field day at each of our expense.'" The Times continues, "Government attorneys referenced the e-mail in a recent motion to postpone civil forfeiture proceedings against Miss Palfrey pending the outcome of a criminal investigation. But an attorney for Miss Palfrey wants to move forward with the civil case, filing court papers last weekend detailing an attempt to depose former Clinton campaign adviser Dick Morris." The Times adds, "Mr. Morris, a news commentator who resigned from the Clinton campaign in 1996 amid a scandal involving escort services, is 'the only customer of the service who has publicly admitted using the services for "legal" sexual activity,' Miss Palfrey's attorney wrote in court papers." The Times adds, "Miss Palfrey, of Vallejo, Calif., has been the target of a two-year investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Postal Service into whether she illegally earned money from prostitutes working as escorts for her business. … Miss Palfrey has not been charged criminally. … In October, federal agents seized more than $427,000 in cash and stocks from Miss Palfrey. In pleadings, authorities say the criminal investigation is ongoing."

Tennessee Businessman Convicted Of DOE Contract Fraud. The Knoxville News Sentinel (2/21, Satterfield) reports, "A lauded Oak Ridge businessman may soon be trading pinstripes for prison stripes. A jury in U.S. District Court on Tuesday convicted Reginald Hall, 54, of conspiracy to commit money laundering for a scheme to plunder money from the U.S. Department of Energy via fake invoices submitted as a subcontractor for the Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Jurors also found Hall guilty of money laundering and theft of government property. He was acquitted, however, of mail fraud and obstruction of justice." The News Sentinel notes, "Agents Randall Kizer and Rick Sample with DOE's Office of the Inspector General, Agent Bob Gibson of the FBI and Lt. Art Schettini of the Tennessee Valley Authority Police Criminal Investigation Division headed up the probe."

Deliveryman Tells Of Unprovoked Shooting By Maryland Official. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Rich) reports, "A senior Prince George's County homeland security official who last month shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen opened fire without provocation after angrily ordering the men to leave his home, the surviving mover said in a statement provided last night to law enforcement authorities." The Post continues, "Keith A. Washington, who is also a county police officer, was combative almost from the moment the movers arrived at his Accokeek home, said Robert White, who worked for a contractor delivering for Marlo Furniture. 'As we were leaving we reached the top of the steps, and the customer said "I know how to get you the [expletive] out of my house" and I heard gunshots,' White said in the statement. … Later, White said, he listened as he lay bleeding while Washington falsely reported that the men he shot had attacked him with a pipe. 'I remember sitting there on the ground thinking to myself, I can't believe this is how it is going to be,' said White, 36, who dictated the statement from his hospital bed to his attorney. His co-worker, Brandon Clark, 22, died of his wounds Feb. 2 without giving a statement." The Post adds, "Washington has not spoken publicly since the shooting. A source familiar with the investigation has told The Post that, in a brief report filed immediately after the incident, Washington alleged that the movers were in a part of the house where they were not supposed to be. Police have said that Washington told them he acted in self-defense. … Police initially said they would probably charge the movers with assault but have since backed off that comment, saying they would make no determination until their investigation is complete. … White's attorney, Michael J. Winkelman, has not allowed police to interview his client, whose criminal record includes a burglary conviction, in part because of the possibility that police might try to build an assault case against White. In addition, Winkelman said he is concerned that White's providing a statement before Washington does so might allow Washington to fabricate a story that blames the movers in the shooting."

Police Seek Motive In Maryland Shopping Plaza Standoff, Fire. The Washington Post (2/21, B2, Vogel) reports, "Frederick authorities yesterday recovered a body believed to be that of a man who they say shot at police and started a fire that gutted a shopping plaza Monday." The Post continues, "The body, which was found about 12:30 p.m. behind the locked front door in the rubble of a destroyed liquor store at the Frederick shopping center, has been sent to the chief medical examiner's office in Baltimore for identification." The Post adds, "Frederick police were still trying to piece together how James Douglas's visit to a liquor store ended up in an inferno that destroyed the Antietam Village Center. … Police say Douglas, 30, of Frederick, walked into Jim's Liquors at the shopping plaza on Oppossumtown Pike about 12:30 p.m. Monday, showed the owner a handgun and ordered him out of the store. … When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door, police said. … Yesterday afternoon, fire marshals, police detectives and construction workers moved through the blackened remains of the plaza."

Maryland Governor Explains His Opposition To Death Penalty. Writing in the Washington Post (2/21, 690K), Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley asks, "Is the death penalty a just punishment for murder? Is the death penalty an effective deterrent to murder? … Are any of us willing to sacrifice a member of our own family -- wrongly convicted, sentenced and executed -- in order to secure the execution of five rightly convicted murders? And even if we were, could that public policy be called 'just'? I do not believe it can." But "what about the deterrent value of the death penalty? Does the use of the death penalty -- while rarely, if ever, 'just' -- save more innocent lives than it takes? The evidence indicates that it does not." O'Malley concludes that "absent a deterrent value, the damage done to the concept of human dignity by our conscious communal use of the death penalty is greater than the benefit of even a justly drawn retribution."

Maryland Officer Charged With Molesting Woman During Traffic Stop. The Washington Post (2/21, B6, McCaffrey) reports, "An Anne Arundel County police officer was charged with a sex offense yesterday, accused of coercing a woman to bare her breasts during a traffic stop, then molesting and photographing her. He told her she could avoid jail if she exposed herself, police said." The Post continues, "Joseph Mossmiller, 22, who joined the department in May, was charged before a District Court commissioner with a fourth-degree sex offense, second-degree assault, false imprisonment and misconduct in office, police said." The Post adds, "Three other officers were suspended in connection with the incident. Police declined to identify them or disclose what the led to their suspensions with pay except to say that they were also rookies but had not been at the scene of the traffic stop Jan. 20. … According to charging documents filed in District Court, the 18-year-old woman was driving with a female passenger whom she had just picked up at a bar when she was pulled over by a marked police car in the Pasadena area. … Mossmiller was released on his own recognizance yesterday after initially being sent to the county detention facility when he was unable to post a $250,000 bond, police said."

Youths Tell Of Grim Life On Traveling Magazine Sales Crews. The New York Times (2/21, Urbina) reports, "Two days after graduating from high school last June, Jonathan Pope left his home in Miamisburg, Ohio, to join a traveling magazine sales crew, thinking he would get to 'talk to people, party at night and see the country.' … Over the next six months, he and about 20 other crew members crossed 10 states, peddling subscriptions door to door, 10 to 14 hours a day, six days a week. Sleeping three to a room in cheap motels, lowest seller on the floor, they survived some days on less than $10 in food money while their earnings were kept 'on the books' for later payment. … By then, Mr. Pope said, he had seen several friends severely beaten by managers, he and several other crew members were regularly smoking methamphetamine with prostitutes living down the motel hallway, and there were warrants out for his arrest in five states for selling subscriptions without a permit. … After persuading his manager to let him leave, Mr. Pope was dropped off, without a ticket, $17 in his pocket, at a bus terminal near San Antonio, more than 1,000 miles from home." The Times continues, "More than two decades after a Senate investigation revealed widespread problems with these itinerant sellers, and despite several highly publicized fatal accidents and violent crimes involving the sales crews in recent years, the industry remains almost entirely unregulated. And while the industry says it has changed, advocates and law enforcement officials say the abuses persist." The Times adds, "In interviews over seven months, more than 50 current and former members from almost as many crews painted a similar picture of life on the road. … With striking uniformity, they told of violence, drug use, indebtedness and cheating of customers during their cross-country travels, often in unsafe vehicles and with drivers who lacked proper licenses."

Rise In Teenage "Sport Killings" Of Homeless Worries Authorities. CNN.com (2/21, Fantz) reports from Milwaukee, WI, "All Nathan Moore says he wanted to do was smoke pot and get drunk with his friends. Killing Rex Baum was never part of the plan that day in 2004. … 'It all started off as a game,' Moore said." CNN continues, "The 15-year-old and his friends were taunting the homeless man -- throwing sticks and leaves -- after having a couple of beers with him. … No big deal, Moore says, but he's sorry for what came next. … It was a mistake, he said, a sudden primal surge that made him and his friends Luis Oyola, 16, and 17-year-old Andrew Ihrcke begin punching and kicking Baum. … They hurled anything they could find -- rocks, bricks, even Baum's barbecue grill -- and pounded the 49-year-old with a pipe and with the baseball bat he kept at his campsite for protection. … After destroying Baum's camp, the boys left the homeless man -- head wedged in his own grill -- under a piece of plastic where they hoped the 'animals would eat' him. … Then, Moore says, they took off to grab a bite at McDonald's." CNN adds, "Baum's murder was indicative of a disturbing trend. … A National Coalition for the Homeless report says last year, there were 122 attacks and 20 murders against the homeless, the most attacks in nearly a decade. … 'It's disturbing to know that young people would literally kick someone when they're already down on their luck,' said Michael Stoops, the executive director of the Washington-based National Coalition for the Homeless. 'We recognize that this isn't every teenager, but for some this passes as amusement.'" CNN notes, "Criminologists call these wilding sprees 'sport killing,' -- largely middle-class teens, with no criminal records, assaulting the homeless with bats, golf clubs, paintball guns. … Some teens have even taped themselves in the act. Others have said they were inspired by 'Bumfights,' a video series created in 2002 and sold on the Web that features homeless people pummeling each other for the promise of a few bucks." CNN notes, "Stoops and Brian Levin, a California State University hate crimes expert, say common themes run through teen-on-homeless violence. The attackers are almost always boys, peer pressure and mob mentality sweep away caution, and parents don't suspect their children could be capable of such actions."

Congress Urged To Enact Federal Journalist-Source Privilege Law. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) Geoffrey Stone, professor of law at the University of Chicago, writes, "Congress should expeditiously enact a federal journalist-source privilege law, which would protect journalists from compelled disclosure of their sources' confidential communications in the same way psychiatrists and lawyers are protected. Importantly, neither Congress nor the press should be unwilling to compromise when the alternative is to forgo such a privilege altogether."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Voids $79.5 Million Tobacco Award. USA Today (2/21, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court tossed out a $79.5 million award to a smoker's widow Tuesday in its first ever case testing punitive damages in a personal injury dispute." The decision "limits when jurors may consider the harm a company caused people who were not part of the case." The 5-4 ruling "is a victory for Philip Morris USA, which won another chance to challenge an Oregon jury's punitive damages award that was 97 times the actual damages for the death of Jesse Williams, a longtime Marlboro smoker."

McClatchy (2/21, Henderson) reports the 5-4 ruling, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, "said awarding damages to punish a company for harming nonparties to a suit amounted to taking property without due process." Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy, David H. Souter and Samuel A. Alito Jr. agreed with Breyer. Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Clarence Thomas dissented. Thomas and Scalia "objected to Tuesday's ruling for the same reasons they've resisted all the court's decisions limiting punitive damages: They don't think that the Constitution addresses the issue." That puts them "at odds with Roberts, Alito and Kennedy, the remaining justices in the court's politically conservative wing. … Stevens' vote represents a departure for him on this issue; he penned the 1996 ruling that established constitutional limits for punitive damages, but said Tuesday's ruling went too far."

The Legal Times (2/21, Mauro) reports, "Business advocates applauded the ruling as a major body blow, grounded in the Constitution, against high punitive damage awards. … 'This is a huge, huge win for corporate defendants,' said Lori Nugent, chair of the enterprise risks practice of Cozen O'Connor in Chicago, and author of a state-by-state guide on punitive damages. 'Lawyers who exhort jurors to send a message; that has to stop now. It rips the guts right out of a case.' … But plaintiffs groups say the decision won't change much, especially since the Court on Tuesday also said that harm to others could still be considered by jurors in determining the defendant's level of 'reprehensibility.' … 'Ultimately, I don't think this is going to be very significant. The Court was slaying dragons that don't exist,' said Robert Peck, who argued the case on behalf of Mayola Williams, widow of longtime Oregon smoker Jesse Williams, whose estate won the case against Philip Morris. On remand to Oregon, Peck said, the case could still result in a significant punitive damage award." The Times notes, "The ruling also disappointed some business groups because it explicitly stopped short of setting numerical limits on excessive punitive damages -- a holy grail for critics of the tort system. The Court's sidestep caused some tobacco-company stocks to dip on Wall Street after the ruling."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Richey, 59K) notes "the US Supreme Court struck down the verdict because it said the jury violated due-process protections when it sought to punish the tobacco company for injuries suffered by nonparties to the litigation," while the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Barnes, 690K) says that "in sending the case back to Oregon courts for further litigation, the justices sidestepped a decision that industry had most wanted: whether to set a solid cap on how much could be awarded for punitive damages, perhaps based on a specific ratio to the actual damages done to the individual who brought the suit. Still, business advocates praised the decision."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A2, Bravin, O'Connell, 2.04M) calls the ruling "another boon for corporate defendants. But it wasn't the knockout blow against punitive damages that business had sought." The ruling "turned on the court's finding defendants can't be punished for harms suffered by consumers who aren't party to a lawsuit. But the justices refused to impose a formula, sought by business groups, that would limit punitive-damage awards."

ABC World News (2/20, story 2, 2:20, Greenberg, 8.78M) said "lawyers supporting Philip Morris said the ruling will stop runaway jury awards. Not only in tobacco cases, but in other types of lawsuits, including those for defective drugs and automobiles." Theodore Boutrous, Product Liability Advisory Council: "This, along with the court's previous decisions, help significantly bring fairness to the system." But "Robert Peck, a lawyer for Mrs. Williams, says the award was fair. And predicted a lower court will reinstate it, even under the new standard." Peck: "You still can say look how many Jesse Williams there are out there. This was massive misconduct on a scale that requires significant award."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 4, 2:40, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "What is most likely to happen now is a new jury instruction will have to go out in cases where companies have lost, and the jury instruction will be something like you can't punish this company for all the other people it hurt even though it might have hurt other folks. You can't add to the money. That's likely not to eliminate huge jury verdicts but will probable diminish a lot of them."

The New York Times (2/21, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "What happens next in this lawsuit may provide an early indication of the practical significance of the court's ruling, as far as it went. The case now goes back to the Oregon Supreme Court, which has options ranging from reinstating the award to ordering a new trial. The original trial of the suit, brought by Mayola Williams, whose husband, Jesse, died of lung cancer after smoking two packs of Marlboros a day for 45 years, took place in 1999." Sheila L. Birnbaum, a punitive damages specialist with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York, "said the court was requiring jurors to 'unring the bell' in a way that might prove difficult. 'It's very hard for jurors to disregard something they have heard,' she said." The Washington Times (2/21, Lopes, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (2/21, Savage, 850K) runs similar stories.

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) editorializes that the ruling "is a win for corporate wrongdoers. It stretches the Constitution's guarantee of due process in a way that will make it easier for companies that act reprehensibly to sidestep serious punishments." It also "provides unsettling new evidence that the court is more concerned about -- and more willing to protect -- the powerful than the powerless."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) writes in an editorial, "The Supreme Court dealt another blow against runaway tort damages," and "maybe next time the Justices will go even further and provide some clearer guidance to lower courts." The Journal adds, "In any case, inflicting gigantic damages in civil cases without standards to guide either judges or juries are a real problem, despite what Justices Thomas and Scalia seem to believe. And in ruling that standards have to be applied in how these cases are argued -- and not only in the number that is finally arrived at -- the Court may have hit upon an important area for reform. But thanks to the Court's willingness to split too many differences, Philip Morris can't exhale just yet."

Five Indicted In Georgia On Health Care Billing Fraud Charges. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (2/20) reported, "A federal grand jury handed down two separate health-care fraud indictments today, charging a total of five health-care providers with fraudulently billing approximately $6 million, principally for a back pain procedure. According to the U.S. Attorney's office, Howard Berkowitz, 59, of Atlanta; Arthur Hargraves, 66, of Douglasville; and Daniel Puffenberger, 51, of Kissimmee, Fla., were each charged with five counts of health care fraud that they allegedly committed as owners of the Associated Spinal Care Network in Douglasville. … In another indictment, William Stearns, 45, of Marietta, Georgia, and Steven Levine, 50, of Roswell, were charged with health-care fraud and other violations that they allegedly committed as owners of the Comprehensive Care Medical Group in Marietta." The Chronicle noted, "The cases are being investigated by the FBI."

Doctors, Clinic Administrators Indicted In California Medicare Fraud Scam. The Los Angeles Times (2/15, Hanley, 850K) reported, "Nine doctors, six healthcare administrators and three associates were indicted…in a scam in which doughnuts, candy and other gifts were used to lure elderly and mentally ill patients into more than $12 million worth of unnecessary respiratory treatments that were fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal officials said. … The indictment alleges that doctors paid kickbacks to board-and-care administrators and other associates known as 'cappers' to gain access to residents, then ordered respiratory treatment for those residents regardless of whether they were suffering from such conditions. Therapists were paid to treat the residents, who were enticed with sodas, candy and doughnuts, authorities say."

The Orange County Register (2/15, Bernhard) reported, "Administrators at the facilities were typically paid $100 per resident they referred to the recruiter, federal prosecutors said. … All 18 defendants are expected to be arraigned March 19 in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. The defendants face a maximum 10-year federal prison sentence for each health care fraud count, 20 years for each money laundering count and five years for each conspiracy count. The investigation was conducted by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the IRS."

Gonzales Announces New Program To Protect Religious Freedom. The AP (2/21, French) reports from Nashville, TN, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Southern Baptists on Tuesday the Department of Justice is launching a new program to protect Americans from religious discrimination." The AP continues, "Gonzales said the First Freedom Project would increase education about religious discrimination by holding a series of training seminars throughout the country over coming months. … He also plans to create a Religious Freedom Task Force, which will review policies and religious discrimination cases. He said he doesn't yet know how much the program will cost. … 'One of our most cherished freedoms ... is our religious freedom,' he told leaders of the Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant denomination, in Nashville. 'It is a fundamental part of our nation's history.'" The AP adds, "The first training seminar will be held in Kansas City, Mo., in March, followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., in April and Seattle, Wash., in May. Other dates and locations will be announced later. … As part of the new program, the Justice Department is also launching a Web site http://www.firstfreedom.gov, with information on enforcement and how to file a religious discrimination complaint." The AP notes, "On Tuesday the Justice Department also released its report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom, which highlights the number of religious discrimination cases reviewed or investigated by the Department of Justice for fiscal years 2001-06 compared to 1995-2000. … Gonzales said the report shows the Department of Justice has looked into more religious discrimination cases under the Bush administration."

The Nashville Tennessean (2/21, Wadhwani) reports, "Saying the government has not always paid enough attention to religious discrimination, the country's top law enforcement official picked a gathering of Southern Baptist leaders in Nashville on Tuesday to announce a renewed push to protect religious freedoms." The Tennessean continues, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the establishment of a new Religious Freedom Task Force and stepped up enforcement efforts. … The Department of Justice's 'First Freedom Project' will review religious discrimination complaints, hold seminars to educate religious leaders about how to file complaints and launch a Web site with information on religious liberty laws, Gonzales said. … Local civil libertarians greeted the announcement with skepticism. If the First Freedom Project was meant to protect the religious freedoms of all Americans, why was it announced only to a room full of Southern Baptists, asked Hedy Weinberg, executive director of the Tennessee branch of the American Civil Liberties Union. … 'Why was just one particular religious community there?' she said. 'Religious freedom is a right all of us hold dear ... You'd think you'd want the rainbow of religious beliefs represented.'" The Tennessean adds, "Gonzales told reporters that he chose a meeting of the nation's largest Protestant denomination because, 'this is a group that's very interested in religious freedom.' … The gathering is a 'receptive audience that would appreciate' his message, he said."

Judge Schedules Thursday Hearing On Seale Motion To Dismiss. The AP (2/21, Elliott) reports, "A federal judge will hear arguments Thursday in reputed Ku Klux Klansman James Ford Seale's motion to dismiss kidnapping charges against him in the 1964 slayings of two black men. U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate scheduled the hearing for 8:30 a.m. at the federal courthouse in Jackson." The AP notes, "Seale and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards were arrested in 1964. But the FBI -- consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared from Neshoba County that summer -- turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges."

Two California Prison Guards Charged With 2002 Beating, Cover-Up. The Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise (2/21, Austin) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted two officers at the men's prison in Chino on Tuesday on accusations they hurled two shackled inmates to the ground and filed a false report to cover up the incident almost five years ago." The P-E continues, "Officer Robert McGowan, 37, of Apple Valley, and Sgt. Thomas Ramos, 50, of Montclair, were named in a three-count indictment stemming from a May 2002 incident that left two inmates with minor injuries. … Attorneys for the Department of Justice allege McGowan pulled two shackled inmates from a van and allowed them to fall to the ground after an altercation between the inmates and officers. Because of the shackles, the inmates were unable to protect themselves from the fall." The P-E adds, "Two weeks later, according to the attorneys, Ramos filed a false report to his boss. He claimed one of the inmates merely slipped even though he had been told that McGowan assaulted the shackled prisoner, charged the U.S. attorneys. … McGowan faces 20 years in prison on two counts of deprivation of rights under color of law, and Ramos faces 10 years on one count of obstruction of justice if convicted." The P-E notes, "Though nearly five years passed before Tuesday's indictment, the incident created a legislative stir in 2003 amid concerns of prisoner abuse, coverups by guards and dysfunction in the department's internal affairs investigative system. … The California Inspector General ordered the corrections department to hand over its files on the case to the Justice Department, said Bill Sessa, a spokesman for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. … McGowan and Ramos are scheduled for arraignment in March, said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office. … These kinds of cases are rare because it's necessary to prove the officer intended to violate the inmate's civil rights, Mrozek said. … 'The constitutionally protected rights of every citizen is something we take very seriously,' said Mrozek. 'You have the right to be free from assault -- even in prison.'"

DOJ Asked To Intervene In New Jersey Beach Access Dispute. The Asbury Park (NJ) Press (2/21, Williams) reports, "Long Branch (NJ) is waiting to hear from the state Department of Environmental Protection on its boardwalk improvement project." The Press continues, "A senior citizen from Ocean Boulevard is appealing to the U.S. Department of Justice to enforce requirements of the Americans with Disabilities Act in connection with oceanfront beach access. … Austin Gelzer, 80, had come before the City Council Jan. 23 to ask for help with beach access, and although officials said they would study the issue, they made no promises. … So Gelzer returned Feb. 13, determined to go to the Justice Department after having completed a complaint form that will go before the Civil Rights Division." The Press adds, "Gelzer is filing the complaint, he said, 'in the name of the disabled residents of Long Branch who have been denied access to the beach and public restrooms, and to some degree, sufficient parking facilities.' … Gelzer said the city was required, beginning in January 1995, to provide such accommodations. … On July 28, 2005, Gelzer met with City Business Administrator Howard Woolley Jr. and presented him with a petition signed by 150 people, protesting the lack of beach access. … Woolley said then the city could not afford to make improvements without the infusion of some $12 million promised by K. Hovnanian, the proposed developer of Beachfront South. … Mayor Adam Schneider has said the city will improve the steep access staircase, which is an annual necessity, but noted a sweeping boardwalk rebuilding program is set to begin within the next 12 months. … Schneider said even if the Justice Department ruled in Gelzer's favor, the city still would not be able to design and engineer a new ramp, get it approved by the DEP, and installed by Memorial Day."

Pro-Life Activists Highlight Survival Of Premature Baby. ABC World News (2/20, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on the delayed release from the hospital of premature baby Amillia Taylor, "born last October, after just 21 weeks and 6 days in the womb. That, we believe, is a shorter period of gestation than any other infant that has ever survived. The fact that she has survived and grown to more than four pounds is about to go home is a miracle, yes. But a miracle that may have an affect over the debate over abortion." ABC (Harris) added, "Until now, the story of Amillia Taylor was a medical and human interest story. But today, it became a political story, as well." Despite the "fact that she's had some respiratory and digestive problems, her doctor says Amillia's prognosis is excellent." For "anti-abortion activists Amillia is a national poster child today they promised to hold her up as an example in future debates over restricting abortion. Only one state, North Carolina, explicitly prohibits aborting a fetus at the stage Amillia was born. Twelve states permit abortion at that point. Twenty-three leave it to a doctor to decide whether the fetus is viable and in 14 state there's are no laws on the books that would prevent such an abortion." Tony Perkins, Family Research Council: "As we see, with the advancement of medical technology, we have children surviving outside the womb younger and younger. And it really brings into focus how valuable and how precious this human life really is." Harris: "Bioethicists we spoke with today argue that Amillia is a miracle baby, and that it's unwise to change public policy based on miracles."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 12, :25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported the story without playing up any political angle, noting, "Doctors say she is the earliest born preemie ever to survive. She'll be staying in the hospital a bit longer. Amelia Taylor was born in October at just under 22 weeks. She weighed less than 10 ounces, smaller than a can of soda. She's now four and a half pounds."

Dallas Settles Jail Mistreatment Suit. The AP (2/21, Curry) reports from Dallas, "County officials approved a nearly $1 million settlement Tuesday with the families of three mentally ill inmates who were denied medication while in the country's seventh-largest detention complex." The AP continues, "Just over half of the award went to James Mims, a Dallas County jail inmate whose psychiatric medications were withheld for two months in 2004, his attorney David Finn said. Mims also nearly died when water was shut off in his cell for two weeks. … 'They could just not afford to have this case go before a jury'" Finn said. … Commissioners approved the $950,000 agreement without discussion." The AP adds, "The federal civil rights lawsuit was filed in December 2004 on behalf of inmates Mims, Kennedy Nickerson and Clarence Lee Grant Jr., who died in custody. … Grant, who had paranoid schizophrenia, was found dead in his cell after not receiving medicine for five days in 2003, according to court records. An autopsy showed he died from complications of diabetes, pneumonia and other ailments. … Nickerson, who also has paranoid schizophrenia, was released from jail in 2003 without medication. A few days later he was found on the street dehydrated, suffering from fever and seizures, court records show. … The U.S. Department of Justice told the county in December that the jail violates inmates' rights by failing to provide adequate medical and mental health care, and warned that a lawsuit could be filed if the problems weren't fixed."

Judge Declares Schwarzenegger's Prisoner Transfers Illegal. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Warren, 850K) reports, "A Superior Court judge ruled today that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger acted illegally by declaring an emergency in California's overcrowded prisons and transferring inmates to other states. The ruling by Judge Gail Ohanesian says the governor violated the Emergency Services Act and the state constitution, and that contracts sending prisoners to lockups in Tennessee and Arizona are illegal." The judge's order "is stayed for 10 days, giving the state time to file an appeal." Ohanesian's ruling "is a major setback for Schwarzenegger as he grapples with an escalating crisis in the state's jam-packed prisons."

Writer Hopes Next Generation Makes Greater Racial Strides. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/21, 11A), Bruce Kluger, a contributing editor for Parenting magazine, writes, "(A)s we celebrate Black History Month, I wonder: What kind of responsibility do we parents have in educating our children about the sad legacy of racism that has run through our nation's life like a persistent electrical current? Do we bequeath that shame to our kids out of a sense of obligation, charging them with the task of carrying the long, hard fight of our troubled heritage into a new era? Or do we quietly give thanks for their blissful naiveté — their lucky late-century birth — and hope that the deeper sense of fairness that is already evident in their new generation may take root in America's future? Do we leave well enough alone?" Kluger continues, "To be sure, our country is experiencing a transformation that would have been unimaginable half a century ago. … Our last two secretaries of State have been African-American (likewise, both 2007 Super Bowl head coaches); our most talked-about presidential candidate is black; people of color populate executive suites and statehouses across the country in increasing numbers. And the only conversation about race that seems to interest Major League Baseball anymore is the one about the pennant. … Yet just because America's more notorious racial injustices are thankfully behind us — the segregated lunch counters, the unconscionable lynchings, the ignominious Jim Crow laws — thick capillaries of discrimination continue to pulse beneath our national skin. These lingering vestiges of that old-time racism are, in many ways, just as insidious as those we thought we'd thrown off with the great civil rights acts of the '60s, if only because they are more cleverly cloaked from view." Kluger adds, "Blacks continue to be shut out of polling places because of dubious technicalities. Families of color continue to carry a disproportionate share of our country's worst afflictions — from poverty and unemployment to teen pregnancy — at national rates that have consistently remained two to three times that of whites for the past 20 years. Minority youth continue to be isolated, not embraced, by our education system, despite the efforts of No Child Left Behind. And in November, another unarmed black man was killed in a hail of police bullets, just a subway ride from where my daughters go to school. It was a flashback to the bad old days. … This, to me, is what Black History Month is really about — a time to step back and measure our growth as a nation against the work that remains to be done. … We haven't yet reached Martin Luther King's mountaintop in America. But I have to believe that our children may one day take us there."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Orders Mittal To Sell Maryland Steel Mill. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Huslin) reports, "The Justice Department yesterday ordered international steel conglomerate Arcelor Mittal to sell off the venerable Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore, to preserve competition in the eastern U.S. tin mill market." The Post continues, "The divestiture of the 116-year-old plant, which in its heyday was the world's largest steelmaker, is not expected to have an immediate impact on its workforce or operations, union officials said. The plant once employed 30,000 people at the mill and nearby shipyards, and produced millions of tons of steel for guns, airplanes and warships during World War II." The Post adds, "Justice Department officials ordered the divestiture of Sparrows Point as a condition of Mittal Steel Co.'s $33 billion acquisition of Arcelor SA. The department had originally called for the Dutch company to spin off a Canadian subsidiary that makes tin mill products. But after that deal proved impossible for legal reasons, the Justice Department said Mittal would have to sell one of its other mills -- Sparrows Point or its plant in Weirton, W.Va. … Yesterday, the department decided it should be Sparrows Point, which manufactures rolled steel sheets primarily used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products. Unlike Weirton, Sparrows Point produces the steel slabs used to manufacture tin mill products and would not have to develop new supply sources for the material if Mittal sold it, Justice Department officials said. … 'With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division."

The AP (2/21, Dishneau) reports, "The proposed consent decree would allow Chicago-based Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, used primarily for food and aerosol cans." The AP adds, "Chicago Heights, Ill.-based Esmark Inc. said it might consider a joint venture to buy Sparrows Point if the Weirton mill is unavailable, and industry experts said a number of German, Indian and Russian companies are shopping for North American steel mills." The AP notes, "The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 production workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal. … The Justice Department said in a statement that a sale of the profitable Sparrows Point plant, with its deep-water port access, diversified equipment and production capacity of 500,000 tons of tin-plated products annually, would 'most reliably remedy the anticompetitive effects' of Mittal's merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor. … Justice officials initially ordered Mittal to try to sell another mill, Dofasco Inc. of Canada. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany. That left either Sparrows Point or the former Weirton Steel Corp. in Weirton, W.Va., Mittal's two U.S. tin-plated steel mills."

The Baltimore Sun (2/21, Connolly) reports, "For the third time in as many years, Sparrows Point is up for sale. And this time it's a rush job. … The Justice Department wants the sprawling Baltimore County steel plant to be under new ownership within 90 days to make sure that its current boss, Mittal Steel Co. NV, does not have too much control over the market for tin plate used to make cans for foods, aerosol sprays, paints and other products." The Sun adds, "Netherlands-based Mittal, which is merging with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA in a $33 billion deal to create the world's largest steelmaker, had wanted to sell its Weirton W.Va., plant instead. … Selling Sparrows Point, an integrated manufacturer that can make steel from scratch, rather than the Weirton plant 'most reliably' addresses antitrust concerns, Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said Tuesday in a statement announcing the order. … 'Sparrows Point is a profitable and diversi fied facility' and 'unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply for this critical input upon its separation from Mittal Steel,' the Justice Department said. … Mittal cannot appeal the order but could be granted up to 60 more days to find a buyer, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. The Justice Department would have to sign off on any deal."

AFP (2/21) reports, "The US government last August had approved Mittal's acquisition of Arcelor on the basis that Arcelor divested a Canadian company it owned called Dofasco Inc. … However, Arcelor was unable to divest the Canadian group due to ownership hurdles, and the Justice Department has now opted to require Arcelor to divest the Baltimore steel mill instead to satisfy US merger concerns."

Mill Expected To Draw Interested Potential Buyers. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A4, Glader) reports, "Mittal Steel Co., ordered by the Justice Department to sell a plant in Maryland, is expected to draw bids from major companies in China, Russia and India as the number of plants for sale is dwindling." The Journal continues, "The Sparrows Point plant, near Baltimore, is more accessible than inland operations for imports of raw materials and exports of steel. It can produce about 3.9 billion tons of steel a year, including 500,000 tons of tin plate used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products, and it could fetch upwards of $1 billion. … Sparrows Point 'has not been consistently profitable,' says New York-based steel analyst Chuck Bradford of Bradford Research/Soleil. 'But at least it is on the water, so it can bring in raw materials at a reasonable price.'" The Journal notes, "Bidders could include JSW Steel Ltd. or Ispat Industries Ltd., both based in India, or Russia's Evraz Group or OAO Severstal Group, both of which already own U.S. operations. China's Wuhan Steel Corp. and Anshan Iron & Steel Group Corp. also have a good deal of cash and are considering expanding. … Other potential bidders are Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG, which was unsuccessful in buying Canada's Dofasco Inc., and Brazil's Cia. Siderurgica Nacional, which failed in its attempt to buy Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp."

Fate Of Weirton Mill Remains Uncertain. The Wheeling Intelligencer (2/21, Hanson) reports, "Mark Glyptis is keeping a positive attitude despite a big letdown Tuesday for his Independent Steelworkers. … Glyptis, president of the union which represents workers at Mittal's Weirton facility, said his union members are disappointed the Justice Department did not choose Weirton to be sold, as the tin mill has not benefited from being owned by Mittal Steel. … However, Mittal may still decide to sell Weirton, he noted. … 'We need to meet with senior officials with Mittal Steel to determine what that means to us and to Weirton,' Glyptis said of Mittal selling Sparrows Point." The Intelligencer adds, "Chicago-based Esmark Steel already has a nonbinding agreement with Mittal to purchase Weirton. However, before any deal is finalized, Esmark must have the ISU's blessing to purchase the Weirton mill. A former International Steel Group executive, Mitchell Hecht, also wants to purchase Weirton. … Meanwhile, according to the Associated Press, Esmark said it may consider a joint venture to buy Sparrow's Point if the Weirton Mill is unavailable. … Esmark President Craig Bouchard said his company would prefer to buy Weirton, but he wouldn't rule out the possibility of acquiring Sparrows Point."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/21, Mortimer) reports, "Glyptis said he will meet with senior Mittal Steel exectives soon, and said he would try to ascertain their plans for Weirton. 'I don't know what their plans are,' he said. 'They can still divest Weirton.'" The Tribune-Review adds, "Glyptis said he volunteered to have Weirton sold because the mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's stewardship. 'We wanted to be sold because we feel our assets could be utilized at a higher rate,' he said. … The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal. … 'The decision is unfortunate. It makes Mittal not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future,' David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee, said in a statement."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/21, Boselovic) reports, "Despite the decision, which seeks to alleviate antitrust concerns raised by the merger of Arcelor and Mittal, the world's two largest steel producers, Esmark Chairman and Chief Executive Officer James P. Bouchard said he remains interested in purchasing some of Weirton's operations as well as the Sparrows Point, Md., plant that Arcelor Mittal was ordered to sell. … Mr. Bouchard was meeting at Weirton with representatives of that plant's Independent Steelworkers Union and the United Steelworkers union, which represents Wheeling-Pitt workers, when they learned of the decision." The Post-Gazette adds, "Mittal's acquisition of No. 2 Arcelor has raised concerns about a tightly controlled market for tin-coated sheet steel used in food cans and other contains. Even before the merger, Mittal and another steelmaker accounted for more than 74 percent of tin mill product sales in the eastern United States, Justice Department officials said. The other producer is U.S. Steel. … Sparrows Point, formerly operated by Bethlehem Steel, can produce more than 500,000 tons of tin product annually."

The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Miller) reports, "A ruling Justice Department antitrust authorities disclosed today promises to complicate Chicago-based Esmark Inc.'s expansion effort." The Tribune continues, "The fast-growing steel-distribution company has been expanding into steel production and it is currently in the process of acquiring a West Virginia steel maker known as Wheeling-Pitttsburgh Corp., through a 'reverse merger' that will turn closely held Esmark into a publicly traded company. … In addition to Wheeling-Pitt, Esmark has been making overtures to acquire Weirton Steel, based in Weirton, West Virginia." The Tribune notes, "Weirton has been thought to be potentially available because of Justice Department concerns linked to the pending mega-merger between the world's two biggest steel makers, Arcelor S.A. of Belgium and Netherlands-based Mittal Steel. … In August, the Justice Department -- which routinely reviews corporate mergers to see if they would damage marketplace competition -- agreed that it sign off on the Arcelor-Mittal combination if Mittal agreed to divest a steel mill that supplied certain products to the eastern U.S. … Under that so-called 'consent decree,' the Justice Department had the right to select for divestiture either Mittal's Weirton mill or Mittal's Sparrow's Point plant near Baltimore. … Most observers had figured that Weirton would be the plant to be jettisoned; that's why Esmark had been publicly expressing interest and holding talks with the plant's union management. … Today, however, the department's antitrust division unexpectedly said Mittal must shed the Sparrow's Point, Md. operation."

Fate Of Radio Merger Hinges On Market Definitions. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, B4, Schatz, Wilke) reports, "Federal approval of the proposed $11.4 billion merger of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. will hinge on how regulators define the companies' market." The Journal continues, "If Justice Department antitrust enforcers find a distinct market for satellite radio, the deal could be dead, because it would create a monopoly. But if the market instead includes the traditional radio industry, iPods and Internet radio, as the companies argue, the deal could win approval, though not without conditions." The Journal adds, "In a preview of the battle that will play out in Washington in months to come, consumer advocates and some lawmakers said yesterday that the deal will stifle competition and should be stopped. Sirius and XM countered that they need the deal to compete with other forms of audio entertainment. They say they face stiff competition from AM and FM radio, with 280 million listeners, as well as the hot new digital-music market, with more than 100 million iPods already sold. They even cite rising competition from music-enabled mobile phones and Internet radio. … History doesn't offer much encouragement for this argument. A similar merger between two satellite-television companies -- Hughes Electronics Corp. and EchoStar Communications Corp. -- was shot down in 2002. At the time, the TV companies argued that the $18 billion deal was needed to combine efforts to fight off strong competition from cable companies. But the Federal Communications Commission rejected the deal even before the Justice Department could act, saying it raised the risk of "immediate and substantial" harm to consumers through higher prices and less competition, particularly in rural areas that aren't served by cable companies. … In contrast, XM and Sirius are arguing, satellite radio competes with all forms of audio entertainment. In meetings with the regulators and on Capitol Hill, the companies will press this sweeping market definition. The broader the market, the more likely a deal will be approved: When Coca-Cola Co. sought to buy Dr Pepper in the mid-1980s, its experts argued in court that their market should include not just soft drinks but all potable liquids sold in North America, including water. The approach was dubbed the 'Lake Erie defense.' (The deal was opposed by regulators and eventually scotched.)"

The Washington Post (2/21, D3, Babington, Birnbaum) reports, "Winning approval for a proposed merger of the nation's two satellite-radio companies turns on whether regulators buy their argument that iPods, Internet radio and other new technologies have expanded so dramatically that a monopoly would not harm consumers' choices or purses." The Post continues, "It may be a difficult argument to win, but XM Satellite Holdings and Sirius Satellite Radio's officers say it's worth the gamble and have assembled an expensive and experienced team of lobbyists to aid them in the fight. Alone, the companies have suffered heavy losses and spent heavily on recruiting personalities such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey and on marketing to compete against each other." The Post adds, "Now, New York-based Sirius and XM of the District are lining up some of the best-known and highest-paid lawyers and lobbyists, while competitors and consumer groups vow to fight back. The biggest potential roadblock for the merger is a 1997 Federal Communications Commission declaration that a single owner may not control the subscriber-only satellite radio business. … But the advance of technologies such as iPods and other MP3 players, music-playing cellphones and land-based radio stations with digital broadcasts offer so much music, news and talk that the competitive climate is radically different and the FCC should waive the 1997 rule, Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin said in a conference call yesterday. 'Consumers today have a significantly broader range of audio entertainment options from which to choose,' he said. … All those new devices, however, are not directly analogous to satellite radio, and Karmazin's plea is a tough sell, said Chad Bartley, an analyst for Pacific Crest Securities. XM and Sirius provide 'the only paid-radio service out there,' he said, and regulators may be loath to turn them into a monopoly. He rated the chances for merger approval at 'less than 50-50.'"

The Financial Times (2/21, Chaffin) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio yesterday portrayed themselves as two small players in an expanding and highly competitive consumer audio market as they sought to win over regulators for their planned merger." The Times continues, "In a conference call with investors, executives from the companies argued that technology had created an array of new competitors for their services beyond traditional free radio, including portable music devices, mobile phones capable of playing music, internet radio services, personal computers and others. … 'Competition in this market is robust, and we're seeing new entrants on a regular basis as disruptive technologies continue to emerge,' said Gary Parsons, chairman of XM, adding that satellite radio was still 'a small player by comparison'." The Times adds, "Antitrust concerns have shaped up as the biggest hurdle to an $11.4bn deal, not including debt, that would unite the two companies. When they were awarded broadcast licences a decade ago, the Federal Communications Commission mandated that neither company could own both satellite licences. … Following the deal's announcement on Monday, Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, reminded the companies that the hurdle for approval would be 'high' given that provision."

Market Watch (2/21, Schroeder, Wilkerson) reports, "A month ago, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said a tie-up between satellite radio companies XM and Sirius wouldn't get past his agency. On Monday, the chiefs of those companies decided to challenge that vow." Market Watch continues, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. said Monday they were taking their proposed marriage to stockholders and regulators to get an OK for a combination worth $13 billion and the ears of 14 million paid subscribers. … It's a bold challenge: On Jan. 17, FCC chief Kevin Martin had said agency rules would prohibit 'one entity owning both of those [satellite] licenses.' … After the merger was announced, Martin issued a strongly worded statement reiterating his concerns. … 'The hurdle here ... would be high as the commission originally prohibited one company from holding the only two satellite radio licenses,' he said. 'The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.'" Market Watch notes, "The Sirius-XM combination would follow directly on the heels of the hotly debated merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth. The five-member commission of the FCC wrangled for nine months over whether to approve that deal, suggesting a similar combination of two big firms would have to endure the same withering scrutiny. … In AT&T's case, though, the company had the support of Martin, a Republican close to the White House. Sirius and XM not only face skepticism from the FCC chairman but probably from the panel's two Democrats, each of whom has been critical of media consolidation. The Democratic takeover of Congress probably doesn't help the cause of the satellite merger partners."

CNET News (2/21, Mills) reports, "Executives at Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio seem to think they have a better chance at turning a profit as one giant company than as bare-knuckled competitors." CNET continues, "The companies, struggling to reach profitability, announced Monday that they agreed to an all-stock "merger of equals," with shareholders of each company owning 50 percent of the combined company. XM shareholders would receive 4.6 shares of Sirius for each of their XM shares, setting the value of XM at about $5 billion. Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons would both retain their titles, but for the combined company. … But getting federal regulators to sign off on the merger won't be easy, and perhaps in an effort to make walking away from the deal easier, the companies have not said what the name of the combined entity would be or where it would be located. The companies expect the transaction to be completed by the end of this year. There are plenty of questions about how this will play out in the coming months:" CNET notes, "The U.S.

Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission must grant approval, posing a significant challenge. Because Sirius and XM are the only two satellite radio providers operating in the country, their merger would effectively create a monopoly. Federal legislation bars both satellite radio licenses from being owned by the same company to guard against high prices and other negative effects on consumers. … The defense (of the merger) will likely hinge on the definition of 'competition in the digital audio marketplace.' In announcing their merger plans, Sirius and XM said they faced competition from free "over-the-air" AM and FM radio, as well as from iPods and mobile-phone streaming, HD radio, Internet radio and next-generation wireless technologies. Complicating the defense could be the lawsuit record labels have filed against XM alleging that devices that allow people to capture music from XM's broadcasts and turn them into MP3 files for storing and replaying, like the Pioneer Inno, infringe on copyright."

FCC Seen As Tougher Hurdle Than DOJ. The AP (2/21, Dunbar) reports, "When the Federal Communications Commission auctioned off two exclusive licenses to create the satellite radio industry 10 years ago, it did not mince words on whether the competing providers could merge. … The agency said that one licensee will 'not be permitted to acquire control' of the other. The clause was inserted to ensure 'sufficient continuing competition' in the new business, it said. … But when dealing with the FCC, one should never say never. … 'The FCC can undo anything it does,' said Andrew Schwartzman, president and CEO of the Media Access Project, a public interest law firm in Washington. 'However, when you change course, you need a good reason to do it.'" The AP adds, "The companies will have to gain approval from the Justice Department as well as the FCC. Justice typically goes first in satellite mergers. If it blocks the deal, it's game over. But Schwartzman said that is unlikely to happen. … 'My guess is this Justice Department will be willing to accept any plausible argument that is presented to it,' he said. 'The FCC is a much tougher case.'" The AP notes, "The Justice Department looks at how mergers affect competition. The companies will argue that since the industry was created in 1997, times have changed, and so has the market. It's no longer radio, it's 'audio entertainment,' which includes terrestrial radio, digital 'high-definition' radio that offers better sound and more stations, Internet stations and even Apple iPods. … The FCC's review is different. The airwaves are owned by the public. Therefore the law requires that any transfers of control of licenses be done only if it serves the 'public interest, convenience and necessity.'"

New Climate Gives Hope For Approval. The New York Times (2/21, Sorkin) reports, "Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, made a lot of phone calls seeking advice before he entered into a merger deal with XM Satellite Radio on Monday. … Maybe he should have called Charles W. Ergen, the founder and chairman of EchoStar Communications." The Times continues, "Mr. Ergen could have given Mr. Karmazin an earful about his failed effort to merge EchoStar with DirecTV four years ago, a deal that seems eerily similar to the one Sirius and XM have proposed. … Will the government see things differently this time? … Michael K. Powell, the former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission who blocked the EchoStar-DirecTV deal, is not so sure. … 'I do think it could get through, but I don't think it's going to be an easy one,' he said. 'It's going to be incumbent on the companies to demonstrate that the analysis in EchoStar-DirecTV is different.'" The Times adds, "In opposing that deal, regulators — both from the F.C.C. and the Justice Department — argued the merger would create a monopoly. EchoStar and DirecTV, on the other hand, argued that the market should be defined more broadly than simply satellite television and should encompass cable television operators and telephone companies providing video over phone lines. … When Sirius and XM announced their merger on Monday, they made a similar argument — that their market is much bigger than just satellite radio. … 'In addition to existing competition from free "over-the-air" AM and FM radio as well as iPods and mobile phone streaming, satellite radio will face new challenges from the rapid growth of HD Radio, Internet radio and next generation wireless technologies,' the companies said. … There is no question that times have clearly changed: a decade ago, the argument for a Sirius-XM merger would have never had a chance." The Times notes, "The Justice Department's surprising approval of Whirlpool's acquisition of Maytag — a deal that created the nation's largest manufacturer of appliances with more than 50 percent market share — has encouraged others to proceed with deals that might have seemed to pose regulatory problems. … But Sirius and XM should not necessarily take solace in the shifting attitude in Washington and the Whirlpool decision, some antitrust experts suggest, because the deal's fate may be decided by the F.C.C., which issued two sets of satellite spectrum to Sirius and XM in order to create competition."

USA Today (2/21) reports, "Wall Street sure likes the signals that Sirius and XM Satellite Radio are beaming about their merger plans." USA continues, "XM shares soared 10.2% to $15.41 and Sirius was up about 6% to $3.92 on Tuesday, the first day of trading after the companies announced their deal to create a single — and still unnamed — satellite radio power to be run by Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin. … Despite the boost, the prices reflect some wariness among investors about whether the merger will actually take place. The deal must be approved by each company's shareholders, as well as by antitrust officials. And the Federal Communications Commission will have to agree to change a merger ban that is part of the original agreement when the companies were formed."

Radio Heads Seen As Temperamental Opposites. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Ahrens) reports, "In the radio industry, Sirius Satellite Radio chief executive Mel Karmazin is like Bono or Prince or Charo: One name is sufficient. Say 'Mel,' and everyone knows who you're talking about. … The same cannot be said of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Chairman Gary M. Parsons. That's why some say, if the proposed merger between the two satellite companies is approved by regulators, the two executives may work well together." The Post continues, "Under the proposed merger, Karmazin would be the chief executive of the combined company, with Parsons chairing the board. There is no role in the new company for current XM chief executive Hugh Panero, whose duties have diminished since the XM board appointed director Nate Davis as president and chief operating officer in July. … Karmazin and Parsons are opposite in temperament and style, said Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio, an industry trade paper. Karmazin can be electric; Parsons is more laid-back."

More Commentary. The Financial Times (2/21) editorializes, "Howard Stern, the shock jock, may be the self-styled King of all Media, but his employer, Sirius, was certainly not talking world domination in its proposed merger with XM. For the satellite radio deal, which will create a company with a $13bn enterprise value, hinges more than most on regulatory approval. Expect a lot of emphasis on underserved communities and consumer choice and the vast array of alternatives for listeners. There cannot be many media deals that generate a presentation that includes a slide highlighting how many US vehicle registrations there are." The Times continues, "The companies have a point. Competition from AM/FM radio as well as new services, from iPods to streaming music for mobile phones, are real challenges for satellite radio. But Sirius and XM do not just have to make the pure antitrust case, they also have to convince the Federal Communications Commission that the public interest is best served by changing the rules governing their operating licences. It is a gamble, but US business has pulled off far greater ones. … Having said that, this will be a lobbying bunfight. The broadcasters have already weighed in and the market is taking a cautious view: XM's shares traded up strongly, but not as high as would be implied by the sweet 22 per cent premium tacked on to the terms of what was presented as a merger of equals." The Times concludes, "The companies gave little detail yesterday, bar a range of values for the synergies that, at its higher level, would represent more than the market capitalisations of either company. That looks punchy given the time it may take to realise the benefits. But the economic rationale for merging is still compelling. If only Mr Stern's gift of the gab could be brought to bear in persuading the FCC into thinking the same."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) editorializes, "As the Federal Communications Commission ponders the merits of allowing satellite radio companies Sirius and XM to combine, let's hope the ghost of another proposed merger haunts the proceedings. In 2002 the FCC blocked satellite television rivals EchoStar and DirecTV from joining forces on the grounds that allowing the merger would decrease competition and lead to higher prices. Michael Powell, the FCC chairman at the time, said the deal would create a satellite monopoly. In the event, regulatory intervention, based on an overly narrow definition of the market, has only led to unfulfilled promise in satellite broadband." On news of the radio deal, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin remarked that the regulatory hurdles 'would be high.' If so, the agency might want to write more up-to-date regulations. The current 'digital audio radio service' rules date to the late 1980s, before high definition radio, iPods, Pandora.com, music file-sharing and other options existed. The media landscape has changed a bit since The Police split up."

SCOTUS Overturns $79 Million Antitrust Judgment Against Weyerhaeuser. The AP (2/21, Woodward) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court threw out a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser Co. on Tuesday, but the forest products giant could face a new trial on antitrust claims from a defunct sawmill." The AP continues, "Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. of Vancouver, Wash. - which went out of business in 2001 - convinced an Oregon jury that Weyerhaeuser paid too much for alder logs it didn't need, with the goal of driving competitors out of business. … Under federal antitrust law, the jury's award was tripled to $79 million." The AP adds, "Supreme Court justices overturned that 2003 judgment in a 9-0 ruling Tuesday, saying Ross-Simmons must meet a stricter legal standard than the trial court originally allowed. … Writing for the court, Justice Clarence Thomas said Ross-Simmons should have been required to prove that its competitor had a dangerous probability of recouping the losses it incurred in bidding up prices. … The failure to satisfy that standard 'cannot support the jury's verdict,' Thomas wrote." The AP notes, "Weyerhaeuser applauded Tuesday's decision. … 'The Court's unanimous ruling sets a clear standard that permits companies to bid competitively for raw materials without risk of violating antitrust laws,' Weyerhaeuser Vice President Sandy D. McDade said in a statement. … But Mike Haglund, a Portland, Ore.-based lawyer for Ross-Simmons, said he expects to prevail again if the case eventually returns to U.S. District Court for a new trial. … 'We're going to have to go back and retry it under that new standard,' Haglund said. 'I don't think the result will change - we'll still win. But it is a tougher standard.'" The AP notes, "The Bush administration asked the Supreme Court to take the case, arguing that the San Francisco-based appellate court erred by setting a low and confusing standard that threatened to 'chill pro-competitive conduct by companies that bid aggressively.'"

Bloomberg (2/21, Stohr) reports, "The ruling is a victory for large U.S. companies, giving them more room to bid aggressively for raw materials and other supplies without the risk of violating federal antitrust laws. Dow Chemical Co., Verizon Communications Inc., Coca-Cola Co. and Microsoft Corp. were among the companies that supported Weyerhaeuser at the Supreme Court. … 'There are myriad legitimate reasons -- ranging from benign to affirmatively procompetitive -- why a buyer might bid up input prices,' Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the 9-0 court." Bloomberg adds, "The case centered on a judge's instruction to jurors that they could award damages if Weyerhaeuser bought 'more logs than it needed' and prevented Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. from acquiring logs at a 'fair price.' … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the instruction, rejecting Weyerhaeuser's contention that it was too vague to provide meaningful guidance."

Market Watch (2/21, Anderson) reports, "The decision rejected a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco, that had allowed the lawsuit against Weyerhaeuser to proceed under a broader standard. … 'Predatory pricing and predatory bidding claims are analytically similar,' Justice Thomas wrote, saying the legal theory advanced in lower courts 'cannot support the jury's verdict.'"

Warner Moves Closer To Bid For EMI. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A4, Patrick, Smith) reports, "Warner Music Group Corp. Chief Executive Edgar Bronfman Jr. has taken a step closer to realizing his long-held ambition to buy EMI Group PLC, persuading a small but well-organized group of independent record labels to end their opposition to such a purchase." The Journal continues, "Warner, the fourth-largest music company by revenue, yesterday said it approached EMI about buying the company a month ago, in what would be the fourth attempt in seven years to combine the music companies. EMI, the third-largest music company, confirmed the approach and said it was waiting for a formal offer. … The two companies have felt pressed to combine to cut costs in the face of flagging sales and to achieve sufficient scale to compete with their two much-larger rivals, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG." The Journal adds, "It isn't clear how a Warner bid would be valued. EMI, whose stock has fallen recently after back-to-back profit warnings, has a market capitalization of £1.92 billion ($3.75 billion). Warner's market capitalization is $2.86 billion. … Crucially, Warner has reached an agreement with Impala, a trade group for independent European record labels, to end its opposition to a merger. Legal action by Impala derailed merger negotiations between Warner and EMI last year and threatened to disrupt a potential deal again. While it would be up to the European Commission to rule whether an EMI-Warner merger is anticompetitive, Impala's support makes approval more likely. U.S. antitrust authorities aren't expected to object because EMI doesn't have a strong position in the U.S. … Other hurdles to a deal also appear to be clearing. An antitrust decision on a related case -- the reconsideration of the 2004 merger of Sony's and Bertelsmann's music operations -- is due by summer. If approved, that will also remove one of the last impediments to an EMI takeover."

The Financial Times (2/21, Edgecliffe-Johnson) reports, "Warner Music has struck a truce with independent record labels that could clear the way for the US-listed group to make a $6bn (£3bn) bid for EMI and reset the balance of power in the music industry's negotiations with Apple and other digital distributors." The Times continues, "Warner has secured the support of the music companies' fiercest critic to revive merger talks with EMI, the British company behind Norah Jones and The Beatles. … No formal bid has been made and the terms of any offer are unclear but Warner said Impala, which represents independent music publishers and labels, had agreed to provide full and complete support for a Warner-EMI merger in front of regulators." The Times adds, "Warner has agreed to fund a digital rights licensing platform for independent music labels; to divest certain recorded music assets 'to reinforce the market power of the independent sector'; and to make other, unspecified commitments. … A two-year campaign by Impala led to last year's decision by the European Union's Court of First Instance to refer the 2004 clearance of the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses back to the European Commission. With the Commission expected to an-nounce a second stage to its Sony BMG review within two weeks, Impala said it would not drop its opposition to the Sony BMG deal, or to Universal Music's purchase of BMG Music Publishing."

More Commentary. The Financial Times (2/21, Hill) editorializes, "It is not too late for love between EMI and Warner Music and, however preliminary and imprecise their latest approach, the Americans have sweetened it with a silky skill worthy of Norah Jones herself." The Times continues, "Warner has sought to soothe worries about regulatory approval - still the biggest uncertainty overhanging any deal between the two music groups - by ensuring the support of independent record companies and music publishers that were the deal's biggest opponents. Combined with worsening conditions in the recorded music industry, that should make the European Commission more sympathetic towards a deal this time round. … The timing looks good, too: Warner contacted the British company on January 24, before the second of EMI's two profit warnings, but, by uncanny coincidence, the approach has only now come to light with the shares battered down to levels last seen in the final quarter of 2005." The Times adds, "The recent history of disappointments at EMI makes it difficult to see Warner returning with a bid near 320p - the price on last year's abortive offer, abandoned following a European court decision that threw the Sony BMG deal back into Brussels' merger review process. EMI has also cut costs further since last summer presenting Warner with fewer possible savings. But if the US group is sensible, a bid that splits the difference with yesterday's closing share price and last year's offer would put Eric Nicoli, EMI's embattled chief executive, in an awkward position. … If he were to grab such an offer and the European antitrust authorities later decided to block a merger, then he would have used up his final shred of credibility with investors. On the other hand, if he spurned Warner's advances on the grounds that the regulatory risk remained too high, he might scotch shareholders' best hope of realising decent value from their investment."

FTC Clears Biomet Buyout. The AP (2/21) reports from Warsaw, IN, "Orthopedics maker Biomet Inc. on Tuesday said it received antitrust approval from federal regulators for its proposed $10.9 billion acquisition by a group of private investment firms." The AP continues, "Biomet said the Federal Trade Commission granted early termination of the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … Blackstone Group, Goldman, Sachs & Co., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group agreed to buy Biomet in December for $44 per share." The AP adds, "The deal, which is expected to close by the end of October, still needs the approval of Biomet's shareholders."

EU To Fine Elevator Makers For Operating Price-Fixing Cartel. The Financial Times (2/21, Buck) reports, "ThyssenKrupp, Schindler, Kone and Otis - the world's biggest lift manufacturers - will today be punished and fined by the European Commission for operating a price-fixing cartel." The Times continues, "The European Union antitrust watchdog issued formal charges against the four groups in October2005, and according to several people familiar with the case will hand down its final ruling at a meeting in Brussels tomorrow." The Times adds, "Together, the groups control about two-thirds of the world market for elevators and escalators, with Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, the market leader. … They are accused of operating a cartel in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg between 1998 and 2004. Tobias Buck, Brussels."

EU Gives Antitrust Nod For Freeport-McMoRan To Buy Phelps. The AP (2/21) reports, "EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday cleared Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. to buy Phelps Dodge Corp., a deal that would create the world's largest publicly traded copper company -- and the largest metals and mining company based in North America." The AP continues, "The European Commission said that combining the two U.S.-based companies would not significantly impede competition in Europe, identifying only limited overlaps between the two that would not cause antitrust problems for rivals, suppliers or customers. … The companies announced in November that Freeport-McMoRan would acquire Phelps Dodge for US$25.9 billion (euro20.17 billion) in cash and stock." The AP adds, "The cash portion of the transaction totals US$18 billion (euro14.02 billion), and Freeport-McMoRan said it would issue 137 million shares to Phelps Dodge shareholders. That would give them about 38 percent of the combined company on a fully diluted basis. Freeport-McMoRan's board will also be expanded to include three independent Phelps Dodge directors. … The merged companies will operate under the Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold banner, though businesses operating as Phelps Dodge will continue to do so."

South Korea Fines Nine Petrochemical Firms For Collusion. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Nam) reports, "South Korea's Fair Trade Commission fined nine domestic petrochemical companies a combined 105.1 billion won ($112.2 million) for colluding to fix the prices of petrochemical products for more than 10 years." The Journal continues, "A total of 10 companies, including the country's largest refiner, colluded to coordinate the prices of polypropylene and high-density polyethylene between April 1994 and April 2005, the antitrust agency said in a statement. … 'The collusion has resulted in 1.56 trillion won in damages to consumers,' the commission said." The Journal adds, "The commission said Honam Petrochemical Corp., one of the companies involved in the price collusion, wasn't penalized because of its contribution to the commission investigation. … The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against SK Corp., LG Chem Ltd., Korea Petrochemical Industrial Co., Daelim Industrial Co. and Hyosung Corp."

Nuclear Plant's Safety Margins Eroding, Officials Say. In a 1,600-word story, the Los Angeles Times (2/21, Vartabedian, 850K) reports from the Pantex plant, "[L]ately, outside experts are questioning" whether the facility's "safety margins are eroding. Federal investigators are trying to assess the overall safety of the plant ... amid troubling safety snafus and what employees call an atmosphere of intimidation." DOE "officials acknowledge that the plant has fallen behind schedule on reliability testing of weapons. Long delays have occurred in decommissioning thousands of surplus warheads to satisfy disarmament pacts. They also concede the plant has maintenance problems and has violated safety procedures. But they insist there is no danger of a conventional or nuclear explosion. 'Pantex is safe, no doubt,' said Marty Schoenbauer, the acting chief of [DOE's] nuclear weapons program." Outside experts, "union officials and watchdog groups say ... that safety has regressed since 2000 as the most knowledgeable senior safety experts of the Cold War era retire and the plant's condition deteriorates." The "problems at Pantex came to light in the fall after Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington watchdog group, wrote two letters to Bodman complaining about safety."

Maryland Approves Car Pollution Legislation. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Rein, 690K) reports, "The House of Delegates overwhelmingly approved legislation yesterday that could make Maryland the 12th state to force carmakers to slash emissions thought to cause global warming. Senate leaders predicted approval of a similar bill this week, and Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) has pledged to sign the legislation." The "stricter standards for cars and trucks hitting dealerships in 2010 would put Maryland in the forefront of states seeking to slow climate change, environmentalists said." But "automakers said the requirements would raise prices and reduce choices for consumers -- to make way for more fuel-efficient cars, fewer sport-utility and other large vehicles would be on the market." The 122 to 16 House vote "included Republican support and reflected the power of the state's environmental movement after passage of legislation last year to curb pollution from coal-fired power plants."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Testimony Prompts Biden To Propose Funding For 1,000 New Agents. The Washington Times (2/21, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee that FBI referrals for counterterrorism cases increased a whopping 671 percent between 2001 and 2003 -- and to this day require 'difficult choices in determining how to most effectively use the available agents' -- did not go unheeded." Sen. Joe Biden "has introduced legislation to add 1,000 FBI agents to the bureau's roster, all to focus exclusively on traditional criminal cases. Estimated cost: $160 million per year."

California Border Agents Help DEA, ATF With Pot Seizure. The Casa Grande Valley (CA) Dispatch (2/21) reports, "Border Patrol agents from the Casa Grande station helped in confiscating $3.7 million worth of marijuana over the weekend." The Dispatch continues, "Agents were asked to help a Bureau of Land Management ranger who was pursing two trucks camouflaged with tarps near Stanfield about 6:45 a.m. Sunday. … While agents responded, the ranger reported his vehicle was intentionally struck by one of the trucks." The Dispatch adds, "Agents found both trucks abandoned on Stanfield Road. They found 4,660 pounds of marijuana in the two trucks, as well as a loaded .45 caliber pistol. … One of the trucks was reported stolen in San Diego, Calif., and was turned over to the Arizona Department of Public Safety. … The other truck is being processed for forfeiture by the Border Patrol. The marijuana was turned over to the DEA and the gun was given to ATF. No arrests have been made and no injuries were reported."

Colombian Woman Found Guilty Of Participating In FARC Drug-Smuggling Operation. There are more than 100 media references to the conviction of a Colombian rebel accused in a drug-smuggling scheme, with many media outlets using the AP story. The AP (2/21) reports a Colombian woman "was found guilty Tuesday of participating in an operation to smuggle tons of cocaine to the United States. Authorities say her case showed the main rebel group in Colombia is deeply involved in illegal drugs. Nayibe Rojas, known in the Colombian rebel movement as 'Sonia,' was convicted by a jury of conspiracy to import and-or distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine." The guilty verdict for Rojas "is a victory for the United States and Colombia, which have recently stepped up a campaign to portray the FARC, which is on the U.S. list of 'foreign terrorist organizations' as a drug-trafficking cartel." Media outlets that used the AP story include the New York Times, Houston Chronicle, Denver Post, and Seattle Post Intelligencer.

McClatchy Newspapers (2/20) reported the jury "also convicted two co-defendants, Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo weren't members of FARC, but the prosecutors argued that all three had conspired to send more than 5 tons of cocaine to the United States." The San Jose Mercury News used the McClatchy story.

The Miami Herald (2/21) reports Rojas "was the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, convicted of drug running by a U.S. federal court, although the U.S. and Colombian governments have long alleged that the FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry."

In Mississippi, Former Police Chief Sentenced In Extortion Case. The AP (2/20) reported a federal judge "sentenced Ruleville police Chief Ronald Robinson to 2 1/2 years in prison Tuesday for trying to extort protection money from drug dealers. Robinson agreed to plead guilty to extortion in an October plea deal that wiped out another extortion charge and four counts of attempting to aid in the possession of crack cocaine with the intent to distribute."

The Delta Democrat Times (2/21) reports Robinson "admitted…he obtained a cash payoff of $3,000 to which he was not entitled, in exchange for not pursuing drug and gambling related charges against an individual and for providing protection for an individual that he believed to be distributing crack cocaine." The Democrat Times notes the DEA's involvement in the case.

Jackson (MS) Clarion Ledger (2/20) also reported Robinson's sentencing.

Kentucky Prescription Drug "Kingpin" Gets 20-Year Sentence. The Lexington (KY) Herald-Leader (2/21) reports a Berea man who "was the kingpin of a drug ring was sentenced yesterday to 20 years in federal prison in one of the largest prescription drug investigations in Eastern Kentucky. Danny Clark, 51, was indicted in U.S. District Court in April along with other members of the ring including his brother Richard Clark, Marlene and Rufus Holmes, Samuel Duane Lawson and James Ellis Renner. Clark and others were arrested after a long-term investigation by Rockcastle and Laurel County Sheriff's deputies, London and Richmond police officers, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and the Kentucky State Police." According to the indictment, Clark "was the leader of a drug ring that sold oxycodone and methadone from January 1998 through April 2006 mostly in Madison and Rockcastle counties."

IMMIGRATION:

Increased Border Security Measures Said To Be Reducing Illegal Immigration. Under the headline "Tougher Tactics Deter Migrants At US Border," the New York Times (2/21, McKinley, 1.16M) describes the increase in US border enforcement as experienced by Eduardo Valenzuela, who had been making an illegal journey from Mexico into Colorado for the past decade. "'It's become much more difficult,' Mr. Valenzuela said, echoing the comments of dozens of other migrants." The times continues, "All along the border, there are signs that the measures the Border Patrol and other federal agencies have taken over the last year, from erecting new barriers to posting 6,000 National Guardsmen as armed sentinels, are beginning to slow the flow of illegal immigrants." Though some immigration experts argued that "it was too early to tell if the enforcement efforts had caused a permanent downturn," commanders with the Border Patrol "say they see no explanation for the drop-off across the entire 2,000-mile border other than stiffer enforcement deterring migrants. The slackening flow, they argue, belies the conventional wisdom that it is impossible to stem illegal migration."

Dobbs Says Chertoff Border Trip Likely "Just A Photo-Op." On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/20, 6:30 pm) host Lou Dobbs noted that Secretary Chertoff was in Yuma, Arizona, to discuss new security barriers, but questioned whether it was "just a photo-op." Secretary Chertoff was shown welding part of the barrier and saying, "What the fencing does is it builds a barrier that slows up the people who want to cross illegally." CNN (Sylvester) continued, "A colorful photo-op, but critics say the border fence with Mexico is actually one of the nation's weakest security links. President Bush promised to build 700 miles of fencing as part of the Secure Fences Act signed in October. This year, only 75 miles of new actual border fence will be built. And by the time President Bush leaves office, there will only be 370 miles of fencing along the southern border. And much of it not fence that you can even see or touch: A virtual fence, sensors and cameras. Immigration reform groups say that's not good enough."

New Trial To Be Sought For Former Border Patrol Agents. The San Bernardino Sun (2/21) reports defense attorneys for two former El Paso, Texas, Border Patrol agents "convicted of shooting a Mexican drug smuggler will ask for a new trial based on evidence they say wasn't provided to them in court. Mary Stillinger, co-counsel for former Border Patrol agent Ignacio Ramos, said an April 12, 2005, Department of Homeland Security memo was never provided to them. The memo, written by Christopher Sanchez of the department's Inspector General's Office, acknowledged that all nine agents at the scene, including two supervisors, knew about the shooting, heard about the shooting and covered up the shooting."

Ontario, California's Daily Bulletin (2/20) reported, "Two convicted former El Paso Border Patrol agents accused by the U.S. Attorney of not filing a report when they shot a Mexican drug smuggler were prohibited by their own agency's firearms policy from doing so, according to documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin. … Ramos and [Jose Alonso] Compean were convicted last spring for shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican drug smuggler, in the buttocks on Feb. 17, 2005. The agents are now serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, in federal prison."

TAX:

Judge Refuses To Dismiss Tax-Evasion Charges Against Boston Rapper. The Boston Herald (2/21, Sweet, 184K) reports, "A federal judge refused to dismiss tax-evasion charges against a controversial Hub hip-hop artist on the opening day of his trial yesterday simply because the rapper's accountant was singing to the FBI and IRS about his alleged shenanignans. Lawyers for Ray 'Benzino' Scott, 41, former co-owner of the hip-hop magazine The Source, argued in court papers, 'There is something fundamentally wrong with the government employing (Scott's) controller to gather evidence of other crimes at the very same time the controller is ostensibly putting together the information necessary to prepare (Scott's) tax returns.' But U.S. District Court Judge Rya W. Zobel sided with federal prosecutors, who called Scott's eleventh-hour bid 'far from candid.'

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Presses Case For Healthcare Plan With Insurers. Market Watch (2/21, Watts) reports, "Faced with a growing chorus for some type of universal healthcare coverage, President Bush met with insurers Tuesday to argue his case for changing the tax code in a bid the White House says will make health insurance more affordable for many Americans." After meeting with the CEOs, "including the top executives at Aetna Inc.," Bush said, "I discussed my health care plan that would ... equalize the tax code so that the individual would be more likely to be able to purchase a plan, because I believe a good health care system is one that rewards the consumer, encourages the consumer, and makes sure the consumer has got the capacity to make viable choices." Market Watch adds that Bush, "in his State of the Union address last month, outlined a plan that would significantly alter the tax treatment of employer-provided health benefits." Democratic leaders "have said the Bush plan has little chance of advancing legislatively."

Bush's healthcare meeting generated little media coverage, print or otherwise. The exception were the handful of local TV newscasts that covered the event. KJCT-TV Grand Junction, CO (2/20, 10:08 pm) broadcast near the beginning of its 10 o'clock newscast that President Bush "is taking the next step toward getting his healthcare initiatives turned into law. The President outlined his plan during his State of the Union Address last month. Today, he discussed his objectives in detail with members of the health insurance community and small business leaders."

KCRG-TV Cedar Rapids (2/20, 10:00 pm) reported, "President Bush is trying to get Congress to enact his healthcare initiatives. … Today he" met "with members of the health insurance community and small business leaders at the White House. The President asked participants to lobby Congress to approve the policy."

WDAY-TV Fargo (2/20, 5:01 pm) also noted the White House meeting, adding, "Democrats say the President's plan will encourage companies to drop employee coverage." KEYT-TV Santa Barbara (2/20, 6:39 pm), KIFI-TV Idaho Falls (2/20, 5:23 pm), KTVA-TV Anchorage (2/20, 5:05 pm) ran very similar reports.

West Wing Likes Wyden's Bipartisan Offer On Health Care. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/20) reported that some West Wing insiders "have a new favorite among the Democrats," Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon, who "took the lead in having a small group of senators send a letter to President Bush recently offering to work with the Administration on improving the health-care system, one of Bush's top priorities for the remainder of his Presidency." A GOP strategist "with close ties to the West Wing" tells the Bulletin, "The White House is very appreciative. We think it's sincere and a very good sign that we can have a constructive relationship with the Democrats." Bush is expected to call for bipartisan cooperation on health care -- just what Wyden is urging -- in a meeting on the subject this afternoon at the White House."

Bush Plan Seen As Unlikely To Reduce Uninsured. In a BusinessWeek (2/21) "Viewpoint" article, Robert Greenstein and Edwin Park of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities say that Bush's health insurance proposal "is unlikely to significantly reduce the ranks of the uninsured, in part because it isn't targeted at the people who can least afford coverage. Moreover, the plan could cause many people in poor health to lose coverage by weakening the employer-based health system—the source of most Americans' health insurance—without putting a viable alternative in its place." There are "three basic problems with the President's plan." Most of the uninsured "would receive only modest help." The plan "would weaken employer-based coverage. While highly imperfect, the employer-based health system is the principal means for 'pooling' healthy and sick workers together, so that insurance is affordable for those in poor health." And finally, the plan "provides no viable pooling alternative to employer-based coverage."

Little Public Trust For Bush On Healthcare. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) reports a new Wall Street Journal Online/Harris health-care poll finds "nearly half of Americans don't trust President Bush to reform the nation's health-care system." Asked how much "they trust the president to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system, 49% said 'not at all,' while 16% said 'not much,' according to the online survey of 2,482 U.S. adults. By comparison, 18% said they trust Mr. Bush 'to some extent' and only 9% trust him 'a great deal' on the issue. The survey was conducted Feb. 7-9." The survey "found more confidence in Democrats than Republicans," and among "potential presidential contenders, 48% said they trust Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton on the issue a great deal or to some extent, while 45% said the same about Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, 34% about Republican Sen. John McCain and 19% about Republican Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts."

Bush To Visit Chattanooga To Promote Healthcare Agenda. The Chattanoogan (2/20) reported, "A group opposed to the war in Iraq will protest during President Bush's visit to Chattanooga. But the Hamilton County Republican Party was urging a turnout of support for the President." The president is "set to fly into the Chattanooga Metropolitan Airport on Air Force One Wednesday morning." Bush is "due to make about a 20-minute tour of Erlanger Medical Center prior to going to the Convention Center. There he will hold a 'conversation on healthcare initiatives.'" Gov. Phil Bredesen "will join President Bush in Chattanooga on Wednesday 'for several events that will focus on expanding healthcare options for the uninsured.'" Also "set to be in the entourage are Sen. Lamar Alexander, Sen. Bob Corker and Rep. Zach Wamp."

Local newscasts in Tennessee on Tuesday reported on Bush's planned visit today, noting the stops are part of the President's efforts to promote healthcare reform. Local news also noted Bush's plans to give an award to a local volunteer. Some examples: WDEF-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 11:01 pm) broadcast at the top of its 11 o'clock newscast that the President "will tour Erlanger tomorrow, and plans to discuss healthcare access in a roundtable session later at the convention center. While in town, President Bush will honor one local woman for her dedication to volunteering. Debbie Chadwick will be awarded the USA Freedom Corps Greeter Award for her years of service at Life Care Center of Missionary Ridge."

WTVC-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 11:02 pm) said that "everywhere…Bush goes" he "honors one person who's made a difference in the lives of others." Debbie Chadwick "has Down's syndrome, but that has not stopped her from starting up three programs at the center. She'll get the award at the Chattanooga airport when the President gets off the plane tomorrow." WRCB-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 11:01 pm), WDSI-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 10:01 pm), WSMV-TV Nashville (2/20, 6:33 pm), WKRN-TV Nashville (2/20, 5:06 pm), and WREG-TV Memphis (2/20, 5:03 pm) also covered the President's visit.

Medicare Benefit Slows Growth In Prescription Drug Spending. The Washington Post (2/21, A6, Lee, 690K) reports Federal number analysts said "that the new Medicare drug benefit appears to be slowing the growth in national spending on prescription medicines because the drug plans are negotiating lower prices with drug companies." However, the analysts "also forecasted that overall health-care spending would continue to rise and would account for nearly 20 percent of the economy -- or more than $4 trillion a year -- by 2016. In contrast, health-care spending was about $2.1 trillion in 2006, accounting for about 16 percent of the economy." The findings "provide new fuel for the debate about whether Medicare could get better drug prices if the government negotiated with pharmaceutical companies. Many Democrats in Congress say it would, and the House has already passed legislation requiring the government to use its negotiating muscle."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "Healthcare spending in the United States will nearly double over the next decade to $4.1 trillion in 2016, government economists said today, prompting concern that Americans cannot keep paying for cost increases that outstrip the growth of the economy." The healthcare bill "will average $12,782 for every man, woman and child in 2016, an increase from $7,498 this year, said the report, published online by the policy journal Health Affairs. Healthcare costs will account for nearly 20 cents out of every dollar Americans spend in 2016, up from about 16 cents today." And by 2016 — 'even before most baby boomers retire and become Medicare recipients — federal, state and local government will be picking up nearly half the national healthcare tab, putting pressure on Congress to curb benefits, raise taxes or both."

Roberts Opposed To Bush's Medicare, Medicaid Budget Plans. The AP (2/21, Hanna) reports Republican Sen. Pat Roberts is working with Democratic Sen. Blanche Lincoln "to block some of President Bush's budget proposals for social services, suggesting those recommendations could amount to 'rationing health care.'" Roberts said he "doubts Bush's proposals enjoy much support, so he would like Congress to avoid a lengthy back-and-forth before providing additional funds for the Medicare and Medicaid programs. He's most concerned about payments to hospitals that provide services to the programs' participants." Bush's proposals "are designed to save $76 billion over five years in Medicare, the program that provides medical services for the elderly. They also would trim $25 billion from Medicaid, the medical program for low-income people."

Employer Groups Want Tighter Family Leave Restrictions. The Hill (2/21, Holzer) reports, "Employer groups are trying to persuade the Bush administration to restrict the illnesses that qualify under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) and make it less tempting for workers to take sporadic time off under the law." The FMLA "requires businesses with at least 50 employees to give 12 weeks' unpaid leave to workers for the birth or adoption of a child or in the case of their own or a close family member's sickness." Employers say "weaknesses in the law and the regulations handed down since it was passed have spawned rampant abuse by shirkers and headaches for managers in charge of approving and tracking leave." The "latest push by employers to modify the FMLA comes on the heels of a Department of Labor (DoL) request in December for public comment on the law and just after Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), one of its original architects, introduced a bill Feb. 1 to expand the act. His legislation would ensure six weeks' paid leave under the FMLA, to be funded by the federal government, the employer and the employee."

Coterie Of Texas Aides Remains At Bush's Side. The New York Times (2/21, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Israel Hernandez "was a fresh-faced college graduate from the Texas border town of Eagle Pass in the summer of 1993 when he landed a job in Dallas as the personal aide to the part-owner of the Texas Rangers George W. Bush." Now, "after nearly 14 years in Mr. Bush's employ, with a short break to get a master's degree, Mr. Hernandez, 37, travels the world promoting free trade as an assistant secretary of commerce. From his sun-drenched corner office, with its sweeping view of the Washington Monument, he can sit at his desk and watch the presidential helicopter, Marine One, ferry around the man to whom he owes his career." The Times adds, "Six years into Mr. Bush's presidency, the corps of loyal Texans who accompanied him to Washington from Austin remains a powerful force inside the administration, a steady source of comfort for an increasingly isolated president. No matter how grim the polls or dire the news in Iraq, they have stood by Mr. Bush — and been rewarded with plum jobs — as their lives have grown increasingly intertwined with one another's and with his." To hear "these people talk about the president is to meet a man many Americans have either forgotten or no longer recognize. Their George W. Bush is the compassionate conservative who helped soften the harsh image of the Republican Party, a man who chokes up at going-away parties, as he did last year for Andrew H. Card Jr., his departing chief of staff; a man unafraid of giving promotions to openly gay people, as he did with Mr. Hernandez, and who always remembers to ask how the family is." The Texas "circle includes three cabinet officials — Ms. Spellings, the education secretary; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez; and Alphonso R. Jackson, the secretary of housing and urban development — as well as some of the best-known names in Washington: Karl Rove, the chief political strategist, Mr. Bartlett and Ms. Hughes."

Snow Appears Not To Be Troubled By Antagonistic Questioning. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/20) reported, "How is White House Press Secretary Tony Snow holding up under the increasingly antagonistic questioning of the press corps on Iraq, Iran, North Korea, President Bush's low approval ratings, and other issues?" One of Snow's "colleagues in the West Wing" tells the Bulletin, "He has fun with it. He loves to parry." The Bulletin adds, "Even amid adversarial sessions with reporters, Snow almost always manages to keep his good humor and he doesn't take the sharp-edged interrogations personally. The former conservative commentator on TV and radio says give-and-take is part of the job." A White House colleague says, "He just rolls with it." The Bulletin adds that other White House insiders "say Snow has learned to delegate, so he doesn't get wrapped up in the minutiae of media logistics, and is willing to refer reporters to other departments of government, such as the Pentagon and State Department, if he isn't comfortable talking about certain topics. This saves him time and lessens the aggravation." But Snow "likes to maintain his role as chief White House spokesman on the truly big issues, such as Iran and how the administration is dealing with Congress. Beyond all this, Snow is still giving speeches to Republican groups around the country to rally support for Bush." GOP insiders "say he is a considerable draw, especially among conservatives who admire his aggressive defense of the President and his daily push-back against the mainstream media."

Administration Officials Pledge To Address Concerns Raised By Walter Reed Expose. The Washington Post (2/21, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports the White House and congressional leaders yesterday "called…for swift investigation and repair of the problems plaguing outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, as veterans groups and members of Congress in both parties expressed outrage over substandard housing and the slow, dysfunctional bureaucracy there." The Post "documented tattered conditions at Building 18, including mold, rot, mice and cockroaches, but also a larger bureaucratic indifference that has impeded some soldiers' recovery. ... Walter Reed's fixes are unlikely to immediately quiet the criticism from members of Congress, who received a flood of calls from the public and veterans groups asking how the problems could have been unknown to officials -- some of whom regularly visit Walter Reed."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 5, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The charges prompted the Pentagon to authorize an independent review of the situation at Walter Reed." NBC added that the President" often visits Walter Reed's state of the art inpatient Ward 57. But today his spokesman referred all questions to the Pentagon." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "Well, I'll tell you what. Is the system working? Yes. Is it working perfectly? No."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/10) reported, "Many of our troops wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan receive treatment at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. The center describes itself as the Army's top medical facility. But tonight, there is rising outrage over what is nothing less than a failure of leadership in the care of our wounded troops at Walter Reed as first reported by the Washington Post. … Top Army leaders say they were unaware of the problem until they read about it in the paper Sunday." Army Secretary Francis Harvey "said the Army will look at conditions, not just here at Walter Reed, but at out-patient facilities around the country." CNN's Lou Dobbs added that for "the commander in chief to permit this" is "despicable."

CNN.com (2/20) reported Harvey "blamed a failure of leadership for substandard conditions in a building that is part of Walter Reed Army Medical Center and vowed Tuesday to move quickly to fix the problem. ... Harvey said he learned about the conditions in the building, a former hotel where some soldiers have been recuperating for more than a year and a half, on Sunday, when the Washington Post broke the story."

The AP (2/20) reports Sens. Barbara Mikulski and Patty Murray "urged Defense Secretary Robert Gates in a letter Tuesday to launch an inspector general's investigation." Sens. Barack Obama and Claire McCaskill "said they are working on legislation to improve the care of war veterans." The AP adds, "The Pentagon responded Tuesday by announcing that the Army has begun a review of medical care at Walter Reed and the Navy has undertaken a similar review at its National Naval Medical Center. The Pentagon also said an independent review group would be formed to investigate outpatient and administrative issues at the two military medical centers." More than 100 sites carried this story.

MSNBC's Hardball (2/20, Matthews) reported, "Today Washington is still focused on this week's big Washington Post story, which detailed the negligent treatment of wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Hospital -- patients recovering amidst filth, mold, rats and overall neglect." McCaskill, during an interview, said, "it's not the hospital that's the problem. It's the outpatient. And I think their system has been overloaded. I don't think they were prepared for the number of outpatients that they have, the serious injuries that are occurring, the loss of limbs, the need for social workers, the reintegration. They've overwhelmed these men and women with paperwork and bureaucracy. And they didn't have any place to put them. So they start putting them places that they shouldn't have put them."

The Washington Post (2/21, A14, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, says that conditions on the post will improve rapidly. His response is commendable, and it should not be forgotten that thousands of professionals and volunteers, civilian and military, are working hard to help veterans heal and adjust. But it also should not have taken newspaper articles to bring change to outpatient conditions at Walter Reed. And while filthy conditions at Building 18 are a temporary problem for these veterans, lowball settlements may leave soldiers and their families impoverished for life."

Budget Deficit Shrinking To Half Of Average Size Since 1970. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Trumbull, 59K) reports, "With the robust economy, tax revenues are pouring in. But rising costs lie ahead. Despite the ongoing costs of US military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the outlook for the federal budget has grown substantially brighter." Tax revenues "are rising much faster than spending, according to Treasury Department numbers released last week. The recent trend is strong enough that, were it to continue, the budget could move into surplus in barely a year, one economist calculates. Already, the federal deficit is shrinking toward about half the size that it has averaged since 1970, when analyzed as a percentage of gross domestic product." The "shift reflects a strong economy, with higher incomes and corporate profits generating a bigger flow of tax revenue. In turn, the Treasury's progress could help the economy by buoying investor confidence in the nation's fiscal position." However, "the improvement does little to stave off the long-run challenges to the nation's financial health, many economists say. Baby boomers are starting to retire, placing new demands on government. Costs for healthcare programs like Medicare are still projected to rise faster than overall inflation."

Murtha Says Peru Free-Trade Deal A Threat To National Security. The Hill (2/21, Swanson) reports Rep. John Murtha (D), "a close ally" of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi), "is calling elements of a Peru free-trade agreement (FTA) signed by the Bush administration a threat to national security. The chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee has warned Democratic leaders on trade that the deal grants a United Arab Emirates company the ability to invest in US ports." Murtha "has asked Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) to demand that the administration alter the free-trade deal it negotiated with Peru to prevent enterprises there from investing in US landside port activities."

White House Defends Rumsfeld. The Washington Times (2/21, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The White House yesterday defended Donald H. Rumsfeld after criticism from Republican Sen. John McCain that he was one of the worst defense secretaries in history for his handling of the Iraq war. … 'We think Donald Rumsfeld was an enormously consequential and effective secretary of defense and somebody who led to the transformation of the Department of Defense. Senator McCain holds a different point of view,' White House spokesman Tony Snow said." The Times adds, "Asked if Mr. McCain's comments should be chalked up to election politics, Mr. Snow replied: 'I left the chalk at home.'"

Bolton Book Expected By End Of Year. The Washington Post's (2/21, A13) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that John Bolton's "tell-all book on his days at the State Department and as ambassador to the United Nations could be coming out as early as the end of this year." Kamen says "top folks in Foggy Bottom and at the United Nations are most surely not going to be happy when this one comes out. The buzz is that it's going to focus mostly on Bolton's work at the United Nations, where he's said to be still upset at his inability to lop off 10 of the building's 38 floors that he had said were expendable." However, it is "unclear how Bolton will treat his most recent bosses, Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice."

Johnson Leaves Hospital, Enters Rehab Facility. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, 690K) reports, "More than two months after suffering a brain hemorrhage, Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) has left a Washington hospital and entered a private rehabilitation facility, his office said yesterday. A spokeswoman refused to say whether the senator remained in Washington or was moved to a facility in South Dakota, citing family concerns about media scrutiny." ABC World News (2/20, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) noted "Johnson's illness had put the Democrats' one-seat advantage in the Senate in jeopardy."

State And Federal Governments' Unfunded Pension Liability Threatens Budgets. USA Today (2/21, 1A, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports, "More and more, retirees are finding that it pays to have worked for the government instead of the private sector. … As the first wave of 79 million baby boomers heads to retirement, the nation is dividing into two classes of workers: those who have government benefits and those who don't. The gap is accelerating in every way: pensions, medical benefits, retirement ages. Retired government workers are twice as likely to get a pension as their counterparts in the private sector, and the typical benefit is far more generous. The nation's 6 million retired civil servants — teachers, police, administrators, laborers — received a median benefit of $17,640 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service. Eleven million private-sector retirees covered by traditional pensions got $7,692. Governments' generosity could have serious consequences for taxpayers and pensioners. Some states…have troubled retirement systems that may require huge tax increases, spending cuts or even defaulting on promised benefits. The U.S. government has a bigger unfunded liability for military and civil servant retirement benefits ($4.7 trillion) than it does for Social Security ($4.6 trillion). The pension gap will continue to widen because governments pump far more money into employee pensions than companies do."

Survey Results Suggest Many Employees Unaware Of TSP Account Activity. The Washington Post's (2/21, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "For lack of a better phrase, we'll call them the TSP No-Shows. Some members of the Thrift Savings Plan rarely or never check to see how much money is in their retirement accounts. Others have seemingly vanished because their mail is returned to the TSP as undeliverable." The Post adds that the "problem of dropouts in a large organization" is hardly "surprising. The TSP, the 401(k)-type program for government workers, has more than 3.7 million members around the world. With more than $210 billion in assets, it is one of the nation's largest retirement programs. But the no-shows have emerged as a concern at the TSP, in part because of what the staff at the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, which oversees the TSP, learned from a recent survey." The Post adds that the survey results suggest "about 16 percent of TSP members rarely or never review their retirement accounts. What was of more concern was the response from those who have most at stake in the TSP -- employees covered by the newer Federal Employees Retirement System -- because TSP savings will be a larger share of their retirement income. Of that group, 18 percent said they almost never or never look at their accounts."

Helen Thomas To Lose Front-Row Seat In New White House Briefing Room. The Politico (2/21) reports, "Every theater-style seat in the White House briefing room, now closed for renovation, had a brass plaque inscribed with the name of a news organization. Only one, in the middle of the front row, had a name: 'HELEN THOMAS,' it said. The unique assigned seat between the chairs for CBS News and ABC News was reserved for the legendary United Press International correspondent who is now a columnist for Hearst Newspapers." The press corps "is scheduled to move from temporary facilities back into the spiffed-up, rewired briefing room in May or June. Thomas, who has been questioning presidents and press secretaries for 46 years, plans to be there. But her front-row seat won't be." The Politico adds, "Plans call for her to be moved to the second row to make room for a cable news channel – a sign of Washington's changing pecking order, and of the new ways that Americans get their news."

NYTimes Urges Bush To Convene Task Force On Infrastructure Improvements. The New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) editorializes, "As William Yardley reported recently in The Times, the country's water and sewer lines, many of them a century old, are in terrible shape, leading to those collapsing roads. And the Army Corps of Engineers reported earlier this month that more than 120 levees around the country could fail in a major flood. New Orleans needs to remain an exception, rather than a sad model for the future." America's "ability to compete isn't just a matter of being inventive and having a good work ethic, but also depends on the ability to deliver products reliably and on time. The first president with a master's degree in business administration -- hint, he's the current Oval Office occupant -- should convene a task force of federal, state and local officials to address the growing problem."

WPost Urges Congressional Passage Of "Passengers' Bill Of Rights." The Washington Post (2/21, 690K) editorializes, "The renewed push for a passenger bill of rights gained traction in the Valentine's Day ice storm, when nine fully loaded JetBlue aircraft sat on the tarmac at John F. Kennedy airport in New York, some frozen to the ground, for six to 10 hours. In addition to the hundreds who were held hostage on stifling planes that ran out of food and water, hundreds more were stranded as JetBlue's operations ground to a halt." Sen. Barbara Boxer "introduced a passengers' bill of rights on Saturday and Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) plans to do the same next week. Both bills require airlines to allow travelers to get off planes after three hours of delay. That's more reasonable than what JetBlue is offering. And Mr. Thompson's bill goes a step further to mandate frequent updates on the cause and timing of delays.

Dow Closes At New All-Time High. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, McKay, 2.04M) reports, "Solid earnings at Wal-Mart Stores and a drop in oil prices outweighed weak results at Home Depot, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record. The blue-chip average gained 19.07 points, or 0.1%, to end at 12786.64, up 2.6% on the year. … Other market measures posted their highest closes in more than six years. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.3%, or 4.14 points, to 1459.68, up 2.9% on the year." The Nasdaq Composite Index "added 0.7%, or 16.73 points, to 2513.04, up 4% on the year." USA Today (2/21, Shell, 2.27M), Washington Post (2/21, 690K) and Washington Times (2/21, 88K), among other major newspapers, run similar stories this morning.

Pump Prices Rise For Third Straight Week. ABC World News (2/20, story 7, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The price of gas has gone up for the third week in a row. The government says the average price of a gallon rose 6 cents over the past week, hitting $2.30 on average, partly because oil prices have been rising with the cold weather."

Collapse Of Juror Leads To Mistrial In Malpractice Case. The New York Times (2/21, Zezima) reports from Boston, "A mistrial was declared on Tuesday in a medical malpractice case brought by the head football coach at the University of Notre Dame after a juror collapsed and the defendants, two doctors at Massachusetts General Hospital, rushed to help him." The Times continues, "The coach, Charlie Weis, who had N.F.L. coaching positions with the New England Patriots, the New York Giants and the New York Jets, has accused the doctors of negligence by letting him bleed internally for 30 hours after a gastric bypass in 2002. … Mr. Weis's lawyer said that he nearly died after the procedure and that the operation left his legs with nerve damage." The Times adds, "The doctors, Richard A. Ferguson and Charles M. Hodin, said that Mr. Weis knew the dangers of the operation and that bleeding was not uncommon after such surgery. … Around 10 a.m. as another doctor was testifying, a juror gasped and lost consciousness. The witness, with Drs. Ferguson and Hodin, rose and helped the juror, who was taken to a hospital. … After the juror left, Mr. Weis's lawyer, Michael Mone, asked Judge Charles T. Spurlock of Superior County in Suffolk County for a mistrial. In an interview, Mr. Mone said two jurors had told the judge that the events could influence their verdict."

Supreme Court To Hear State's Appeal On Judicial Selection Process. After two lower courts declared New York's judicial selection process unconstitutional on the grounds that it denies the freedom of political association, the New York Times (2/21, Greenhouse) says the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to review that matter based on an appeal by the New York State Board of Elections; several political organizations; the incumbent State Supreme Court justices; and Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. The paper says Gov. Spitzer's view of the case "will be a matter of some interest as it goes forward. Addressing the Rockefeller Institute of Government shortly after his election as governor, Mr. Spitzer indicated that he did not support the existing system, which he said was 'in dire need of reform.' According to an account in The New York Law Journal, the governor-elect said that 'there must be a way to primary onto the ballot,' and added that 'I will not support anything that has a closed convention structure, where only those who came out of the convention could be on the ballot.'" The paper notes that primaries pose the problem of judicial candidates having to raise "considerable amounts of money."

Romney To Air First TV Ads. The New York Times (2/21, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Mitt Romney "will run television advertisements in five states starting Wednesday, the latest sign of how quickly the 2008 campaign is moving." The ads "are an early move to inform Republican primary voters about his views and record at a time when he has come under some criticism by opponents for shifting his views on several issues. The television advertising campaign will begin in Iowa and New Hampshire on Wednesday and then expand to South Carolina, Florida and Michigan, all states with early 2008 contests, his aides said. The advertisements will run for about two weeks." As is "typical with early introductory advertisements, they focus heavily on presenting information about someone who is little known outside his state, focusing in particular on his tenure as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City."

Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) reported that in "an unprecedentedly early move for position," Romney "has launched the first multi-state ad blitz of the campaign, hoping to define himself on his own terms by touching on both socially and fiscally conservative issues." Romney ad: "I believe the American people are overtaxed and the government is overfed. I believe our laws ought to be written by the people and not by unelected judges."

The Politico (2/21, Martin) reports the "spot also allows Romney to boost his name ID in the key early states, where he currently lags far behind the better-known Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani. While Romney has put together a solid organization in each of these initial nominating states and created buzz with the political class, he's yet to penetrate the larger population. These ads aim to change that."

Romney Camp Targets McCain On Abortion Issue. In a report on his blog at the website of The Politico (2/20), Jonathan Martin related, "The campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, whose stance on abortion has often been hard to pin down, now is attacking Sen. John McCain on the issue, accusing the Arizonan of ducking the debate over the right to life since his 2000 presidential bid. 'Ask the pro-life movement where his leadership has been in the six years since 2000 that he's been running for president,' says Gary Marx, who is charged with handling conservative outreach for Romney. 'What has he done?' But isn't it a bit audacious for the campaign of a candidate who was, in his own words, 'effectively pro-choice' as late as his 2002 gubernatorial run, to now take shots at the record of a consistently pro-life opponent? 'We're making sure that all primary voters and [conservative] leaders have full picture on all the candidates,' responds Marx. Which is why Marx sent an e-mail…last night to more than 100 influential social conservatives highlighting various news clips about McCain's stance on abortion, bolding and italicizing those lines that call into question the senator's commitment to ending the practice."

Romney's Political Views Said To Undergoing An "Extreme Makeover." In her Washington Post column (2/21, A15), Ruth Marcus says that in a 2006 interview, Mitt Romney did "his best not to explain his views on abortion," and his "baroque circumlocutions seemed to say so much about him. It was hard to know what Romney actually thought about abortion rights other than that this was a political minefield it was best to avoid stepping into for as long as possible. But it was also hard to see how a man with deeply held convictions on abortion rights -- either for or against -- could take a position so calibrated and inconclusive. Listening to Romney that day was like watching a chameleon in the fleeting moment that its color changes to suit its environment." Romney's "'Extreme Makeover: Political Edition' goes beyond abortion rights."

McCain Defends Outreach To Conservative Christians. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports Sen. John McCain "is defending his outreach to conservative Christians, arguing that his effort is not political pandering to win the GOP nomination." McCain "met privately Monday with religious broadcasters in Orlando, Fla., then answered questions about his appeal to conservatives in Vero Beach." In the 2000 campaign, McCain "angered the party's right by calling evangelist leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell 'agents of intolerance.' Last spring, he spoke at Falwell's Liberty University although hard feelings still linger among some conservatives. Focus on the Family founder James Dobson has said he won't support McCain." McCain said, "Nobody accused me of courting and pandering to the liberals when I went to the New School. What I have found out in my life, is that every time I have done something for political reasons and not the right reasons, I have paid a very heavy price for it — a big price."

McCain Backing For Iraq Surge Hurts GOP Support. The Financial Times (2/21, Luce) reports, "Once considered the un-crowned Republican candidate for the 2008 presidential election, John McCain's fortunes are plummeting rapidly. And the senator's frustrations are beginning to show." At a campaign stop in South Carolina on Monday, McCain "lashed out at Donald Rumsfeld, the controversial former defence secretary, as 'one of the worst secretaries of defence in history.'" The Times adds that in spite "of his criticisms of the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq war since 2003, Mr McCain is starting to pay a price on the campaign trail." Since his strong show of support for President Bush's Iraq troop surge, McCain's "poll numbers among registered Republican voters and among the US public at large have fallen sharply."

McCain Picks Up Endorsements From DeWine, Other GOP Lawmakers. The Hill (2/21, Schor) reports Sen. McCain "yesterday picked up a 2008 endorsement from Ohio's former GOP senator, Mike DeWine, who maintains strong name-recognition in the quintessential swing state, despite losing his seat last year. Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.) also joined McCain's 2008 bid." Of the "17 House Republicans who voted with Democrats on last week's resolution condemning the Bush administration's plan to add troops in Iraq, five are public McCain supporters: Reps. Ric Keller (Fla.), Fred Upton (Mich.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio), Mark Kirk (Ill.) and Castle."

2001 NARAL Speech Could Undercut Giuliani's Conservative Appeal. The Hill (2/21, Bolton) reports a speech Rudy Giuliani "delivered to an abortion-rights advocacy group when he was mayor of New York City and more recent comments about the Supreme Court could complicate his efforts to woo conservative votes in crucial presidential primary states." Giuliani will "test his new abortion talking points with conservative voters today when he campaigns in South Carolina, a state that is expected to pose an obstacle to centrist GOP presidential candidates next year." Giuliani, who "was an outspoken supporter of abortion rights when he ran for city office in the 1990s, has shifted his position to appeal to conservative voters by promising to nominate conservative jurists" such as Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito "to the federal courts if elected president." But the "credibility of that stance is undermined by remarks Giuliani delivered in April of 2001 to the National Abortion & Reproduction Rights Action League, now known as NARAL Pro-Choice America." In the speech, Giuliani thanked NARAL for "taking the lead in establishing freedom of choice for all of us," and he "indicated then that he supported changing the Republican Party's platform on abortion."

Obama Attends Los Angeles Rally, Hollywood Fundraiser. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Finnegan, 850K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "capped a three-day campaign swing through California today with a South Los Angeles rally where he told thousands of supporters he would 'transform the country' with sweeping change at home and abroad." Vowing to "shatter the insider culture of the nation's capital," Obama "said he would end the war in Iraq, expand health coverage to all Americans and fix the country's ailing public school system." Before "returning to his hometown of Chicago this evening, Obama plans to collect more than $1 million in Beverly Hills at a glitzy fund-raising reception thrown by DreamWorks studio founders David Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg." Celebrities who "bought $2,300 tickets to the Beverly Hills Hilton soiree include Barbra Streisand and George Clooney, said Andy Spahn, an organizer of the event." After the reception, Obama is "scheduled to dine at Geffen's Beverly Hills estate with roughly 40 guests — those who raised at least $46,000 apiece. He raised money earlier this week in La Jolla, San Francisco and Palo Alto." The "huge crowd at the Crenshaw event reflected the extraordinary interest that Obama has generated among Democrats. It is highly unusual for a presidential candidate to draw thousands of supporters to a Los Angeles rally nearly a year before California's primary — or even to try."

The AP (2/21, Blood) reports, "Checks from Hollywood's A-list stars such as George Clooney, Eddie Murphy and Barbra Streisand added up to a one-night take of $1.3 million for" Obama, who "told an audience that included Spielberg, Oscar nominee Eddie Murphy, actress Jennifer Anniston and singer Jackson Browne that they have 'enormous power' that comes with 'enormous responsibility' because of their impact on American culture." Obama's "display of celebrity sizzle and campaign dollars challenges any assumptions that Hollywood dollars would default to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who has long-standing ties to the industry, along with her husband, former President Clinton." Democratic consultant Garry South said, "I think this guy is for real."

The Washington Post (2/21, A4, Mosk, 690K) reports organizers "said they expected the freshman senator to leave town flush not only with money but also with valuable connections in a city that has for decades served as a lifeline for Democratic presidential contenders." The funds "collected now could provide an important boost, in that it will appear on Obama's first quarterly earnings report. Those figures, when released in April, will help signal his campaign's viability." A "clear undercurrent to yesterday's high-profile Hollywood swing was the ease with which Obama swept up support from entertainment industry titans who had once been squarely with President Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.)."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 7, 2:25, Whitaker, 7.66M) reported Obama "is in Los Angeles today being treated like a movie star. He came early, and he'll be here often, because California is set to play a bigger role this election cycle than ever before. Hollywood is abuzz about who's going to win the gold -- not the Oscar, the political pot of gold Hollywood liberally dishes out each presidential election. That's why Barack Obama is in town tonight. A glitzy fundraiser with top-tier stars paying $2,300 each is expected to raise more than $1.5 million for the first-term senator. Obama is a real box office draw, says LA-based political blogger Arianna Huffington." Arianna Huffington: "Hollywood is a city, a town, that understands the power of casting, and, you know, Obama, they have found a leading man." Whitaker: "All the major candidates come to Hollywood for money." But almost "everyone assumed the deep affection and deep pockets Hollywood had for Bill Clinton would transfer to Hillary Clinton. Instead, the money people are hedging their bets. Stephen Spielberg is throwing fund raisers for Obama and Hillary." Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff: "She cannot walk in the room and just say, you know, 'Remember me? I was with Bill Clinton.' That's not going to work anymore. She's going to have to earn it herself." Whitaker: "Next year, California and other big states plan to move their primaries up to early February and overshadow the smaller states." That means "that each candidate will have to raise about $20 million just to run in the California primary."

The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Dorning, Parson, 617K) reports Obama "made his debut as a presidential candidate among an A-list of Hollywood power and fame, tapping into one of the most formidable honey pots of Democratic money and connections." The "fact that the DreamWorks partners are so early in staging such a big party — expected to net at least $1 million — has drawn notable attention to Obama, especially as media from around the world assemble in advance of this weekend's Oscar ceremonies. For others in the circle, say some, it signals Obama as someone to take seriously."

Dowd Compares Obama's Hollywood Entrance With O'Hara's In "Gone With The Wind." In her New York Times column (2/21), Maureen Dowd says Obama has "made an entrance in Hollywood unmatched since Scarlett O'Hara swept into the Twelve Oaks barbecue. Instead of the Tarleton twins, the Illinois senator is flirting with the Dreamworks trio: Mr. Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, who gave him a party last night that raised $1.3 million and Hillary's hackles." She "didn't stand outside the gates to the Geffen mansion, where glitterati wolfed down Wolfgang Puck savories, singing the Jennifer Hudson protest anthem 'And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going.' But she's not exactly Little Miss Sunshine, either. Hillary loyalists have hissed at defecting donors to remember the good old days of jumping on the Lincoln Bedroom bed."

Obama To Deliver Keynote At Selma Bridge Commemoration. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports Sen. Obama will "deliver the keynote address next month at the annual Bridge Crossing Jubilee that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, organizers said Tuesday." Obama is "scheduled to speak at a March 4 service at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church, the site in Selma where marchers gathered in the historic protest that gave blacks across the South greater access to the ballot." Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., "who district includes Selma, asked Obama to participate and plans to hold a fundraiser for the Illinois senator."

Race Seen As Perplexing Issue For Obama. In his Washington Post column (2/21, B1), Courtland Milloy says, "Is Obama black enough for the black vote? Is he too black for the white vote? With a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, can he expect to take the mixed-race vote? It's as if the 'color line' had been encoded into the American DNA." According to "a recent survey by Zogby International, a majority of whites, 55 percent, classified Obama as 'biracial,' and 66 percent of blacks classified him as black. To some, it was ridiculous to question whether Obama was 'authentically black' when he was embraced by so many black people. But assigning him to that category only tightens the knot."

Edwards Denies Report He Considers Israel Threat To Peace. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports John Edwards' presidential campaign "wants to make it clear that he does not consider Israel a threat to world peace." An Edwards spokesman "issued a statement Tuesday denying such a report on Variety.com. Columnist Peter Bart reported that Edwards told a Hollywood fundraiser last month that the possibility that Israel would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities is perhaps the greatest short-term threat to world peace."

Clinton Outlines Initiatives For Black Students And Businesses. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports that during her first campaign trip to Florida, Sen. Hillary Clinton "criticized President Bush's education policy as doing little to help minorities and acknowledged that she is still searching for ways to raise minority student test scores." Clinton " said Bush's No Child Left Behind Act isn't providing a solution for raising test scores." Clinton "spoke and took questions for an hour from the mostly black audience of 300 in the Liberty City neighborhood. The event was sandwiched between fundraisers in Tampa, Miami and Hollywood that were closed to the press. The federal government can do more to help minority businesses by writing a road map for banks' roles in the communities, Clinton said." Clinton "also called for microlending programs and helping business owners to develop stronger business plans so they are more credit worthy."

Clinton's Use Of "Hillary" In Campaign Literature Noted. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) Peter Funt, host of the television program "Candid Camera," writes, "Someone has apparently decided that Mrs. Clinton will be the first major single-name candidate since 1952. … Mrs. Clinton announced her intentions via the Internet on a Web site called 'Hillary for President.' Incredibly, on the day of her announcement, the name 'Clinton' did not appear anywhere in the long text on the site's home page."

Democratic Presidential Candidates Converge On Nevada For Forum. USA Today (2/21, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "With eight prospects participating in a forum today," Carson City, NV "is experiencing a crush of attention usually reserved for places like Keene, N.H. or Davenport, Iowa. … Nevada's sudden clout arises from its new Jan. 19 slot on the Democratic primary calendar, between the Iowa caucuses (Jan. 14) and the New Hampshire primary that start the nomination season. Two questions surround Nevada: Can the state pull it off? Will New Hampshire, now slated for Jan. 22, move earlier to stay second? The Democrats' elevation of Nevada reflects their rising hopes for political success in Western states. President Bush won Nevada by less than 3 percentage points in 2004."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 8, :15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "And the presidential race takes a new twist tomorrow. Most of the Democrats will be on the same stage for the first time in Nevada."

Obama Will Not Participate. Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) noted that Nevada, "with its legalized gambling and prostitution, has been chosen by the Democratic party to caucus second after Iowa. A big candidates' forum is scheduled for Wednesday to promote caucus participation." Sen. Barack Obama visited Nevada Sunday butt is "skipping" Wednesday's forum. Sen. Hillary Clinton is "en-route to Nevada with the rest of the democratic field except for Obama."

Davis Defends Clinton's Iraq Vote. In an op-ed in The Hill (2/21), Lanny Davis says, "Although I am an ardent Iraq war critic and from the earliest days had serious doubts about granting the president discretionary authority to go to preemptive war in October 2002, I believe Sen. Clinton (whom I am supporting for president) has shown integrity and courage in refusing to pander to state that the vote at the time was a 'mistake' — given the information and belief she had concerning Saddam's WMD AND the clear conditions she set in her Senate speech explaining her vote." The "irony here is that Sen. Clinton is often criticized for seeming to be too calculating and opportunistic in taking positions on issues. Yet here she is standing on the truth and the facts known at the time, and refusing to pander and rewrite history."

Increasing Number Of Latino Evangelicals Bodes Well For GOP. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (2/21) reports, "A revolution is underway among America's Latino population that will have profound implications for the future of American politics. Of the 41.3 million Hispanics in the United States today, 37 percent identify themselves as 'born-again' or 'evangelical.' Just 10 years ago, the proportion that did so was about 15 percent. All told, there are now about 11 million Evangelical Protestant and 3 million Evangelical or Charismatic Catholic Latinos in the United States. In 1996, there were only 4 million." That shift "portends huge changes for American politics. With the Latino population swelling from 22 million in 1990 to 41 million in 2004, any change of these proportions in the beliefs of Hispanic-Americans will have a momentous impact on politics. Evangelicals, of any race or ethnicity, are fertile ground for Republicans and may provide a huge opening to swing the formerly Democratic Hispanic vote toward a more even-handed stance or even make it a core element of an emerging Republican majority. … Unfortunately, the hostile reception immigration reform has received from the GOP side of the aisle in Washington is turning off the very voters the Republicans can now, for the first time, hope to attract to their side. … It's time Republicans awakened to the political opportunities of Evangelical Hispanic conversions and got with the program."

Biden's Son And Brother Sue Former Business Partner. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/20, D2, Strasburg, Weidlich) reports that Sen. Joseph Biden's son R. Hunter Biden, a Washington lobbyist, "accused a former business partner of lying about his professional credentials and finances after they agreed to buy a hedge fund investment firm in 2006, according to a complaint in New York state court." Biden and James Biden, the senator's brother, "countersued Anthony Lotito Jr. on Feb. 13, saying he hid debts and falsely claimed he held securities licenses to lure them as partners in the planned $21.3 million acquisition. Lotito also persuaded the Bidens to hire a lawyer who had been convicted of fraud, according to the complaint."

Former State, CIA Officials To Launch Private Intelligence Firm. In its "Inside the Beltway" column, the Washington Times (2/21, 88K) reports Ambassador Cofer Black, the former ambassador-at-large and coordinator for counterterrorism at the State Department, and Rob Richer, who was the CIA's No. 2 for counterintelligence, "will create a new 'CIA-type' organization to address intelligence needs in the private sector. 'Terror attacks,' 'political instability,' 'avian-flu outbreaks,' and even severe weather events will be on the radar of the company, which the pair names Total Intelligence Solutions."

MacKinnon Notes Elderly DC Woman's Death Caused By Shut-Off Utilities. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/21, 11A, 2.27M) Douglas MacKinnon, former White House and Pentagon official, writes, "On Jan. 17, Bessie Sanders of Washington was killed in a house fire. It was determined by the fire department that 'Ms. Bessie,'…lost her life when the candle she was using for illumination in her bedroom accidentally started a fire. During the coldest part of the year, Ms. Bessie was using a candle for light because her electricity, gas and water had all been shut off. In this country, the last remaining superpower, an elderly woman needlessly perished when her government failed her. Even as friends and neighbors alerted the District of Columbia that Ms. Bessie's utilities needed to be reactivated, according to The Washington Post, the bureaucracy apparently failed to do so because she did not personally make the call, and a Social Security number was not provided. District officials said they had no record of her asking for assistance."

Cheney Reassures Japan On Nuclear Deal. AFP (2/21, Knox) reports Vice President Cheney "reassured Japan that the North Korea nuclear deal was a 'good first step' after a worried Tokyo refused to fund the pact." Japan has also "refused to provide energy aid to the nuclear-armed communist regime until it resolves an emotionally charged row over the past kidnappings of Japanese nationals." The Vice President "discussed the kidnappings among other issues in a breakfast meeting with Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki," said Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride.

Under the headline, "Cheney's Visit To Japan Exposes Tensions," the Financial Times (2/20, Pilling) reports Japan's defense minister, Fumio Kyuma, Tuesday "felt obliged to explain why he would not be meeting" Cheney. The US Vice President, "Kyuma explained, could not be expected to meet a mere defense minister." Behind Kyuma's "humble remarks lie an awkward diplomatic moment" after earlier this month he "lashed out at US foreign policy, saying Washington was wrong to invade Iraq and lambasting its arrogant attitude towards Okinawa, the island where the bulk of US troops in Japan are stationed." Kyuma's remarks "provoked outrage among Japan-handlers in the Bush administration and the embarrassment that has followed is one of several points of contention."

Negroponte To Visit Asia To Shore Up Support For Accord. On its front page, the Financial Times (2/21, A1, Dinmore) reports Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte's first mission is expected to take him to Asia next week "to shore up last week's breakthrough deal with North Korea." Negroponte will visit China, South Korea and Japan, officials said. One official said Negroponte "also planned to add Pyongyang to his itinerary, though others either denied this or said such a trip was unlikely at this stage." The Bush administration, "in particular Condoleezza Rice…has been fiercely criticized by Washington hawks over last week's deal." Officials admitted that a high-level visit to Pyongyang "would be controversial internally."

Iran Sets Conditions For Halt Of Nuclear Program. The AP (2/21, Jahn) reports Iran's chief nuclear envoy said Tuesday "his country wants to negotiate over its uranium enrichment program, on the eve of a U.N. Security Council deadline that carries the threat of harsher sanctions." But President Mahmoud Admadinejad "said Iran will halt enrichment only if Western nations do the same." Sanctions "could be triggered" by a report from IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei Wednesday to his agency's 35 board-member nations, which "is expected to say Iran has expanded enrichment activities instead of freezing them."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/21, A6) reports Bush administration officials "dismissed Iran's unusually conciliatory comments." White House spokesman Tony Snow called Ahmadinejad's pledge a "false offer," noting the Administration "hopes to push for new sanctions next month." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (2/21, Sands, 88K) reports State Department spokesman Tom Casey "said intensive negotiations are already under way" among the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council "about a new resolution imposing new penalties and restrictions on Iran." Moscow and Beijing "have been reluctant to back the Bush administration's hard line on Iran," but US officials "were encouraged by reports this week that Russia may delay the delivery of fuel for a planned nuclear plant it is building for Iran."

The Financial Times (2/21, Dombey) reports, "Many western diplomats question why Iran is accelerating its enrichment activities while Bushehr, the nuclear power plant the uranium is intended to feed, is behind schedule and was delayed further this week because of Iran's alleged failure to pay its Russian contractors." In an interview with the Times, ElBaradei said, "Iran sees enrichment...as a strategic goal because they feel that this will bring them power, prestige and influence. They feel that this will bring them into the company of some of the large and influential [states], the 12, 13 countries with enrichment processing, even if they don't have a weapon."

Experts Urge West To "Ratchet Up The Pressure" On Iran, Not Talk. Danielle Pletka and Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute write in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, A17, 2.04M) about how the West will respond to today's missed deadline. Earlier this month, they note, "Sir Richard Dalton, until recently Britain's ambassador in Tehran, called for direct talks between US and Iranian officials and suggested the West modify demands that the Islamic Republic suspend uranium enrichment. Unfortunately, his eagerness for dialogue is being echoed and amplified elsewhere, especially in the wake of the Bush administration's deal to pay North Korea for similar disarmament." However, Pletka and Rubin insist that "to change course now would signal the impotence of international institutions and multilateral diplomacy. History shows that when the supreme leader believes Western resolve is faltering, Iran will be more defiant and dangerous. Now is not the time to talk. If Washington and Europe truly believe in the primacy of multilateralism and diplomacy, now is the time to ratchet up the pressure."

US Commander Says Navy Buildup Came After Moves By Iran. In an interview with the AP (2/21, Krane), US Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh, the top US Navy commander in the Mideast, said Iran "has brought its war games maneuvers over the past year into busy shipping lanes in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow mouth of the Persian Gulf through." These moves "have alarmed US officials about possible accidental confrontations that could boil over into war, and led to a recent build-up of Navy forces in the Gulf," Walsh said. Although the additional US firepower "has ratcheted up tensions with Iran," Walsh "said the increase aims to reassure Arab allies in the Gulf and prevent misunderstandings that could escalate into outright conflict."

Rice Seeks Arab Support For Abbas. AFP (2/21, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Tuesday held talks in Jordan with intelligence chiefs of four Arab states "seen as crucial in backing Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his power struggle with the radical Islamic group Hamas." Rice also briefed Jordan's King Abdullah II on her meeting Monday in Jerusalem with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Rice's Mideast initiative "has been undermined by the power-sharing deal brokered by Saudi Arabia earlier this month which caught the US administration by surprise," according to a senior US official. The deal "infuriated Israel and almost torpedoed Monday's summit," officials said. However, while Rice "succeeded in bringing the meeting off and gaining a pledge by Olmert and Abbas to continue talking, tensions were apparent when neither man appeared at her side for the reading of a joint statement."

The Washington Post (2/21, A12, Kessler, 690K) says the "lackluster outcome of the Israeli-Palestinian summit brokered by Rice in Jerusalem on Monday suggests" the Secretary's earlier "optimism may be misplaced." While, "diplomats and Middle East experts applaud her willingness to invest her prestige in trying to solve an intractable problem," others "wonder whether her efforts are six years too late." However, Rice "insists that the conditions have never been better for peace." One Rice aide "conceded that there is 'diplomatic risk' to Rice forging ahead, but European officials are thrilled that she is now trying ideas they have long urged." A senior European official said Tuesday that "just the fact that Rice did not cancel the meeting in the face of Israeli resistance was a signal, because the administration has had a pattern of halting peace efforts at the first sign of trouble."

Israel Threatens To End Talks With Abbas. The AP (2/21, Gearan) reports Israel said Tuesday "it would stop dealing with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas if he goes ahead with plans to join Hamas in a new government." Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, "ruled out any talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he went ahead with plans to form a new Cabinet including Hamas." Israeli talks with Abbas "would be limited to matters such as improving living conditions for the Palestinians and ending Palestinian attacks against Israel."

The Washington Times (2/21, Kralev, 88K) reports Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said the agreements between Hamas and Fatah "disappoint all who supported separating the extremists from the moderates and creating an alternative government in the Palestinian Authority."

Palestinian Factions Struggle To Maintain Truce. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A9, Simpson, 2.04M) reports representatives of Hamas and Fatah both "acknowledged in separate interviews yesterday that tensions remain high and that there have been multiple breaches of their accord. Still, they said their fears about open warfare erupting anew were based on political and diplomatic processes far beyond the streets where their men maintain a tense standoff." One key factor, which remains unclear, "is whether Saudi Arabia will abide by its pledge to supply $1 billion to the new unity government. If it does, it is possible Mr. Abbas could continue to press ahead with Hamas even if the US and Israel shun the Palestinian government." US officials "also have declined to say whether they are pressuring the Saudi regime to freeze that pledge." Meanwhile, Secretary Rice "is in a precarious position. If she pushes too hard, she could create an even greater backlash across the region and beyond, since the deal has brought an end to Palestinian bloodshed."

Mecca Accord Added To Challenge US Faces In Brokering Peace Deal. The New York Times (2/21, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) says the Mecca accord "added to the already formidable challenge the United States faces as it tries to accomplish another strategic goal: getting the Palestinians and Israelis back to the negotiating table for peace talks for the first time in six years." The pact "largely torpedoed the American-sponsored meeting on Monday," leaving the Times to question, "So why did Saudi Arabia broker a power-sharing agreement" between Hamas and Fatah "at the same time that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had decided to try to revive peace talks?" One reason, it says, is that Saudi "wanted to help end the Palestinian-on-Palestinian violence," but "another big reason, analysts said, is that the war in Iraq has intensified the split between Sunnis and Shiites, and deepened a power struggle between the Sunni royal family of Saudi Arabia, and Iran, which is largely Shiite." Although the US is "rooting for the Saudis in that power struggle, the two countries have some distinctly different ideas about how Saudi Arabia should fight for its leadership role in the region."

Congress Places Hold On Palestinian Aid. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Richter, 850K) reports Congress is "holding up $86 million that the Bush administration is seeking to strengthen the security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, in a new setback for the administration's efforts in the region." Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-NY), chairwoman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, has put a hold on the funding, "saying she is not convinced the money will go to train and equip Abbas' security forces, as promised." Other lawmakers, including Democrats and Republicans, "have voiced concern that the money could end up in the hands of Hamas."

NYTimes Calls Jerusalem Meeting A "Charade." In an editorial, the New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) writes, "It speaks volumes when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flies to Jerusalem to try to revive peace talks between Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority and cannot even get the two to show up when she reads out the content-free joint statement to which they have grudgingly agreed." The Times says the talks "reminds us of the six feckless years during which the Bush administration has squandered America's once commanding prestige in the region" and "portrays a secretary of state who clearly arrived with no new ideas -- and no idea of how to wheedle or pressure either side into making any of the compromises needed to stimulate the dangerously moribund peace effort." Rice's "diplomatic default was all the keener since this just might have been a moment for breaking the stalemate that has prevailed since Hamas won control of the Palestinian Parliament last year," the Times adds.

Ignatius Says US-Brokered Deal Will Help America's Image. The Washington Post's (2/21, A15) David Ignatius writes, "We are in the ditch in the Middle East. As bad as you think it is watching TV, it's worse. It's not just Iraq but the whole pattern of America's dealings with the Arab world. People aren't just angry at America – they've been that way to varying degrees since I first came here [Qatar] 27 years ago. What's worse is that they're giving up on us -- on our ability to make good decisions, to solve problems, to play the role of honest broker." To "get back on the road," Ignatius says, the US "must broker a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute." In order to achieve a settlement, he says Secretary Rice must insist that "America is a mediator in this conflict" and "its positions are independent of either side, and it is willing to talk to all parties to achieve peace."

Egypt Urged To Release Imprisoned Bloggers. Raja M. Kamal, an associate dean at the University of Chicago, and Tom G. Palmer, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute, writes in a Washington Post (2/21, A15, 690K) op-ed that "sincere friends of Egypt" should "call on the government to drop the charges" two bloggers critical of the regime, saying "it is the right thing to do, and it is the best thing for Egypt's standing in the modern world." Egypt, they note, is a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which guarantees the "freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media." Therefore, Kamal and Palmer argue, "Blogging should not be a crime."

Polish, Czech Officials Rebuff Moscow's Threats Over US Missile Plan. The New York Times (2/21, A6, Kramer, 1.16M) reports officials in the Czech Republic and Poland "vowed Tuesday that they would not be intimidated by Russia, a day after a general in Moscow declared that nuclear weapons could be aimed at their countries if they allowed the Bush administration to build ballistic missile defenses within their borders." In an interview on Polish radio, Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski dismissed the Russian threats as "clearly an attempt to intimidate." Meanwhile, the Czech foreign minister, Karel Schwarzenberg, said, "The Czechs will now think the shield is even more necessary." The Times says the dispute is "another sign of how quickly relations between Russia and Eastern Europe have been disrupted, descending this week and last into ominous talk of nuclear and military leverage reminiscent of the cold war."

The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Finn, 690K) says the "increasingly angry dispute" is "adding strain to already fragile US-Russian relations." Relations between the US and Russia "had already taken a hit this month when Russian President Vladimir Putin lashed out at Washington for its unilateral approach."

The Financial Times (2/21, Cienski, Anderson) notes that "while the right-of centre governments in Warsaw and Prague are keen to begin negotiations with Washington, opinion polls show opponents of the US bases significantly outnumber supporters." However, "Sweeteners could come in the form of a US decision to waive visas for Poles and Czechs, as well as money to modernise the countries armed forces."

Hadley Departs For Moscow. The AP (2/21) reports President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, is embarking "on a high-level mission to Moscow and other European capitals, just over a week after incendiary remarks about Bush and the United States by Russian President Vladimir Putin." Stephen Hadley departed Tuesday for a four-day trip to Brussels, Moscow and Berlin, according to NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe. In Brussels, Hadley planned to meet with NATO and European Union officials. In Moscow and Berlin, he was scheduled to sit down with his counterparts in the Russian and German governments. Although the trip has been planned for weeks, it "comes at a particularly delicate time in the Washington-Moscow relationship, meaning the Russian portion of his travels would be the most closely watched."

UN Approves Somalia Peacekeeping Force. The New York Times (2/21, A3, 1.16M) reports briefly that the U.N. Security Council Tuesday "authorized the dispatch of an African Union peacekeeping force to Somalia to help stabilize the country so a United Nations operation can take over in six months." The British-drafted resolution "urges African countries to furnish troops" and demands "guarantees of safety and access for international aid workers." Meanwhile, in Mogadishu Tuesday, the Washington Post/AP (2/21, A11) reports mortar rounds and rockets hit "in a series of attacks that killed 15 people and wounded more than 40, doctors and witnesses said." The violence, which targeted the presidential palace and seaport, was "among the worst since a two-week war in December."

In a news analysis, the New York Times (2/21, A3, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Nearly every day, government forces and insurgents shell each other across Mogadishu's already dilapidated neighborhoods, scattering bodies and any remaining traces of hope. Gun prices are soaring and more clans are joining the underground, while an outbreak of cholera sweeps the countryside." Though it "is hard to believe," Somalia is "actually becoming a more violent and chaotic place. That is not how it was supposed to be. Nearly two months ago, an internationally-supported transitional government ousted the Islamist forces and steamed into Mogadishu…with great expectations. But confidence in the government -- never very high -- is rapidly bleeding away." Somalia now "seems to be just shy of total collapse -- again -- because the Ethiopian troops who provided the muscle to throw out the Islamists are withdrawing, yet none of the peacekeepers promised from other African countries have arrived."

EU Ministers Pledge Steep Emissions Cut If US And Others Join Effort. The New York Times (2/21, Kanter, 1.16M) reports, "Seeking to persuade other nations to curb greenhouse gas emissions, European Union ministers pledged Tuesday to raise their own targets if industrialized countries like the United States made similar efforts." EU "governments would be ready to cut emissions 30 percent below 1990 levels by 2020, from a current pledge of 20 percent, but only if other heavy polluters joined in, said Sigmar Gabriel, the German environment minister, who led a meeting in Brussels that formally endorsed the European targets." The "pledges, which match a proposal made by the European Commission last month, are signs that nations are gearing up for new negotiations on a global climate accord after 2012, when the first period covered by the Kyoto Protocol expires. The issue is expected to be on the agenda when Germany serves as host of a meeting in June of the Group of 8 nations." EU "countries are hoping to win pledges from big developing countries as well, including China and India."

The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/21) reports, "European Union environment ministers agreed Tuesday on an ambitious effort to cut greenhouse gas emissions to 20% below 1990 levels, a goal likely to lead to mandatory limits for cars." They "said the target could be pushed to 30% if other industrialized countries sign on to a global effort." The "target, which must be approved at an EU summit next month to become official, is a crucial first step in a global warming strategy that must be in place by the time the Kyoto Protocol expires in 2012." President Bush has kept the US "out of the Kyoto treaty, saying it would harm the U.S. economy. The Bush administration has said it is committed instead to advancing and investing in new technologies to combat global warming."

Experts Cast Doubt On Carbon Capture Technology. The New York Times (2/21, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "Within the next few years, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants to meet growing electricity demands. Despite expectations that global warming rules are coming, almost none of the plants will be built to capture" carbon dioxide. The Times adds, "Environmentalists are worried, but they put their faith in a technology that gasifies the coal before burning. Such plants are designed, they say, to be more adaptable to separating the carbon and storing it underground. Most utility officials counter that the gasification approach is more expensive and less reliable, but they say there is no need to worry because their tried-and-true method, known as pulverized coal, can also be equipped later with hardware to capture the global warming gas." However, "influential technical experts are casting doubts on both approaches." A major new study "concludes in a draft version that it is not clear which technology -- the so-called integrated gasification combined cycle or pulverized coal — will allow for the easiest carbon capture, because so much engineering work remains to be done."

UK Climate Change Study Said To Be "Right For The Wrong Reasons." New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) columnist David Leonhardt writes, "Last week, Sir Nicholas Stern, a top adviser to the British government, came to the United States to talk about climate change. In October, a commission he led released a 700-page report calling for 'urgent action' against global warming to prevent economic damage that could rival that of the world wars and the Great Depression." In "the minds of a lot of American economists, however, the review is a badly flawed piece of work." Critics' "main objection revolved around something called the discount rate. The Stern Review assumed that a dollar of economic damage prevented a century from now (adjusted for inflation) is roughly as valuable as a dollar spent reducing emissions today." "Technically," Leonhardt writes, "Sir Nicholas's opponents win the debate. But in practical terms, their argument has a weak link. They are assuming that the economic gains from, say, education will make future generations rich enough to make up for any damage caused by climate change." But "[n]o one knows whether this is true, let alone desirable, because no one knows what life will be like on a planet that is five degrees hotter." Focusing attention on "the catastrophic risks of climate change...is Sir Nicholas's biggest accomplishment, whatever you think of his math." As one critic "puts it, the Stern Review is 'right for the wrong reasons.'"

Global Warming Already "Bringing Misery" To Bangladeshi Village. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Chu, 850K) reports from a village in Bangladesh, "Global warming has a taste in this village. It is the taste of salt." Warmer "weather and rising oceans are sending seawater surging up Bangladesh's rivers in greater volume and frequency than ever before, experts say, overflowing and seeping into the soil and water supply of thousands of people. Their lives are being squeezed by distant lands they have seen only on television — America, China and Russia at the top of the list — whose carbon emissions are pushing temperatures and sea levels upward." The Times adds, "Earlier this month, a long-awaited report by the United Nations said global warming fueled by human activity could lift temperatures by 8 degrees and the ocean's surface by 23 inches by 2100. Here in southwestern Bangladesh, the bleak future forecast by the report is already becoming reality, bringing misery along with it."

Campaign Urges End To Slavery. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Lampman, 59K) reports on the "The Amazing Change" campaign which "encourages people to sign a petition to end modern-day slavery, donate to the cause, and learn how they can take an active part in the movement." While slavery "takes different forms today, the impact remains devastating to lives around the globe," according to UN and US government statistics. The Monitor notes that "an estimated 300,000 children have been forced to serve as child soldiers in more than 30 conflicts. Each year, human trafficking for sexual servitude or forced labor moves 800,000 people across international borders, including some 17,500 foreigners trafficked into the United States. Some 200,000 people are considered to live enslaved in the US."

Kidnappings Paralyze Haitian Capitol. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Roig-Franzia, 690K) reports, "Despite the presence of thousands of U.N. troops and a new military offensive to root out gangs, armed thugs still rule much" of Port-Au-Prince, Haiti, where "a swarm of recent kidnappings is terrorizing residents and scaring away foreign investment." Haiti's government has been "powerless to stop the crisis," and international advisers "describe the police force and judicial system as critically dysfunctional and profoundly corrupt." The U.N., "which is engaged in background checks of police that officials believe could lead to the dismissal of 1,000 corrupt officers, is now overseeing the largest military operation to defeat gangs since being deployed here in 2004," and U.N. officials "hope to stem the flow of kidnap ransoms to gangs."

Weed's Biodiesel Potential Kindles Hope In Africa. The Washington Times (2/21, Palmer, 88K) reports, "Jatropha, a scruffy bush producing dry, black nuts, is triggering a scramble for land in Africa, with Norwegian, Indian and British companies looking to producing clean-burning biodiesel for cars and trucks." The Times adds, "Long used as nothing more than living fences meant to hold back the encroaching Sahara and Kalahari deserts, jatropha oil, the evidence shows, burns cleaner than fossil fuels. That, in turn, has experimental plantations popping up in Africa from Kenya to Ghana to South Africa." With "the growing attention of major oil distributors, jatropha is the little plant that could lift African farmers from lives of poverty and the continent into a fuel oil producer. ... It could, however, go the way of the emu farm: just another expensive farming fad that went bust instead of boom."

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Win For Bush, Federal Court Upholds Law On Gitmo Detainees. The AP (2/21, Yen) reports this morning, "In a victory for President Bush, a divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Guantanamo Bay detainees cannot use the US court system to challenge their indefinite imprisonment. A Supreme Court appeal was promised." The 2-1 decision by the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit "dismisses hundreds of cases filed by foreign-born detainees in federal court and also threatens to strip away court access to millions of lawful permanent residents currently in the United States." The AP adds, "The two judges voting with the White House -- Judge A. Raymond Randolph and Judge David B. Sentelle -- were appointed by Republicans. President Reagan appointed Sentelle, and President George H.W. Bush appointed Randolph. The dissenter, Judge Judith W. Rogers, was appointed by President Clinton, a Democrat." White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino "called the decision 'a significant win' for the administration and said the Military Commissions Act provides 'sufficient and fair access to courts for these detainees.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A5, Bravin, 2.04M) reports that "in dissent, Judge Judith Rogers wrote that…Congress…had exceeded its authority. The Constitution provides that 'the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.'"

Like the AP, most media outlets describe the court's decision as a big win for Bush, although the ruling is generally being cast in a decidedly mixed light. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Havermann, 850K) says it was "a victory for…Bush in his global war on terrorism," and NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 3, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) spoke of "a victory for the Bush Administration and what it calls the war on terrorism." NBC (Pete Williams) added the ruling "says that nearly 400 detainees held at Gitmo, most of them for more than five years now, have no legal rights to plead for their freedom in federal courts in the US and only a few of them have any hope even of a hearing before a US military commission under new rules approved by Congress last year. Lawyers for the detainees say they now have nowhere to go, to claim that they were wrongly picked up in the first place." Also, "Democrats who now control Congress say they'll try to restore the authority to hear detainee appeals. And some Republicans say they'd favor that." GOP Sen. Arlen Specter was shown saying, "If Congress were to act, we could clear it up faster than the several years it will take for the Supreme Court to act on it."

ABC World News (2/20, story 3, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) said it was "a major victory for…Bush," while Fox News' Special Report (2/20, lead story, Hume) opened its broadcast last night noting that civil liberties groups "denounced the ruling, calling it a shameful example of the Bush Administration's 'anything goes' approach to the war on terror."

The Washington Times (2/21, Seper, 88K) calls the ruling a "key victory for the White House," but the Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Richey, Feldmann, 59K) says "most analysts emphasized the interim nature of the ruling. They view the 25-page panel opinion and 34-page dissent as a prelude to a major constitutional showdown at the nation's highest court."

The Financial Times (2/21, Sevastopulo) refers to a "significant legal victory" for the White House, and notes "Patrick Leahy and…Specter, the top Democrat and Republican lawmakers on the Senate judiciary committee, have introduced legislation that would restore the right of habeas to detainees at Guantanamo. … Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican senator who was instrumental in the move to strip habeas rights, yesterday welcomed the decision, which he said would prevent 'frivolous' lawsuits."

The New York Times (2/21, Labaton, 1.16M) quotes Leahy saying, "The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness." Shayana Kadidal, "a lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, said, 'This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore.'" Kadidal "said the ruling encouraged 'a contempt for international human rights law' and 'such notorious practices as extraordinary rendition': sending terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation, where, rights advocates say, they may face torture."

USA Today (2/21, 3A, Parker, 2.27M) reports Rep. Ike Skelton, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, had "announced a new review of detainees' legal protections." Pentagon spokesman Jeffrey Gordon "said the detainees at Guantanamo include some of the world's 'most vicious terrorist operatives.' He said none of Guantanamo's many critics 'have put forth a viable option to handle these dangerous men and prevent their return to terrorism.'"

The Washington Post (2/21, A1, White, 690K) reports, "Justice Department lawyers have argued for years that foreign detainees should not enjoy constitutional rights when they are detained in other countries amid accusations of terrorism against the United States and its allies. 'We are pleased with the decision of the US Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upholding the constitutionality of the Military Commissions Act (MCA) and dismissing the consolidated Guantanamo detainee cases for lack of jurisdiction,' Erik Ablin, a department spokesman, said in a statement."

The Legal Times (2/21, Goldman) reports, "The 2-1 decision was sharply critical of the plaintiffs, who had argued that the language of the act forbidding U.S. courts to hear challenges to the detention of aliens detained as enemy combatants was ambiguous and did not necessarily apply to detainees whose cases were already pending in court. … 'The arguments are creative but not cogent,' wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph. 'Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan,' wrote Randolph, referring to the 2006 decision, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which ruled that the military commissions set up by the Bush administration to try military detainees violate both international and U.S. military law. … 'To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress,' Randolph added, later calling the plaintiffs' argument 'nonsense.' … Randolph was joined in his decision by Judge David Sentelle." The Times notes, "After dispensing with the detainees' argument that the law was ambiguous, the court went on to assert the act's constitutionality. The Constitution's suspension clause, which says that the writ of habeas corpus can only be suspended for reasons of public safety during 'rebellion or invasion,' does not apply to areas outside U.S. sovereignty. And it is Cuba, the court asserted, not the United States, that has sovereignty over Guantanamo Bay. … In her dissent, Judge Judith Rogers strongly disagreed, writing that the majority opinion 'fundamentally misconstrues' the nature of the suspension clause. 'Far from conferring an individual right that might pertain only to persons substantially connected to the United States,' she wrote, 'the Suspension Clause is a limitation on the powers of Congress.'"

National Public Radio (2/21, Shapiro) reports, "The ruling is a clear blow to the Guantanamo detainees. Bill Goodman is legal director at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents a number of them. … 'Many of these people have done nothing,' Goodman says. 'They're there by accident and happenstance.' He added that not being able to 'raise the basic defense that "I've done nothing wrong" means that this is a huge trampling of rights.'" NPR adds, "This decision wipes out cases that challenged everything from lack of medical treatment at the facility to abusive interrogation tactics. David Rivkin worked in the Justice Department under President Reagan and the first President Bush. He says enemy combatants were never intended to get the same court access as criminal suspects. … 'There's been more judicial involvement in these types of decisions than in any war in American history,' Rivkin says. 'And for the critics it's still not enough.'" NPR notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos noted in a statement that the Military Commissions Act, or MCA, does give detainees some legal review. … 'The decision reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the MCA,' Scolinos said, 'permitting Guantanamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit.'"

LATimes Urges Congress To Change Military Commissions Act. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, 850K) editorializes that "a federal appeals court has presented the Democratic-controlled 110th Congress with a challenge. Does it have the fortitude to undo an injustice perpetrated by the Republican-controlled 109th? The injustice came in the 2006 Military Commissions Act, which barred detainees at Guantanamo -- now numbering 395 -- from contesting their imprisonment by seeking writs of habeas corpus. This exclusion, like Guantanamo itself, has been an embarrassment to the United States." The Times adds, "There's a good reason to suspect that the Supreme Court might actually affirm this disappointing decision: It's not the same court that ruled for the detainees in 2004. … Rather than hope that the Supreme Court will rectify the act's flaws, Congress should act on its own to undo the law's habeas restrictions. Last year, 48 members of the Republican-controlled Senate voted for an amendment by…Specter that would have allowed detainees to file such petitions. Of the 51 who voted no, six are no longer in the Senate."

Audit Finds Inaccuracies In DOJ Anti-Terror Statistics. The AP (2/21, Jordan) reports, "Federal prosecutors counted immigration violations, marriage fraud and drug trafficking among anti-terror cases in the four years after 9/11 even though no evidence linked them to terror activity, a Justice Department audit said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Overall, nearly all of the terrorism-related statistics on investigations, referrals and cases examined by department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine were either diminished or inflated. Only two of 26 sets of department data reported between 2001 and 2005 were accurate, the audit found. … Responding, a Justice spokesman pointed to figures showing that prosecutors in the department's headquarters for the most part either accurately or underreported their data — underscoring what he called efforts to avoid pumping up federal terror statistics." The AP adds, "The numbers, used to monitor the department's progress in battling terrorists, are reported to Congress and the public and help, in part, shape the department's budget. … 'For these and other reasons, it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics,' the audit concluded." The AP notes, "Fine's office took care to say the flawed data appear to be the result of 'decentralized and haphazard' methods of collection or disagreement over how the numbers are reported, and do not appear to be intentional. … Still, the errors led Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., to question whether the department had exaggerated the number of terror cases. … 'If the Department of Justice can't even get their own books in order, how are we supposed to have any confidence they are doing the job they should be?' said Schumer, who sits on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees the department. 'Whether this is just an accounting error or an attempt to pad terror prosecution statistics for some other reason, the Department of Justice of all places should be classifying cases for what they are, not what they want us to think them to be.'"

The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Zajac) reports, "Although the Justice Department and the FBI have reorganized since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to make preventing future attacks a priority, Fine found that the agencies have done a poor job of providing statistical documentation for the work they are doing. … His report reviewed 26 categories of statistics and found inaccuracies, because of either inflated numbers or undercounting, in 24 of them." The Tribune adds, "Fine did not allege a deliberate attempt to mislead. He said information was 'inaccurately reported for a variety of reasons, including that [Justice] Department components could not provide support for the numbers reported, could not provide support for a terrorism link used to classify statistics as terrorism-related, and could not document that the activity reported occurred in the period reported.'" The Tribune adds, "Dean Boyd, a spokesman for the FBI and the Justice Department, which oversees U.S. attorneys, said both agencies were under stress from having to quickly ramp up an anti-terrorism capability after the 2001 attacks and have subsequently upgraded their tracking and labeling of cases to comport with many of Fine's recommendations for improvement. … Fine also found that unlike the FBI and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, which coordinates the activities of 93 federal prosecutors in the U.S. and overseas territories, the Justice Department's Criminal Division consistently reported lower numbers of terrorism cases than it actually handled. … For instance, the criminal division recorded 195 guilty pleas or convictions in terrorism cases from Sept. 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, but Fine said there actually were 216." The Tribune notes, "Boyd said Fine's report should not be read as undercutting the Justice Department's credibility because Criminal Division figures are the ones 'used by DOJ in publicly quantifying their work.' … But Fine cautioned against taking too much comfort in the Criminal Division's understatement of its anti-terrorism work because the record-keeping behind it was so weak that there 'was no accurate basis for its reported numbers.' … The report is the latest in a string of analyses to question the accuracy of the Justice Department's terrorism data."

The Washington Post (2/21, A8, Eggen, 690K) notes, "The analysis is the latest to find serious faults with the Justice Department's terrorism statistics, some of which have been featured prominently in statements by President Bush or the attorney general as evidence of the terrorist threat and the department's successful efforts to combat it." The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Zajac, 617K) reports, "Boyd said Fine's report should not be read as undercutting the Justice Department's credibility because Criminal Division figures are the ones 'used by DOJ in publicly quantifying their work.' But Fine cautioned against taking too much comfort in the Criminal Division's understatement of its anti-terrorism work because the record-keeping behind it was so weak that there 'was no accurate basis for its reported numbers.'"

The Washington Times (2/21, Seper) reports, "Mr. Fine's office focused on terrorism convictions during fiscal 2003 and 2004 reported by EOUSA; the number of persons convicted or who pleaded guilty resulting from terrorism convictions from September 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, reported by the Criminal Division; and the number of terrorist threats tracked by the FBI in fiscal 2003 and 2004. … 'The Justice Department agrees fully with the Office of the Inspector General that the department must collect, verify and maintain accurate statistics on the important national security work being conducted at Main Justice, the FBI and in United States Attorney's Offices around the country,' according to the FBI. … The FBI said it has made improvements to its statistical reporting systems in recent years, specifically its case management and supporting information technology programs." The Times adds, "Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the EOUSA has changed the way it counts and classifies anti-terrorism cases, and that the IG's findings, with respect to U.S. attorneys' statistics, 'largely boiled down to a difference of opinion over the definition of anti-terrorism.' … He also said criminal division prosecutors and the FBI also have changed their case reporting systems to more accurately reflect terror-related cases." McClatchy Newspapers (2/21) also reports on the audit.

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/10) opened its broadcast with "a report on troubling new concerns tonight about bureaucratic blunders and outright competence in the war against radical Islamist terrorism. Government auditors today blasted both the FBI and the Justice Department for using inaccurate statistics to claim successes in the war on terror. … Bottom line – the Inspector general says that for the most part the Justice Department was just flat out wrong. … One lawmaker says it's high time the Justice Department came forward with 'solid numbers instead of sugar-coated stories.'"

Federal Judge Rejects Delay In Phone Wiretap Suits. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/21, B-10, Egelko) reports, "A federal judge rejected the Bush administration's request Tuesday to put wiretapping lawsuits against telephone companies on hold while the government asks an appeals court to dismiss the suits on national security grounds." The Chronicle continues, "The ruling came from Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker of San Francisco, who is hearing more than 40 suits from around the nation accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the government's electronic surveillance program. … Walker refused in July to dismiss the leading case, a suit accusing AT&T of sharing its telephone records and e-mail network with the National Security Agency. Walker rejected Bush administration arguments that allowing the case to proceed would expose vital secrets about the clandestine program and the company's alleged role in it." The Chronicle adds, "The Justice Department has asked the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the ruling and dismiss all the lawsuits. While that appeal is pending, government lawyers argued, any further action in Walker's court would waste time and money and increase the risk of a security breach. … But Walker ordered the companies Tuesday to respond to the suits by March 29 unless plaintiffs in particular cases agreed to a delay. … The judge also said lawyers for AT&T customers could ask him for permission to question company officials and to seek evidence on limited issues. Attorney Kurt Opsahl of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which represents the plaintiffs, said those topics could include the company's structure and operation of its networks." The Chronicle notes, "Opsahl said plaintiffs' lawyers may also ask AT&T to present to Walker, in private, any evidence of government authorization that exists for its actions -- a subject that Justice Department lawyers have described as among the most sensitive in the case. Such secret submission of evidence, a procedure spelled out by federal law, would allow the judge to determine whether any surveillance in which the company participated was legal, Opsahl said. … Walker 'is trying to advance the case while being very sensitive to national security concerns,' Opsahl said."

FBI Translating Record Number Of Intercepts, Nearly Eliminating Backlog. US News & World Report (2/20, Kaplan) reported on its Web site, "Spurred by adding hundreds of new linguists and help from allies overseas, the FBI is translating a record 34,000 wiretapped conversations a month, bureau officials tell the Bad Guys blog. Long criticized for its lack of language specialists, the FBI, they say, is finally catching up to an unprecedented intake of foreign-language surveillance recordings, electronic data, and text since 9/11. Most of the wiretaps are tied to counterterrorism and counterintelligence cases, officials say. Since 9/11, the FBI's counterterrorism agents, in particular, have collected a mother lode of intelligence. … 'We've made great strides,' says Jeff Lanza, an FBI spokesman. 'Ninety-nine percent of the backlog has been eliminated.' Nearly a third of what remains is 'white noise' not expected to yield anything of value, officials say." US News noted, "The FBI has eased its backlog by markedly increasing its reservoir of translators. … The FBI has also turned to 'the language programs of allied intelligence agencies,' as well as to contract linguists, according to testimony by FBI Director Robert Mueller."

Bail Hearing Held For American Accused Of Joining Al Qaeda Group. The New York Times (2/21, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "A thin and weakened 28-year-old American who the government says was captured last month in Kenya after joining Islamic terrorists fighting in Somalia appeared on Tuesday in federal court here to face charges of conspiring to use an unconventional weapon and receiving military training from Al Qaeda." Daniel J. Maldonado "stayed impassive as F.B.I. witnesses and prosecutors said he had admitted to having guarded a suspected spy who was later killed, to praising the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and to offering himself as a suicide bomber." However, public defender Brent E. Newton's "cross-examination suggested that he intended to make an issue of Mr. Maldonado's treatment in custody and whether his client had properly waived his rights to a lawyer before F.B.I. agents questioned him."

The Houston Chronicle (2/21, George, 530K) reports, "A federal judge cut short a hearing for accused terrorist Daniel Joseph Maldonado late Tuesday to give his lawyers time to review reports about FBI interviews with their client. … The hearing, which will determine whether the government's case will continue, is to resume at 10 a.m. today." The Chronicle notes, "In Kenya, two senior FBI officials questioned Maldonado, who gave conflicting information during later interviews with another FBI agent and a Houston police officer. … Newton argued that even if Maldonado went overseas to fight jihad, there is no evidence that he intended to affiliate with al-Qaida." The AP (2/21) adds, "Newton asked McKinley if Maldonado, while 'interrogated' by FBI agents six times after his capture during a period of a week and a half was denied an attorney even though he had asked for one and was deprived of sleep. McKinley said Maldonado agreed to talk with agents while being 'questioned' and was treated well after his capture."

KPRC-TV Houston (2/20) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "it was revealed that Maldonado was approached to return to America and recruit English-speaking women to receive training in Somalia, a notion that alarmed local Islamic leaders. … It was also detailed in court how Maldonado allegedly took part in the beating and interrogation of a flight attendant who he accused of being a spy after the flight attendant took cell phone pictures of high-ranking al-Qaida members on a flight. The FBI agent said the flight attendant was eventually killed."

Alleged Terror Fundraiser Contributed $15,000 To NRCC. The AP (2/21, Sidoti) reports, "A New York man accused of trying to help terrorists in Afghanistan has donated some $15,000 to the House Republicans' campaign committee over three years. Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari pleaded not guilty Friday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to charges that include terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering. From April 2002 until August 2004, the man also known as 'Michael Mixon' gave donations ranging from $500 to $5,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee," and NRCC spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger "said if Alishtari is found guilty, the organization would donate the money to charity."

The Hill (2/21, Blake) adds, "Democrats are asking how much access Alishtari had with Republicans and whether the NRCC would return the money. 'We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges, but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward,'…Boulanger said."

Administration Said To Ignore Terror Fundraising. In a Washington Times (2/21, 88K) op-ed, American Center for Democracy director Rachel Ehrenfeld writes, "Six years after al Qaeda attacked the United States, many policy-makers and 'terrorism experts' retain the misconception that terrorism does not require large amounts of money." Ehrenfeld criticizes the Center for American Progress Terrorism Index, saying that it does not include Saudi support for spreading Wahhabism, Iranian support of Hezbollah, Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, as well as terror funds raised through the illegal drug trade. Ehrenfeld adds, "It boggles the mind that the Bush administration continues to ignore terrorism's need for, and access to, a strong, international funding base, with large pockets even in the United States. More disturbing is the administration's unwillingness to identify the funding sources. … This willful blindness continues to undermine U.S. credibility with its allies and foes, and therefore its ability to curtail the money flow."

Muslim Groups Join Fast For Al-Arian. The Washington Times (2/21, Hudson) reports, "A coalition of Muslim groups is calling for a worldwide fast in support of Sami Al-Arian, a former college professor convicted of raising funds for a terrorist group who remains in jail on contempt charges for refusing to testify before a Virginia grand jury investigating other financiers of terrorism." The Times continues, "The American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections on Monday asked Muslims to fast every Monday, Wednesday and Friday along with Al-Arian, who has been on a hunger strike since Jan. 21." The Times adds, "Task force spokesman Agha Saeed says the response has been 'compassionate, caring, supportive and concern about Professor Al-Arian's health.' … The former University of South Florida computer-science professor was arrested in 2003 and pleaded guilty last year to assisting the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group. He was sentenced to time served and given an additional 18 months for refusing to testify against the International Institute of Islamic Thought (IIIT) and its role with the terrorist group. … The task force calls the additional sentence 'a form of harassment,' and along with Amnesty International, is demanding his release. The task force is made up of larger Muslim groups, including the American Muslim Alliance, Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), the Islamic Circle of North America and United Muslims of America."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales To Tour Supermax Prison In Colorado. The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/21, Roper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will visit the federal Supermax prison complex at Florence on Wednesday, four months after a federal inspection report cited a staff shortage as the reason for security and supervision problems there." The Chieftain continues, "Gonzales will tour the prison complex with Colorado Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, who urged him to visit the nation's highest security federal prison after a Justice Department inspector general's report found a list of security problems. The most glaring was that the mail and telephone calls for convicted terrorists being held at the prison were not always being monitored. … Allard, a Republican, and Salazar, a Democrat, both met with Gonzales earlier this year and were told that Bureau of Prisons officials had added staff to Supermax, which holds 400 of the most dangerous prisoners in the federal prison system, such as Ramzi Yousef, who led the first bomb attack on the World Trade Center." The Chieftain notes, "Supermax officially is known as the U.S. Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum (ADX). According to a CNN broadcast last November, the inspector general's investigation was begun when Spanish police found letters from a Supermax inmate, Mohammed Salameh, were sent to a terror cell with links to the train bombings in Madrid. … The Justice Department report found that staffing at the prison had become so short that there were times when inmate mail and telephone calls were unmonitored. Also, there were times when there were no guards available to be in some cellblocks for an entire shift - although the cellblock was still staffed at the perimeter."

The Canon City (CO) Daily Record (2/21, Vela) reports, "Correctional officer safety and terrorism concerns have worried those who have been vocal in the issue of security at Fremont County's federal institutions. A report released in October of last year by the Department of Justice's inspector general indicates that mail and phone calls received from convicted terrorists at ADX have not been totally checked by BOP staff. Also, the inspector general reported that not enough staff was sufficiently capable of monitoring phone calls in foreign languages. … These concerns could because of an overall lack of staff at the prison. In November, the Bureau of Prisons — the governing body of a federal institutions — increased staff at Supermax, but the number of those staffed still lagged behind the number the prison opened with in 1994; that number was 240 correctional officers, today it is 220. … But the staffing concerns do not stop at Supermax. Earlier this year, a riot situation was narrowly averted at the United States Penitentiary in Florence. Correctional officers from ADX and the Florence Correctional Institution came to the aid of staff at USP where seven officers were injured breaking-up fighting inmates."

KCNC-TV, Denver, CO (2/20, 10:14 p.m.) broadcasted, "US General Alberto Gonzales will be touring the Super Max in Colorado as "part of the effort to tackle human rights there." The Super Max "holds some of the most high-profile criminals and terrorists in the country." Sen. Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard and Congressman Doug Lamborn will also be on that tour. KJCT-TV, Grand Junction, Durango, Montrose, CO (2/20, 10:06 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

McConnell Sworn In As New Intelligence Director. USA Today (2/21, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush installed retired vice admiral Michael McConnell as the nation's second national intelligence director and said his challenge is to improve the quality of spy data and analysis in wartime." Bush "said the intelligence community needs significant improvements more than five years after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. He instructed McConnell to focus on finding more recruits with the language skills and cultural background to collect information on terrorist groups."

The Washington Post (2/21, A8, Pincus, 690K) notes Bush "paid tribute to McConnell's predecessor, Ambassador John D. Negroponte, who has moved back to the State Department as deputy secretary, saying he served with 'talent and distinction.' Nevertheless, Bush said that many elements of improving the intelligence community remain, including information sharing and the hiring of employees with the right language and cultural skills." McConnell "repeated yesterday a plan he disclosed to Congress at his confirmation hearing: that he will change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first- and second-generation Arabic-speaking Americans for very sensitive jobs."

Hawley Expects Full Implementation Of Secure Flight To Come In 2010. The New York Times (2/21, Lipton, 1.16M) reports TSA Administrator Kip Hawley "acknowledged" in an interview Tuesday that the federal government would not be ready to takeover "checking passenger names against terrorist watch lists, a top priority for aviation officials since the 2001 terrorist attacks, …until 2010, more than five years behind schedule." It "is the latest setback" in the "long-promised" Secure Flight program, "intended to enhance aviation safety, while reducing the number of passengers mistakenly identified as possible terrorists." Hawley said improvements to the program "will cost some $80 million" over the next year and a half and that the "enhanced system…will then require more than a year of testing, resulting in the estimate that it will be in full use sometime in 2010. Officials would not release an estimate of how much they expected to spend before the system was complete."

Survey Finds Park Police Doubt Agency Ready For Terror Attack. The Washington Times (2/21, Seper, Cella, 88K) reports, "A survey of US Park Police officers shows 97 percent of those who responded lack confidence in Chief Dwight E. Pettiford and 98 percent do not think the agency is as prepared as others to respond to a terrorist attack." The results of the survey, which also "found that 98 percent think the agency's command staff was not doing its best to protect the public" and that "94 percent said inadequate staffing makes their work sites unsafe," were described as "extremely disappointing" by James Austin of the Fraternal Order of Police, which conducted the survey. "Much of the criticism about Chief Pettiford, who was promoted to the job from a deputy position in March 2005, is that he has not pushed hard enough for funding increases. … Several field officers and supervisors, who asked not to be identified for fear of losing their jobs, say the situation is hurting the agency's ability to accomplish its mission and is understaffed by at least 20 percent."

Nichols Claims McVeigh Said FBI Orchestrated OKC Bombing. The Deseret Morning News (2/21, Fattah) reports, "The only surviving convicted criminal in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City is saying his co-conspirator, Timothy McVeigh, told him he was taking orders from a top FBI official in orchestrating the bombing. … However, one congressman who has investigated the bombings remains skeptical of Nichols' claims." Nichols' "declaration was filed as part of Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue's pending wrongful death suit against the government for the death of his brother in a federal corrections facility in Oklahoma City." The Morning News notes Nichols claims "McVeigh let slip during a bout of anger that he was taking instruction from former FBI official Larry Potts," who "retired from the FBI under intense pressure and criticism for the cover-up of an order to allow agents to shoot anyone seen leaving the Weaver cabin at Ruby Ridge. When contacted, the FBI's main office in Washington, D.C., said it could not provide immediate comment on Nichols' claims Tuesday.

FBI, DHS Launch Another Fingerprint Data-Sharing Pilot Program. Government Computer News (2/20, Dizard) reported, "The government's massive, technologically ambitious project to achieve connectivity between two critical biometric databases took a step forward as the Homeland Security Department and the FBI unveiled an additional pilot project." GCN noted, "The technological core of the data-sharing project involves modifications to the fingerprint comparison engines of the databases, among other changes. The bureau and the department already exchange data about each other's 'worst of the worst' criminal suspects, fugitives and immigration law violators. … The new pilot, which started operation on Feb. 1, will allow the sheriff's office in Harris County, Texas, to tap into additional IDENT records. In a joint press statement, the bureau and the department said that the Harris County Sheriff's Office already had 'booked a person for assault causing bodily injury to a family member and submitted the fingerprints for a background check.'"

Spitzer Supports Freedom Tower Construction, Open To Private Ownership. The New York Times (2/21, Confessore) reports on a downtown news conference of NJ Gov. Jon Corzine, Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Gov. Spitzer, who officially "changed his mind" about Freedom Tower construction, an issue he once referred to as "a white elephant." Amid criticism of the tower's "size, expense and design, as well as its failure to interest non-government tenants," Spitzer said he supported the construction of the tower, but the remarks were made "with no great enthusiasm," according to the Times. Spitzer said of his support, "This should not be interpreted to mean that this is the project I would have designed at its initiation. But where we are today, this is clearly the best and the wisest alternative." The paper adds, "Like Mr. Spitzer, Mr. Corzine and Mr. Bloomberg appeared more relieved than elated, a sign of how tumultuous the rebuilding effort has been since the Sept. 11 attacks." Spitzer also "seemed to wade" into the WTC memorial controversy by saying there was "room for discussion" when it comes to ordering the victims' names. Spitzer also promised not to hold a press conference "every time a brick is added to the foundation or a column goes up," which was an "apparent swipe" at former Gov. Pataki's public relations approach to ground zero. Pataki spokesman David Catalfamo responded, "I'm not sure if it was one too many or one too few press conferences. What I do know is that today's announcement is a reaffirmation of the vision advanced by Governor Pataki and a sign that the progress at the site will continue unabated." The AP (2/20, Westfeldt) notes that both Govs. Corzine and Spitzer support Freedom Tower construction and a proposal to sell the skyscraper to a private company. Corzine called this proposal "good public policy," but Spitzer said, "We will entertain these options if and when they arise." Like the Times, the AP notes that Spitzer changed his mind because of "a booming commercial real estate market and the need to move forward with long-delayed rebuilding." Focusing solely on the WTC Memorial, the AP (2/20) reports, "Bloomberg has said several times that his decision on how to arrange names of the dead around the Sept. 11 memorial is final. But Gov. Eliot Spitzer on Tuesday said that there was still time to talk about it."

Local Television. Teasing its lead story, NBC-TV New York (2/20, 6:00 p.m.) says Gov. Spitzer is "no longer likening the Freedom Tower to a white elephant," adding that he has "made no secret of the fact that he is not a fan." Yesterday however, Spitzer announced "he wouldn't place any roadblocks in the Freedom Tower's way," so the current design "is here to stay." Bloomberg said of Govs. Spitzer and Corzine's support, "This should put to rest any doubt about the Freedom Tower." Spitzer also said that he does not oppose, on a philosophical level, selling the Freedom Tower to a private entity that would have the responsibility of building, leasing and owning the tower. Similar reports were featured prominently in the front of several broadcasts, including WNYT-TV Albany (11:06 p.m.), RNEWS Rochester (8:01 p.m.), WCBS-TV New York (6:03 p.m.), WNYW-TV New York (6:09 p.m.), WBNG-TV Binghamton (5:33 p.m.) and WABC-TV New York (12:04 p.m.).

Enrollment Doubles For Bellevue's WTC Treatment Program. After the city gave Bellevue Hospital Center millions to treat sick people excluded from other 9/11 treatment programs, the New York Times (2/21, Depalma) says "the number of people being treated at the W.T.C. Environmental Health Center at Bellevue Hospital has doubled to more than 900. Several hundred more people are on a waiting list, including many low-income residents of Chinatown and the Lower East Side, and immigrant workers without health insurance. … Dr. Joan Reibman, a pulmonologist who directs the center, said that most of her patients had not been exposed to the dust as intensively as firefighters and workers who toiled on the debris pile, but that they might have been affected by the contaminated air nonetheless."

WSJournal Critical Of Attempt To Give Bargaining Rights To TSA Workers. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) editorializes, "Democrats figure they owe Big Labor for helping them take Congress, and now comes the payback. Tucked away in House and Senate bills that purport to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission is a provision that the Commission most assuredly did not recommend: collective bargaining rights for the Transportation Safety Administration's 43,000 airport screeners." Democrats "are betting the White House won't have the nerve to veto an otherwise popular, if ill-understood, bill over this single provision. Our guess is that if Mr. Bush did veto such a bill, he'd find public sympathy for an argument that he was protecting a vital national security function from being corrupted by union politics."

Louisiana Levee Plans Said to Leave Rural Towns With Pre-Katrina Protection. USA Today (2/21, A1, Heath, 2.27M) reports on its front page that current state and federal plans for Louisiana's levees "would sacrifice dozens of coastal communities, some with thousands of residents, to the next Katrina-sized hurricane. The reason: Protecting them would cost too much." And though Randy Hanchey of the Louisiana's Department of Natural Resources said officials "believe that it's probably not possible to provide adequate protection that people should be living down there," the state has yet to encourage "residents to move from those areas. … Most of the places that would be outside the new barriers are rural towns slung along the few remaining patches of high ground near the receding coast. A draft of the state's plan released this month shows new levees would exclude areas that were home to more than 20,000 people before hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit."

WAR NEWS:

Reid Says Senate Will Seek Modification Of War Authorization. The AP (2/21, Riley) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "said Senate Democrats may move ahead on Monday with an effort to limit the 2002 measure authorizing Bush's use of force in Iraq. That move is planned despite a warning from Senate Republicans that it's certain to be vetoed and the veto would be upheld." Reid "repeated his statement that Iraq 'is the worst foreign policy blunder in the history of our country.' He said the war can't be won militarily, and what's needed is a political and regional solution that involves those with 'a larger stake in the neighborhood,' including Iran."

Democratic Candidates Stake Out Nuanced Positions On Iraq War Authorization. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Barabak, 850K) reports Democratic presidential candidates "may be united in opposing the war in Iraq, but "that hasn't stopped them from fighting over the conflict. It is a skirmish over judgment, character and political mettle. Sen. Barack Obama "stresses his opposition to the invasion from the start and says those who voted to authorize the war, only to come around later, are at least partly to blame for today's problems. It shows, Obama says, the decision-making capacity each candidate would bring to the White House." Former Sen. John Edwards, "who has apologized for his initial war vote, suggests Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has been too measured in her opposition. Implicit is the notion that a calculating front-runner has shaped her views more out of political consideration than principle." Clinton "has sharpened her tone and stepped up her antiwar rhetoric, but has not apologized for her initial stance on the war."

Sestak Seeks Withdrawal Of US Forces In Iraq By The End Of The Year. McClatchy (2/21, Schoof) reports Rep. Joe Sestak, who "commanded a carrier battle group in combat near Afghanistan, then in the Persian Gulf in the run-up to the Iraq war," has "introduced a bill calling for withdrawing all American forces from Iraq by the end of this year, while strengthening the U.S. military presence in the region and in Afghanistan." Sestak's bill "would cut off most money for military operations in Iraq by Dec. 31. … The main reason, he said, is that the war in Iraq is hurting American national security: It's diverted resources and attention from the fight against terrorism in Afghanistan and from other challenges to U.S. interests around the world." McClatchy notes Sestak "rejects the worst-case scenario arguments that Iraq will descend into genocide and a regional war if the United States leaves. … Iraqi sectarian leaders would realize that without the American military holding down the violence, 'they would have to accept the consequences that if they go too far, the retaliation against them might go too far.'"

Bush Reportedly Confident Democrats Will Not De-Fund Iraq War. The White House Bulletin (2/20) reported that President Bush "is confident that congressional Democrats won't be able to muster support for withdrawing from Iraq no matter what legislative gambit they use, according to White House officials. Bush, believing he retains a strong position on Capitol Hill regarding the war, at least for now, is much more focused on what's happening in the field rather than on the jockeying in Congress." White House strategists predict Senate Republicans "will serve as a bulwark against unwise actions by the House over the long term." White House spokesman Tony Snow told the Bulletin, "Pretty soon Congress is going to have to make a binding commitment to support the troops." White House officials "don't think that majority Democrats, in the end, will have the votes or the gumption to vote down the funding."

Cheney Says US Won't Back "Policy Of Retreat." The AP (2/21, Talmadge) reports from Japan, "Vice President Dick Cheney reaffirmed the Bush administration's commitment to the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq during a visit to a U.S. aircraft carrier Wednesday, saying 'the American people will not support a policy of retreat.'" He "was given a 19-gun salute as he boarded the USS Kitty Hawk at [Yokosuka naval base] just south of Tokyo."

Most Vulnerable House Republicans Endorsed Bush's "Surge." The Hill (2/21, Blake) reports, "Three months ago, the unpopularity of President Bush and the Iraq war led many House Republicans to the closest reelection bids of their careers. Now, most of those with freshly painted targets on their backs have given Democrats an early vote to tie them to Bush and the war. … Nearly all of those who narrowly survived in 2006 voted with Bush, possibly providing future opponents with campaign fodder." According to the Hill, of the 17 House Republicans who voted with Democrats on the resolution, "only one of them," Rep. James Walsh, "was among the approximately 20 House Republicans who won in 2006 by less than 5 percent." Rep. Christopher Shays "beat back an anti-war challenger by 3 percent in November, while he watched his two Connecticut Republican colleagues fall," but voted against the Democrats' resolution.

White House Points To GOP Frontrunners' Support For Bush's Iraq Policies. The White House Bulletin (2/20) reported, "White House strategists are heartened that the three leading candidates for the Republican presidential nomination -- Rudy Giuliani, John McCain, and Mitt Romney -- are holding firm in support of President Bush's Iraq policy -- insisting on victory. The strategists point out that Bush remains popular with conservative Republicans across the country and the candidates don't want to alienate those voters in the primaries and caucuses by distancing themselves too much from their president. 'No one wants to run as the anti-Bush,' says one West Wing insider -- at least not the perceived frontrunners."

Right, Left-Wing Activists Target Incumbents Over Surge Resolution Votes. The Washington Times (2/21, Ward, 88K) reports, "Anti-war groups are following members of Congress home during their week off, while groups who support the war are targeting those they call 'white flag Republicans' for defeat in the 2008 elections. The anti-war movement has 'very high expectations for this Congress,' said former Rep. Tom Andrews, Maine Democrat and national director of Win Without War. … The anti-war coalition has created a list of public events for senators and representatives who support the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Mr. Andrews' group is urging anti-war activists across the country to attend these events and persuade their members of Congress to stop supporting the surge. Tomorrow, MoveOn will deliver letters to congressional offices, urging Congress to use its 'power of the purse' to stop the surge by constraining or cutting off funding." Conservative radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt's Victory Caucus is looking for primary opponents for the 17 congressmen and seven senators who opposed the president's surge plan.

Liberal Activists Upset By Centrist Democrats Target Tauscher. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Eilperin, Grunwald, 690K), in a long front-page article, reports, "The Democratic majority was only three weeks old, but by Jan. 26, the grass-roots and Net-roots activists of the party's left wing had already settled on their new enemy: Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), the outspoken chair of the centrist New Democrat Coalition. Progressive blogs…were bashing her as a traitor to her party." MoveOn.org activists "were accusing her of helping President Bush send more troops to Iraq." According to the Post, "The anti-Tauscher backlash illustrates how the Democratic takeover has energized and emboldened the party's liberal base, ratcheting up the pressure on the party's moderates. That pressure is also reaching House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Pelosi "has clashed with Tauscher in the past, but she's now eager to hold together her diverse caucus and to avoid the mistakes of GOP leaders who routinely ignored their moderates." Tauscher "has annoyed the left by supporting legislation to scale back the estate tax, tighten bankruptcy rules and promote free-trade agreements"

Few, If Any, House Members Read Full NIE On Iraq. The Hill (2/21, Soraghan) reports, "During last week's war debate, House members repeatedly cited the new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. … But it seems very few, if any, House members read the full, classified version of the report. That 90-page tome is now available to all representatives, thanks to a surprise decision by the House Intelligence Committee a week before the debate. A sampling by The Hill could not find a single House member who had trekked to the committee's secure office in the Capitol to view the classified version of the document. When asked, many said that they had read only the three-and-a-half-page declassified summary of 'key judgments' that the office of the director of national intelligence released earlier this month."

Wave Of Attacks Seen As Evidence That Iraqi Insurgents Are Adapting To US Tactics. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 3, :25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that US troops in Baghdad "are continuing a security crackdown and Iraqi militants are responding by stepping up attacks. Today, car bombs and a suicide bomber killed at least 17 Iraqi civilians. And just north of Baghdad, a bomb destroyed a tanker filled with chlorine gas. At least nine people died. 150 got sick from the fumes. Officials say the explosive was planted under the tanker."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Berthelsen, 850K) reports that "several car bombings, shootings and explosions" in Iraq yesterday "suggested insurgents were finding new ways to evade the ongoing security crackdown by U.S. and Iraqi forces. At least six people were killed in what authorities described as a crude attempt to detonate a chemical weapon in Taji, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad. Insurgents blew up a truck holding two tanks of chlorine gas, which were thrown clear of the vehicle and leaked, the U.S. military said. Scores of people suffered nausea, vomiting and irritated eyes from exposure to the gas, according to wire service reports. Prolonged exposure to high concentrations of the gas can cause deadly respiratory damage. … In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, a bomb Monday evening caused severe damage to a provincial office of the Iraqi National Accord, the party of former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who returned to Iraq last week in a bid to unify the nation's political factions."

Sophisticated SAM Used To Bring Down US Helicopter. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Tyson, 690K) reports Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, deputy U.S. commander in Iraq, "said yesterday that Sunni fighters probably used a sophisticated SA-14 or SA-16 shoulder-fired missile to shoot down a Marine helicopter on Feb. 7, killing all seven people on board. If confirmed…it would mark the first time since last summer that insurgents in Iraq struck U.S. aircraft with such an anti-aircraft missile, and it would provide fresh evidence of a new strategy of targeting helicopters. … The attack in Anbar province was the latest in a string of seven U.S. military and civilian helicopter downings in Iraq since last month. U.S. commanders say that Sunni and Shiite extremist groups have begun to use deadly strikes in a new and carefully planned effort to rally support for their causes." According to the Post, "The strategy of stepping up the targeting of U.S. helicopters, revealed in recently captured insurgent documents, was devised specifically to counter the U.S. and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad," Simmons said.

US Officials Wary Of Entering Relatively Stable Sadr City. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Daragahi, 850K) reports U.S. and Iraqi forces "have moved aggressively in the past week to combat Sunni Arab insurgents" in Baghdad neighborhoods, but now "the forces face their most sensitive challenge: whether, when and how to move into the Shiite-dominated slum of Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi army militia." Sunnis "have long accused Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki of allowing Sadr City to remain a safe haven for militias in order to maintain popular support from al-Sadr's followers. … U.S. and Iraqi military commanders "are concerned that if they move too aggressively, they could sabotage one of the few success stories in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Even amid the bloodshed across Baghdad, customers fill Sadr City's shops. Construction workers repair its streets and sewage lines. Children play soccer on its dusty fields and walk to school along newly prettified squares, verdant emblems of progress in one of Iraq's most long-deprived quarters." The Times notes, "U.S. officials in Iraq have gone to pains not to depict Sadr City as a singular source of trouble."

82nd Airborne Establishes Presence Near Sadr City As Part Of New Strategy. Fox News's Special Report (2/20, Hume) reported, "Additional US troops are already patrolling one especially dangerous neighborhood in Baghdad. Despite their unpleasant living conditions, their morale is high…and they appear to have been well received." Fox went on to report, "In an abandoned and looted shopping mall in a formerly well-to-do Baathist community is now the home of the White Falcons, part of the 82nd Airborne. … The new mission, the so-called 'surge.' Here…it actually looks like one." According to Fox, "Four more brigades are scheduled to move into Baghdad over the next couple of months, bringing the total of additional troops to 17500." The 82nd Airborne's staging area "is in some of the most contentious neighborhoods in the city. … The area of operations will include areas including and adjacent to Sadr City."

Operations In Outlying Villages Key To New Baghdad Strategy. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The security plan for Baghdad is a fight not only in the teeming streets of the capital but also in places like this, a Sunni-dominated village on the northern outskirts, where U.S. commanders say the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq is terrorizing Shiite residents, planning attacks on Americans and funneling explosives into Baghdad along a network of country roads. Hundreds of U.S. soldiers…pushed into Ibrahim bin Ali village Saturday morning for a two-day operation designed to take back the hamlet from insurgents and catalogue every fighting-age male in the village. 'This is a large part of the Baghdad security plan because this helps disrupt [al-Qaeda in Iraq] movement and foreign fighter movement into Baghdad,' said Maj. Chad Shields, a company commander."

US Officials Find Themselves In Middle Of Scandal Sparked By Rape Case. The New York Times (2/21, Santora, 1.16M) reports that "a 20-year-old Sunni woman from Baghdad appeared on the satellite television station Al Jazeera on Monday night with a horrific account of kidnapping and sexual assault at the hands of three officers in the Shiite-dominated Iraqi National Police. … Almost immediately, Shiite leaders lined up to condemn the woman, calling her charges propaganda aimed at undermining the new security campaign. Sunni politicians offered the woman their support. Whatever the truth of the accusation, though, it played to sectarian fears on both sides." The Times notes, "The Americans, who have advisers working with the Iraqi National Police, found themselves caught in the middle without answers. The woman said the Americans had rescued her from the officers and gave her medical treatment. … The American military said only that it was investigating the charges."

The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Londono, 690K) reports he woman said neighbors alerted U.S. soldiers that she had been arrested, which led to her release. She was admitted to Ibn Sina Hospital, which is run by the U.S. military. Iraqis treated there are generally admitted at the request of U.S. officials. 'The woman was here,' a hospital spokesman, 1st Lt. Justin Kocher, said Tuesday night. 'She received the care she needed,' he added, declining to elaborate." Maliki "injected himself into the case, issuing a news release announcing that the government had convened a committee to investigate and would hold the perpetrators responsible. … Hours later, Maliki reversed course, issuing another statement calling the woman an impostor and a criminal with three outstanding warrants. 'After confirming the falsehood of these claims,' it said, Maliki 'has ordered that these distinguished officers be honored.'"

Blair To Announce Partial Withdrawal Of Troops From Iraq. The New York Times (2/21, A12, Cowell, 1.16M) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair is expected to announce Wednesday "that up to 1,500 of the 7,000 British troops in southern Iraq will begin withdrawing in coming weeks," the British news media reported today, quoting unidentified sources. An official spokesman for the prime minister "declined to confirm widespread reports in newspapers and from the BBC about a withdrawal, saying that Parliament should be informed first of any such move." In Washington, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said that "while the United Kingdom is maintaining a robust force in southern Iraq, we're pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis." Johndroe added that President Bush and Blair had spoken to each another on Tuesday and that Bush "sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad." Blair's plans to reduce troop levels in Iraq is "a marked contrast" to Bush's plans to increase troop levels.

Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) also said Bush spoke to Blair yesterday and that a National Security Council spokesman says the US and great Britain "share the same goal of turning over responsibility to Iraqi forces and reducing the number of coalition troops in Iraq."

The Financial Times (2/21, Blitz) says the number will be reduced "by about 1,600," paving the way "for Iraqi forces to begin taking control of the city of Basra." In a statement to the House of Commons, Blair "will present the reduction in troop numbers as an initially modest move that does not undermine the UK's fighting capability." For Blair, Wednesday's announcement "is highly symbolic. After being dogged by the debacle in Iraq for nearly four years, today's statement allows him to leave office conveying the impression -- albeit a limited one -- that the UK intervention has had some success." However, the announcement "will be watched with anxiety by politicians across the political divide in the US" as Bush seeks support for his plan to increase troop levels.

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 2, :55, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The White House says this is no surprise." Bush and Blair "have been talking about this since last summer. … The White House spokesman says what's happening with the British troops, they'd like to have it be a model for what happens for the US troops. In other words, the Iraqi security forces are able to handle more of its own security, the need for coalition troops diminishing. We should point out, however, the area of Iraq the British troops were responsible for is much less prone to sectarian violence."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 2, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This was not a surprise at the White House but it is something they're being asked to respond to tonight." NBC (Gregory) said "this is the kind of announcement that…Bush wanted to make last spring about the gradual withdrawal of US troops. That wasn't the case and of course now there is this so-called surge in place."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, lead story, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) also asked, "What does this do to the Bush Administration's so-called troop surge as it gets underway and as more American fighters make their way now to Iraq where they may have to fight without their British partners?" NBC added that "unlike Baghdad and the Sunni triangle, the overwhelmingly Shiite population of the south is relatively calm. British casualties since the New Year there numbered just six shoulders."

The Washington Times (2/21, 88K) notes the British "handed over security responsibility for two of their four provinces to Iraqis last year and abandoned their main base in a third." Their forces are "concentrated in Basra itself and at a nearby air base. Commanders say they hope to withdraw from the city and keep a reserve force on standby at the base."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, lead story, 1:05, Phillips, 7.66M) reported, "The British say this withdrawal is possible because they've been handing over more and more responsibility to Iraqi troops in their area. But…Blair has also been under huge political pressure at home to come up with a withdrawal plan from what has become a very unpopular war."

ABC World News (2/20, story 4, 1:20, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "the British have turned it over to the Iraqis and all I can say is it might be more secure than other areas. … The British have obligations in Afghanistan. They want to send more troops in Afghanistan. They're stretched thin. Does that sound familiar?"

The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/21, A6) notes Blair is not expected to provide a deadline for "when the rest of Britain's forces would leave Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Murphy, 850K) reports, "The expected announcement to Parliament on Wednesday, which the prime minister's office refused to confirm, follows the British government's pledge to consider drawing down troops this year as the Iraqi military and police shoulder more responsibility for quelling sectarian violence." An "important signal came earlier this week, when Blair announced that a program to place Iraqi troops to take 'main frontline control' of security in the southern city of Basra had been 'successful,' clearing the way for British troops to assume a largely supportive role." USA Today (2/21, Jackson, Stinson, 2.27M) notes "Jeffrey White, an Iraq military expert at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the move is 'not a good news story from the point of view of security.' A former Mideast analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency, White said the British presence in southern Iraq 'acted as a check on a whole slew of bad guys.'"

Maliki Government Demolishing Famous War Monument Built By Saddam. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A6, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "a Shiite with ties to Tehran," ordered the dismantling of Baghdad's "best-known landmark -- the giant crossed-sword arches built by Saddam Hussein after the Iran-Iraq War." The Journal notes, "The Shiite Muslim parties that dominate Iraq's government had quietly given orders to dismantle the statues, which have dominated the capital's skyline for 17 years. … For other Americans and Iraqis, however, it was cause for alarm -- and concern that the demolition of the monument" would "further fuel the country's intensifying sectarian strife and become another symbol of the central government's increasingly hard-line stance toward Iraq's Sunni Muslim minority." However, "Early yesterday afternoon, Iraqi officials began alerting U.S. embassy staffers that a demolition order had been given."

Deaths Of Soldiers From Small Towns Erode Support For Iraq War. ABC World News (2/20, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is new analysis of the military deaths that have occurred in Iraq. Small towns are quietly burying much of the brunt of loss. The findings by the Associated Press are not terribly surprising, as there is a disproportionate amount of troops that come from small communities in the military. But as we've seen so many times, when a small town loses a soldier, it reverberates throughout the town and affects that town in profound ways." ABC added that "nearly half the 3,100 American military fatalities in Iraq came from small towns. One out of five, from those with less than 5,000 residents, many of them poor communities. … The different reality involves dwindling support for the war in rural America, where it was once strongest. Down from 73% three years ago to 39% today."

Plan To Resettle Iraqi Christians In US Proves Controversial. Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) reported, "Since the war in Iraq began four years ago, fewer than 500 Iraqis have been permitted to live in the US, even though an estimated 2 million refugees have fled Iraq. Post 911 security concerns are cited as the main reason, but the Bush Administration recently announced a change in that policy. A change that is not sitting well with everyone." Last week, the State Department "announced that 7000 refugees will be resettled in the US in the next year." Chaldean Christian say Muslim militias "routinely bomb their churches. Last spring, the Chaldean Federation of America launched a project to resettle 200,000 Chaldeans uprooted by the war. Volunteers say 17,000 Chaldean Christians, many of whom did translation or intelligence work for US troops, submitted applications to live in the US, most of them now living in limbo in middle eastern countries." A founder of the Minuteman Project "questions why President Bush wants to roll out the welcome mat for additional Iraqi refugees." Fox notes that "also critical of the refugee resettlement" is Ohio Democratic Gov. Ted Strickland. He "says he's sympathetic, but "would not want Ohioans to accept a greater burden than they already have borne for the Bush administration's failed policies." However, "after newspaper editorials blasted him, he apologized."

Suicide Bomber Wounds Six US Soldiers In Kabul. The New York Times (2/21, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "A suicide bomber disguised as a doctor blew himself up Tuesday morning at the opening of a hospital ward built by American forces in eastern Afghanistan, wounding six American soldiers as they tackled him at the entrance, officials said. An American soldier was also killed farther north, in Kunar Province, on Monday, the United States military reported." The Times adds, "An Afghan security officer and an American soldier had stopped the man, and when he tried to escape, the soldier grabbed him, the governor said. The man was shot in the leg, and then set off the bomb, he said. A hospital staff member was wounded."

WPost Says Bush Allowing Al Qaeda A "Safe Heaven" In Pakistan. The Washington Post (2/21, 690K) editorializes, "We know now that allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven can have terrible consequences for US homeland security. And yet the Bush administration appears to be letting the threat develop again [in Pakistan]. ... Such indulgence, which has gone on for five years while [Gen. Pervez Musharraf] has tempered his action against Islamic extremists and suppressed Pakistan's pro-Western democratic parties, will be hard to defend if the consequences of allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven are unchanged."

DOJ:

Interim Northern California US Attorney Sworn In. The Bay City News Service (2/21) reports, "A career federal prosecutor was sworn in at a ceremony in San Francisco today as the interim U.S. attorney for Northern California." BCNS continues, "Scott Schools, 44, who previously worked for the U.S. Justice Department in South Carolina and Washington D.C., was given the oath of office by Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker. … Schools told a courtroom gathering of federal lawyers and several judges, 'I'm very excited and honored to be here.'" BCNS adds, "Schools was appointed last week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to replace Kevin Ryan, who served in the top federal lawyer's job in San Francisco for 4 1/2 years. … Schools said after the swearing-in that he was about to hold his first meeting with his staff and was planning to tell the federal lawyers 'what my hopes and expectations are' for the job. … Schools will be in charge of about 115 lawyers in San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose who handle federal criminal cases as well as civil cases involving the U.S. government in coastal California from Monterey to the Oregon border." BCNS notes, "Under a provision of the federal Patriot Act reauthorization last year, Schools can remain in office as interim chief until a presidentially appointed U.S. attorney is confirmed by the Senate, which could be for the remaining two years of the Bush Administration. … Until the law was changed last year, the U.S. attorney general could appoint an interim U.S. attorney for only four months, after which the power to make a temporary appointment moved to the local federal court. … U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, has criticized the change in the law on the ground that it can be used to bypass the Senate confirmation process."

More Commentary. The Providence Journal (2/21) editorializes, "The U.S. Senate should extend its inquiry into why the Bush administration has forced at least seven U.S. attorneys out of office. By tradition, presidents appoint these federal prosecutors when they first enter office. President Bush replaced nearly all those who had been appointed by Bill Clinton; President Clinton had done much the same before him. But it is odd for a president to remove his own choices, especially if they are performing adequately." The Journal continues, "One who got the boot, Carol Lam, oversaw the corruption investigation that put California GOP Rep. Randy Cunningham in prison. Two others targeted in the probe, Kyle Foggo and Brent Wilkes, were indicted just last week. Until retiring last spring, Mr. Foggo was the No. 3 official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Mr. Wilkes is a San Diego-area defense contractor. The indictments were handed up just a few days before Ms. Lam's scheduled departure, raising the question of whether there was more to come — and whether it will now be pursued. … Also out is Bush supporter H.E. Cummins III, a U.S. attorney in Arkansas credited with stepping up prosecutions of drug and gun cases. He is being replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former deputy to presidential adviser Karl Rove. Another casualty, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, took on backdated stock options and steroid use by Major League Baseball players." The Journal concludes, "Some Democrats are pushing for a return to the old system, which seems better insulated from executive whims. The more heavily politicized these offices become, the less independently U.S. attorneys will act. The ultimate casualty is justice."

The Tri-City Herald (Kennewick, Paco, & Richland (WA), (2/21) editorializes, "The firing of federal prosecutor John McKay of Seattle is lamentable, but the job of U.S. attorney is - always has been - steeped in politics. … And some of politics, sadly, is steeped in lying. … So the explanations out of the Department of Justice that McKay and five other U.S. attorneys were fired for 'performance' issues call into question the source." The Herald continues, "Seven months before McKay was forced to resign, he received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators, The Seattle Times reported. … Underscoring the mendacious assertions of 'performance problems' by the Washington, D.C., bureaucracy is the discovery that at least four more of the six attorneys fired had recently received similarly positive evaluations of their job performance." The Herald adds, "There's little doubt that McKay and at least most of the others weren't treated fairly. But fairness is separated from politics by more than just 605 pages in Webster's New World Dictionary. … It shouldn't work this way, but U.S. attorney appointments - and jobs - are among the most political in the country."

DOJ Among Least Trusted Federal Agencies On Privacy Matters. National Journal's Technology Daily (2/21, Noyes) reports, "The CIA, Homeland Security Department and National Security Agency are the least trusted federal agencies when it comes to protecting Americans' privacy, according to a new study by the Ponemon Institute." Tech Daily continues, "The annual survey, which will be released Wednesday, asked more than 7,000 citizens whether they believe the government takes appropriate steps to safeguard personal information. Answers were mixed, but the overall trend suggested a decline in public trust since the think tank first studied the issue in 2004." Tech Daily adds, "The NSA has suffered a substantial flogging by lawmakers and privacy advocates amid questions in the past year over its domestic spying in search of terrorists. It also was revealed recently that the CIA has been utilizing a special subpoena power of the 2001 anti-terrorism law known as the USA PATRIOT Act to comb bank and credit-card records. … Homeland Security and the Transportation Security Administration, which were evaluated separately in the survey, have experienced their fair share of controversy over the mining of information from government and commercial databases and a program that screens travelers entering the United States." Tech Daily notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office also was among the least trusted of the 74 federal entities included in the poll. … 'There's a clear correlation between bad publicity and poor privacy trust performance,' survey author Larry Ponemon said. Previous studies 'lacked a big headline negative event,' whereas this time, there were several."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Attorney Accidentally Discloses Mercury Backdating Document. The California Recorder (2/21, Graham) reports, "A fourth-year associate at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe inadvertently disclosed a sensitive document about stock option backdating that the firm has spent the last five months fighting to keep under seal." The Recorder continues, "The document -- a complaint in a shareholder derivative action against former executives of Mercury Interactive Corp. -- contains explosive allegations against the executives and quotes extensively from e-mails in which the executives allegedly discuss backdating their own stock options. … 'What do you want to do about [Chief Financial Officer Douglas Smith]'s option since the price is going up?' former General Counsel Susan Skaer is quoted asking CEO Amnon Landon in one e-mail. 'Keep waiting?'" The Recorder adds, "The complaint, Morillo v. Abrams, 1:05-cv-50710, had been filed under seal on Sept. 22 as part of a confidentiality agreement with the executives' lawyers -- but without judicial approval. The Recorder and two other news organizations have been trying since then to unseal the complaint and its supporting exhibits. … But a Dow Jones News Service reporter discovered Friday that Orrick associate M. Todd Scott had inadvertently filed the complaint publicly with a motion to stay the derivative action in October. The Wall Street Journal posted the complaint on its Web site over the weekend and wrote a story about it on page A-4 of Tuesday's print edition." The Recorder notes, "In a filing for an emergency hearing on Tuesday, Orrick partner James Kramer wrote that Scott thought the complaint had been filed under seal when Scott included it as an exhibit to his own declaration. … 'At the time the exhibit was filed, counsel for Ms. Skaer intended for the exhibit to be filed under seal, and, indeed, believed the exhibit had been filed under seal,' Kramer wrote. 'Counsel continued in this belief until the afternoon of Feb. 16, 2007, at which time the court clerk notified all parties that the exhibit had not been filed under seal and was publicly available.' … The Mercury executives -- represented by Orrick; Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati; Shearman & Sterling; and Farella Braun & Martel -- have been fighting vigorously against The Recorder, the San Francisco Chronicle and Bloomberg to keep the complaint confidential. The executives succeeded in January in getting the derivative action dismissed for lack of standing, but shortly thereafter Santa Clara County, Calif., Judge James Kleinberg ordered that the complaint be unsealed nevertheless."

Fannie Mae Won't Pay Bonuses To Executives. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Hagerty, Paletta, 2.04M) reports, "Fannie Mae, struggling to atone for a $6.3 billion accounting scandal, announced that it won't pay $44.4 million of shares in the company previously promised as bonuses to 46 current and former executives. The giant provider of funding for US home mortgages said it will 'take into income' that amount, previously expensed for unpaid share awards that were based on earnings growth that proved illusory." The decision "will cancel planned payments totaling about $11.4 million for former Chief Executive Officer Franklin D. Raines; $4.1 million for the current CEO, Daniel Mudd; and $3.4 million for a former chief financial officer, Timothy Howard, a spokesman said. … Among other current senior executives, Robert Levin, chief business officer, will miss out on about $2 million of shares; Michael Williams, chief operating officer, $1.9 million; and Peter Niculescu, executive vice president, $600,000. The planned awards were for incentive-pay cycles that ended in 2003 and 2004."

The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports, "The awards, known as 'performance shares,' were one component of overall pay packages that typically included salaries, cash bonuses, stock options and other forms of compensation. The stock awards were granted on a rolling schedule, based on the company's performance over various three-year periods. For instance, executives had already received the first installment of awards for a cycle covering 2001 through 2003, and the board is not trying to reclaim that money, spokesman Chuck Greener said. Those awards were worth $4.1 million to Raines, $1.4 million to Howard and $1.8 million to Mudd." Regulators "have alleged that Fannie Mae's senior management intentionally manipulated the company's accounting to hit earnings targets and maximize bonuses. Raines's pay totaled more than $90 million from 1998 through 2003, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said last year."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Lawyers Make Closing Arguments At Libby Trial. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 5, :30, Mitchell,

DOJ_NMG_0134452

7.66M) reported that "the jury heard closing arguments in the trial of Scooter Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby is accused of lying to Federal agents and a grand jury of when he first learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson. Prosecutors told the jury today there is a cloud over the Vice President's role in the case because they say Libby obstructed justice. The defense contends Libby did nothing wrong and the case is about faulty memories." Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) noted, "Deputy prosecutor Peter Zeiderberg said that what Scooter Libby did was not a case of bad memory, but lying pure and simple. … Fitzgerald got the last word saying that the Vice President's office was obsessed with the Wilson trip and used his wife as a weapon against him."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 4, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported noted, "Once again, one of our own was a key topic today." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "Lies to protect the White House. Lies to prevent political embarrassment. Lies to save a powerful job. That's the motive prosecutors methodically laid out today against…Libby. … But in a fiery, passionate appeal for Libby's freedom, his lawyer, Ted Wells, called this prosecution madness. Wells repeatedly zeroed in on Russert's credibility," and he "urged the jury not to let politics influence its verdict. 'Don't in this case sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or the Bush Administration.' And prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald got political too, saying because Libby lied and obstructed justice, 'a cloud still hangs over the Vice President.'"

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/21, Apuzzo) reports, "Zeidenberg pointed to a flow chart showing arrows tracking information from several officials to Libby and on to other sources. With each conversation, it became less likely the CIA operative would just slip Libby's mind, Zeidenberg said. Wells presented a similar chart. Under each name and photograph, however, Wells noted their memory inconsistencies. Some changed their stories. Others seemed less certain in FBI interviews than they did on the stand." USA Today (2/21, 8A, Willing, 2.27M) notes "a tearful" Wells told jurors, "Don't … sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or about the Bush administration." However, Fitzgerald said Libby "threw sand in eyes of the FBI and grand jurors, he obstructed justice and he stole the truth from the judicial system."

Under the headline "Libby's Memory Is At The Heart Of The Case," the Los Angeles Times (2/21, Schmitt, Miller, 850K) also notes "Fitzgerald argued that Cheney's office was behind many of the prewar claims that Iraq had stockpiles of banned weapons and that it had aggressively sought to silence critics. 'Let's talk straight,' he said. 'There is a cloud over the vice president.'" The Times adds that Fitzgerald "opened his statement with an outburst. 'Madness! Madness! Outrageous!' he shouted, mocking the language of the defense attorneys who had sought to portray the case against their client as an overreach by a zealous prosecutor. The jurors, surprised by the unexpected display, perked up noticeably. But their attention waned as Fitzgerald spent an hour reviewing evidence, often talking so fast that it was hard to make out his words." The New York Times (2/21, Lewis, 1.16M) notes that "the prosecutors presented a detailed and businesslike summing up of their case," while Wells "countered with an intensely emotional defense ending in a choked sob."

The Financial Times (2/21, Daniel) and Washington Post (2/21, A4, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) similarly report on the closing arguments, while Dana Milbank writes in his Washington Post (2/21, A2, 690K) "Washington Sketch" column that Wells "may yet win an acquittal from the jury, which will start deliberations today. But it won't be because of the cohesion of his closing arguments. Libby was alternately portrayed as a man who told the truth, a man who inadvertently misspoke, and the victim of conspiracies involving everybody from President Bush to Tim Russert." Milbank notes, "Wells returned repeatedly to a note written by Vice President Cheney expressing concern that Libby was being sacrificed to protect others."

The Washington Post (2/21, C1, Weeks, 690K) also runs a generally sympathetic profile of Wells, noting that "through conversations and e-mails with friends, colleagues, his mother and others who know him well, a portrait emerges of a tough defense attorney who has mastered the balance between easygoing and hard-charging. Often he stands up for the Big Guy, comforting the comfortable. … After all, somebody has got to do it."

Isikoff Says Fitzgerald "Made It Clear" Libby Was "Protecting" Cheney. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/20, Matthews) Newsweek's Michael Isikoff said, "What today's closing arguments really underscored is why the White House was so nervous about this trial, why they were so reluctant to talk anything about it. One thing Patrick Fitzgerald said in his closing arguments that kind of stunned me, he…said 'there is a cloud on the vice president, but the cloud is there because Scooter Libby put it there. We, the prosecution, didn't put it there. Scooter Libby put it there by obstructing justice.' And then Fitzgerald ran through everything that Cheney did: writing the talking points, tearing out those articles from the newspaper and making those notes on them – 'did his wife send him a junket?' … Fitzgerald pretty much made it clear to the jury that Libby…was protecting the vice president of the United States."

Meanwhile, Tom DeFrank of the New York Daily News, also on MSNBC's Hardball (2/20, Matthews), said, "It's probably a very good week for the vice president to be in Asia right now because it hasn't been a good week for him." Fitzgerald "put the Vice President on trial, even though he was not charged with anything. But he was very much front and center in this trial from start to finish."

Justice To Launch New Focus On Export Enforcement Cases. The top counterespionage priority for the Justice Department in coming months will be so-called "export enforcement" cases, the sale or transfer of sensitive U.S. technologies to foreign entities or governments, or terrorist groups, J. Patrick Rowan, the new counterespionage and counter terrorism chief at the department told U.S News and the Bulletin. In an exclusive interview, Rowan said that one of his goals is to get the word out to federal prosecutors that the department will support them in pursuing these often complex, previously low-priority cases. "We're not talking about physical pieces of machinery as much as technology," Rowan says. He explained that foreign governments are learning that they can get more critical technical information unwittingly from U.S. graduate students and business people than under the "old model of a bunch of covert operatives sneaking around and hiding stuff behind a tree." With technology becoming increasingly sophisticated, says Rowan, and so much more portable, even a military code, or some kind of dual-use technology sold to a hostile nation or terrorist group could do a great deal of harm. A career prosecutor, Rowan is the deputy assistant attorney general for counter terrorism and counterespionage in the department's new National Security Division, which brings all of the department's national security programs under one umbrella. The division -- headed by the former U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, Kenneth Wainstein -- became operational last summer, and implements a key recommendation of the WMD commission, the presidential commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led to the war in Iraq. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

DOJ Not Planning To Reopen Berger Investigation. The Washington Times (2/21, Seper, 88K) reports the Justice Department "says it is unaware of any new facts to support a call by the former chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee for a new investigation into the theft of National Archives documents by former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger. Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling, in a letter Friday to the committee's new Democratic chairman, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California, said an 'extensive investigation' led to a guilty plea by Mr. Berger in which he admitted removing the classified documents and the department 'stands by its investigation.' … His letter was in response to a report by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and now the committee's ranking member, saying Justice gave Mr. Berger a 'free pass' in its investigation and called for the committee to investigate the matter instead."

National Archives IG's Accusations Against Berger Initially Dismissed By DOJ. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, Smith, 690K) reports, "While waving his own leg in the air in illustration, Paul Brachfeld, inspector general of the National Archives and Records Administration, asked the group rhetorically if 'something white' could be easily mistaken if it was wrapped around their legs, beneath their pant legs. Under debate during the Nov. 23, 2004, meeting was Brachfeld's contention…Berger could have stolen original, uncatalogued, highly classified terrorism documents 14 months earlier by wrapping them around his socks and beneath his pants, as National Archives staff member John Laster reported witnessing. … Brachfeld wanted the Justice Department to notify officials of the 9/11 Commission that Berger's actions -- in combination with a bungled Archives response -- might have obstructed the commission's review of Clinton's terrorism policies. The Justice Department spurned the advice, and some of Brachfeld's colleagues at the Archives greeted his warnings with accusations of disloyalty. But more than three years later, as Brachfeld and House lawmakers have pushed new details about Berger's actions onto the public record -- such as Berger's use of a construction site near the Archives to temporarily hide some of the classified documents -- Brachfeld's contentions have attracted fresh support."

DOJ Probe Of Senator Campbell's Staffers Continues. The Hill (2/21, Soraghan) reports, "It may have been forgotten by many, but the corruption investigation of the office of former Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (R-Colo.) isn't over." The Hill continues, "The FBI and the Justice Department are pursuing the case, records show, nearly three years after it was opened and more than two years after Campbell left office. But charges have yet to be levied and an explanation as to why it's taken so long to wrap up has yet to be offered. … 'I don't understand why it would take so long,' said Tom Gorman, who heads a Denver-based, anti-drug task force and complained to the Justice Department that Campbell's office pressured him to award a no-bid contract. 'It didn't seem to me to be that complicated of a case.' … Campbell, too, said he's eager to put the investigation behind him, stressing that he has been told he is not a subject of the investigation. Investigators have not interviewed Campbell. … 'Senator Campbell is eager to learn the results of the Department of Justice's investigation into the alleged actions of a former staff member,' a Campbell spokeswoman, Kate Dando, said." The Hill notes, "The 'former staffer' is Campbell's onetime chief of staff, Ginnie Kontnik, who resigned just before the allegations surfaced. The Justice Department's anti-corruption unit is investigating a no-bid contract that Campbell and Kontnik tried to steer to a company co-owned by one of Campbell's top fundraisers.

More sensationally, Kontnik allegedly shook down an underling for a $2,000 kickback in 2002. … A Jan. 12 letter from the Justice Department Criminal Division, obtained by The Hill, denied a request for documents about the investigation, saying they 'relate to open and on-going law enforcement proceedings being conducted by the Public Integrity Section,' referring to the department's anti-corruption unit. … The letter said releasing documents could interfere with the investigation."

DOJ, FBI Probing Wisconsin Travel Contracts. The AP (2/21, Foley) reports from Madison, WI, "The FBI and the state Department of Justice are continuing their investigation into Gov. Jim Doyle's administration, investigators said." The AP continues, "With one state employee convicted of steering a travel contract to a company with political ties to the governor, the criminal probe "remains open," the state Division of Criminal Investigation said in a letter to The Associated Press. … The disclosure means an investigation that distracted Doyle during his first term in office and gave ammunition to his critics could continue into his second. Doyle has not been accused of wrongdoing and has defended his administration from accusations of corruption." The AP adds, "The news came in DCI administrator James R. Warren's Feb. 14 response to a public records request for documents relating to the agency's investigation of the ravel contract. … Warren turned over more than 50 pages detailing the probe that led to last summer's conviction of Georgia Thompson, a state purchasing supervisor, on federal fraud charges. … But he declined to release an additional 105 pages, including 40 pages of FBI reports, that he said involve 'persons other than those who testified at the trial of Georgia Thompson.' … Their release would undermine the probe, he said. Warren also blacked out the identities of two people from the released records." The AP notes, "Prosecutors said Thompson steered a contract to a company whose executives gave $20,000 to Doyle's re-election campaign. She is serving 18 months in prison. After her trial, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic in Milwaukee told reporters the probe was not over. … Doyle's opponent in the November election, Republican Mark Green, repeatedly claimed Doyle's administration was facing 'an ongoing FBI investigation.' But the probe seemed to fizzle out as months went by with no additional action."

FBI Tennessee Waltz Tapes Show Ford Discussing Rolex From Developer. WREG-TV Memphis (2/20) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Today there is surprising new evidence in the John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case. With video and audiotapes, the FBI says Ford took thousands of dollars in bribes. The hearing this afternoon is about the Rolex watch Ford said he received as a gift from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman. … At one point, Ford is heard saying to an undercover FBI agent that he is going to receive a $50,000 Rolex because he did Hyneman a big favor. … He is on video again later, showing off the Rolex and telling another FBI agent that he paid zero for the watch because he did the developer a big favor by saving them up to $1.5 million dollars." WPTY-TV Memphis (2/20, Buduson) noted, "Ford's lawyers say there's no proof Hyneman gave Ford the watch. On Jan. 31, 2005, Ford changed his story. Ford told an undercover FBI agent he bought the watch. FBI agents acknowledge Hyneman has not saved any money for state environmental violations he faces."

WHBQ-TV Memphis (2/20, Cowman) reported, "Judge J. Daniel Breen did deny the defense's request to suppress the watch due to the way it was seized, saying the government had the right to seize it, but the judge still wants more proof on the relevance of the Rolex before he allows it into trial. … Defense attorneys said the judge probably won't rule on whether the Rolex will be admitted until once the trial has begun." WMC-TV Memphis (2/20) noted, "Hyneman was as evasive outside court Tuesday as he was inside. He pleaded the 5th on every question concerning his relationship with Ford. In other words, he answered nothing."

Memphis Official Calls For City Council Probe Of Edmund Ford Billing Practices. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/21, Jones, 163K) reports, "Chairman Tom Marshall wants the Memphis City Council to investigate billing practices at Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division in regard to fellow Councilman Edmund Ford. The chairman's request Tuesday came the same day The Commercial Appeal reported that a federal grand jury had subpoenaed three years of utility billing information for three of Ford's accounts." The Commercial Appeal adds, "Committee chairwoman Carol Chumney said she agreed to place the matter on March 6 committee agenda. Chumney later said she was open to looking into the matter, but is reserving judgment."

Tennessee Waltz Defendant Cooper Charged With DUI. The Tennessean (2/21, Alligood) reports, "State Sen. Jerry Cooper was legally drunk when he rolled his sport-utility vehicle on Interstate 24 earlier this month after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee Highway Patrol said Tuesday." Cooper, "who was already free on bail on federal fraud charges, was charged with drunken driving and speeding in connection with the Feb. 7 one-vehicle wreck in Rutherford County." The Tennessean notes, "Cooper was seriously injured in the wreck and is convalescing at home from rib fractures, a concussion and a severe arm injury. He will be arrested or required to turn himself in 'when he is physically able,' according to the THP statement."

Man Blames Prison Confession On Alleged Twin Brother. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/21, Shiffman) reports, "Andre L. Henry - who stands accused of violent crimes against a police officer, two banks, two grand-jury witnesses, and eight fast-food restaurants - has offered jurors in his trial an unusual defense. … The man secretly recorded in a prison cell confessing? … Not him, Henry testified. It was his twin brother; they had traded cells in prison. … 'We figured, why not?' Henry told jurors. 'Who would know?'" The Inquirer continues, "A federal jury in Philadelphia is expected to begin deliberating Henry's fate this morning. If convicted of the most violent charges - including car-jacking and solicitation to murder - he probably faces life in prison. … In closing arguments yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle Rotella mocked Henry's assertion, and said the government had provided ample evidence that Henry doesn't have a twin brother. … 'His story is just absurd,' Rotella told the jury." The Inquirer adds, "Federal officials say Henry is an extremely violent man. In addition to the charges in this case, he faces state murder charges and, according to grand jury testimony, was investigated for an alleged plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall. … The alleged 2003 plot against shoppers and commuters at the Center City mall had not been previously reported. Henry was never charged with terror-related crimes; he and his lawyer, Christopher Warren, have denied that any attack was planned. … Jurors in his trial have not been told directly about the alleged Gallery plan. But during cross-examination, Henry unexpectedly began to talk about it, accusing Rotella of fabricating evidence against his family." The Inquirer notes, "The government's best evidence of a terror plot is the secret recording of Henry made by his cell mate - an unredacted copy of which was reviewed by The Inquirer. … At one point, Henry, who is a black Muslim, said on tape that the purpose of the blasts, timed for rush hour near the Market East SEPTA station, would represent 'domestic terrorism' against white Americans. … At another point on the recording, however, Henry said the purpose would be to divert Philadelphia police long enough to pull off a major bank robbery."

Delaware Man's Federal Appeal Cites Hearsay, Jury Instructions. The AP (2/21, Chase) reports from Dover, DE, "Thomas Capano's lawyer argued in a federal appeal yesterday that a judge had violated the convicted killer's constitutional right to a fair trial by refusing to let the jury consider charges other than murder and by allowing hearsay testimony." The AP continues, "In a 71-page brief supporting Capano's habeas corpus petition, attorney Joseph Bernstein said the Delaware Supreme Court had erred in upholding the judge's decision to give the 1998 jury only two options: acquittal or conviction for first-degree murder." The AP adds, "Under a 1980 U.S. Supreme Court ruling, a defendant in a capital murder case is entitled to jury instructions that include lesser offenses if any evidence supports those offenses, Bernstein told the Associated Press. … Capano, now 56, acknowledged in his trial that he had dumped the body of Anne Marie Fahey, who was Gov. Tom Carper's scheduling secretary, into the Atlantic Ocean, but said her death had been an accident. … 'If you're on a jury and you hear that, and you only have two options, what are you going to do?' Bernstein said. 'Even if you don't think it was intentional murder, you're not going to let him go.'" The AP notes, "Capano, once a wealthy and politically connected lawyer, was convicted of shooting Fahey, 30, in 1996, allegedly because she was breaking off an affair with him. … Bernstein also argued in the federal appeal that hearsay testimony by Fahey's friends and psychotherapists should have been excluded from the trial. … In 2001, the state Supreme Court upheld Capano's conviction, his death sentence, and Judge William Swain Lee's decision to reject lesser offenses such as manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide."

New York Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette (2/21) reports, "John R. Maggese, 44, pleaded guilty today to a felony charge of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice." The Star-Gazette continues, "Maggesse was accused of having child pornography on a computer he owned from July 2003 through August 2005, the release stated. He received the images over the Internet; some of the images showed children under 12 years old. … Maggese is scheduled to be sentenced at 2 p.m. May 24 in U.S. District Court in Rochester. The charges carry a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment, a $250,000 fine, or both."

Investigator Pleads Guilty To Defrauding Law Firms. The New York Law Journal (2/21, Hamblett) reports, "A Montana man Tuesday pleaded guilty to defrauding law firms involved in major litigation by claiming to have proof of illegal activity by opposing counsel and parties." The Journal continues, "Michael Lair, 46, headed consumerdefense.com Inc., which held itself out as a consumer complaint investigator and researcher for large fraud cases. Tuesday, Lair admitted to defrauding attorneys and litigants of more than $311,000 in 2003 and 2006 as he pleaded guilty to four counts of wire fraud before Southern District of New York Judge John Keenan. … Under a plea agreement with Assistant U.S. Attorney Helen Cantwell, Lair is expected to be sentenced to serve somewhere between 2 years and 3 months to 2 years and 9 months in prison." The Journal adds, "The victims of the fraud included two of Manhattan's top litigation firms, Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason; Anello & Bohrer; and Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman. … While the guilty plea Tuesday covered the litigation involving the Morvillo and Kasowitz firms, prosecutors had been prepared to obtain a superseding information that would have charged Lair with attempting to defraud 10 other firms in litigation in New York and other parts of the country. … Tuesday, with defense attorney Leonard Joy by his side, Lair told Judge Keenan, 'I agreed with a number of law firms to supply information about the parties involved in legal actions in which the law firms were involved. I charged the firms' fees knowing that I did not have and could not have obtained such information.'"

New York Lawyer Pleads Guilty To Stealing $20 Million From Bank, Client. The AP (2/19) reported, "A lawyer pleaded guilty to stealing more than $20 million from a bank and at least one client, spending the loot on vacation homes, a wedding and generous salaries for his employees, authorities said. Under a deal with prosecutors," Anthony Bellettieri of White Plains "faces more than a decade in prison after admitting in federal court to bank and mail fraud dating to at least 2003. Bellettieri, a real estate lawyer, stole the funds through check kiting." The AP noted, "According to J.P. Morgan Chase, the primary victim, the tactic worked partly because he used checks with a printed error. The scheme fell apart after the bank issued correct checks in November."

Five Plead Guilty In "Cult-Like" California Investment Fraud Scheme. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/18, Thornton, 324K) reported, "Five men have pleaded guilty in federal court to defrauding investors of $20 million in a long-term scam that preyed mostly on churchgoers. John Harrell, the ringleader of the scam, admitted he recruited investors with bogus schemes and then spent all the money on himself and other members of the enterprise, said prosecutor Jason Forge." The Union-Tribune noted, "'Mr. Harrell and his co-conspirators utilized a complex fraud scheme to steal millions through promises of high rates of return with no risk,' said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego. 'He also preyed on his victims' religious faiths and their suspicion of government. Today's result will make others think twice before defrauding the American public.' … Authorities described the organization as 'a cult-like investment scheme' that operated out of San Diego beginning in the late 1980s."

Former California Judge Sentenced For Child Pornography Possession. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Hanley) reports, "A former Orange County judge collapsed in a Los Angeles federal courtroom Tuesday moments after being sentenced to 27 months in prison for possessing child pornography, bringing a dramatic end to a case that tested privacy rights and nearly fell apart because of a computer hacker's role in the investigation." The Times continues, "Ronald C. Kline was standing with his hands in his pockets and swaying slightly as U.S. District Judge Consuelo B. Marshall indicated he would do prison time. Kline's knees suddenly buckled and he fell backward, with his eyes closed, into the arms of one of his attorneys. … A nurse and paramedics rushed to the courtroom. . They monitored his heart and administered other tests on the 66-year-old Kline. He was on his feet about a half-hour later, and his attorneys said he was well enough to sit through the rest of the hearing." The Times adds, "When it resumed, Marshall also ordered Kline to serve three years' of strictly supervised probation. During that time, he cannot use the Internet or possess any technology — including a cell phone—that would allow Internet access without prior written approval. … Other conditions bar him from lingering within 100 feet of schools, parks and other common gathering points for children under 18. He must also register as a sex offender for the rest of his life. … Marshall said she based her ruling on a variety of factors, including a recommendation by probation officers that Kline serve between 27 and 33 months, the seriousness of the offense, Kline's lack of prior criminal history and his acceptance of responsibility." The Times notes, "Asst. U.S. Attorneys Gregory W. Staples and Deirdre Z. Eliot said they were satisfied with the ruling, even though they had asked for the maximum 33 months."

Woman In Prostitution Probe Pressures US To Drop Case. The Washington Times (2/21, Mcelhatton) reports, "A California woman who is the target in an ongoing criminal probe into the operation of her District-based escort agency has told federal authorities she will 'make life miserable' for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped, government attorneys say. … 'I cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this case (civil and/or criminal) will set off, if permitted to advance for both sides,' Deborah Jean Palfrey wrote in an e-mail to the U.S. Attorney's Office. 'The press will have a field day at each of our expense.'" The Times continues, "Government attorneys referenced the e-mail in a recent motion to postpone civil forfeiture proceedings against Miss Palfrey pending the outcome of a criminal investigation. But an attorney for Miss Palfrey wants to move forward with the civil case, filing court papers last weekend detailing an attempt to depose former Clinton campaign adviser Dick Morris." The Times adds, "Mr. Morris, a news commentator who resigned from the Clinton campaign in 1996 amid a scandal involving escort services, is 'the only customer of the service who has publicly admitted using the services for "legal" sexual activity,' Miss Palfrey's attorney wrote in court papers." The Times adds, "Miss Palfrey, of Vallejo, Calif., has been the target of a two-year investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Postal Service into whether she illegally earned money from prostitutes working as escorts for her business. … Miss Palfrey has not been charged criminally. … In October, federal agents seized more than $427,000 in cash and stocks from Miss Palfrey. In pleadings, authorities say the criminal investigation is ongoing."

Tennessee Businessman Convicted Of DOE Contract Fraud. The Knoxville News Sentinel (2/21, Satterfield) reports, "A lauded Oak Ridge businessman may soon be trading pinstripes for prison stripes. A jury in U.S. District Court on Tuesday convicted Reginald Hall, 54, of conspiracy to commit money laundering for a scheme to plunder money from the U.S. Department of Energy via fake invoices submitted as a subcontractor for the Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Jurors also found Hall guilty of money laundering and theft of government property. He was acquitted, however, of mail fraud and obstruction of justice." The News Sentinel notes, "Agents Randall Kizer and Rick Sample with DOE's Office of the Inspector General, Agent Bob Gibson of the FBI and Lt. Art Schettini of the Tennessee Valley Authority Police Criminal Investigation Division headed up the probe."

Deliveryman Tells Of Unprovoked Shooting By Maryland Official. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Rich) reports, "A senior Prince George's County homeland security official who last month shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen opened fire without provocation after angrily ordering the men to leave his home, the surviving mover said in a statement provided last night to law enforcement authorities." The Post continues, "Keith A. Washington, who is also a county police officer, was combative almost from the moment the movers arrived at his Accokeek home, said Robert White, who worked for a contractor delivering for Marlo Furniture. 'As we were leaving we reached the top of the steps, and the customer said "I know how to get you the [expletive] out of my house" and I heard gunshots,' White said in the statement. … Later, White said, he listened as he lay bleeding while Washington falsely reported that the men he shot had attacked him with a pipe. 'I remember sitting there on the ground thinking to myself, I can't believe this is how it is going to be,' said White, 36, who dictated the statement from his hospital bed to his attorney. His co-worker, Brandon Clark, 22, died of his wounds Feb. 2 without giving a statement." The Post adds, "Washington has not spoken publicly since the shooting. A source familiar with the investigation has told The Post that, in a brief report filed immediately after the incident, Washington alleged that the movers were in a part of the house where they were not supposed to be. Police have said that Washington told them he acted in self-defense. … Police initially said they would probably charge the movers with assault but have since backed off that comment, saying they would make no determination until their investigation is complete. … White's attorney, Michael J. Winkelman, has not allowed police to interview his client, whose criminal record includes a burglary conviction, in part because of the possibility that police might try to build an assault case against White. In addition, Winkelman said he is concerned that White's providing a statement before Washington does so might allow Washington to fabricate a story that blames the movers in the shooting."

Police Seek Motive In Maryland Shopping Plaza Standoff, Fire. The Washington Post (2/21, B2, Vogel) reports, "Frederick authorities yesterday recovered a body believed to be that of a man who they say shot at police and started a fire that gutted a shopping plaza Monday." The Post continues, "The body, which was found about 12:30 p.m. behind the locked front door in the rubble of a destroyed liquor store at the Frederick shopping center, has been sent to the chief medical examiner's office in Baltimore for identification." The Post adds, "Frederick police were still trying to piece together how James Douglas's visit to a liquor store ended up in an inferno that destroyed the Antietam Village Center. … Police say Douglas, 30, of Frederick, walked into Jim's Liquors at the shopping plaza on Oppossumtown Pike about 12:30 p.m. Monday, showed the owner a handgun and ordered him out of the store. … When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door, police said. … Yesterday afternoon, fire marshals, police detectives and construction workers moved through the blackened remains of the plaza."

Maryland Governor Explains His Opposition To Death Penalty. Writing in the Washington Post (2/21, 690K), Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley asks, "Is the death penalty a just punishment for murder? Is the death penalty an effective deterrent to murder? … Are any of us willing to sacrifice a member of our own family -- wrongly convicted, sentenced and executed -- in order to secure the execution of five rightly convicted murders? And even if we were, could that public policy be called 'just'? I do not believe it can." But "what about the deterrent value of the death penalty? Does the use of the death penalty -- while rarely, if ever, 'just' -- save more innocent lives than it takes? The evidence indicates that it does not." O'Malley concludes that "absent a deterrent value, the damage done to the concept of human dignity by our conscious communal use of the death penalty is greater than the benefit of even a justly drawn retribution."

Maryland Officer Charged With Molesting Woman During Traffic Stop. The Washington Post (2/21, B6, McCaffrey) reports, "An Anne Arundel County police officer was charged with a sex offense yesterday, accused of coercing a woman to bare her breasts during a traffic stop, then molesting and photographing her. He told her she could avoid jail if she exposed herself, police said." The Post continues, "Joseph Mossmiller, 22, who joined the department in May, was charged before a District Court commissioner with a fourth-degree sex offense, second-degree assault, false imprisonment and misconduct in office, police said." The Post adds, "Three other officers were suspended in connection with the incident. Police declined to identify them or disclose what the led to their suspensions with pay except to say that they were also rookies but had not been at the scene of the traffic stop Jan. 20. … According to charging documents filed in District Court, the 18-year-old woman was driving with a female passenger whom she had just picked up at a bar when she was pulled over by a marked police car in the Pasadena area. … Mossmiller was released on his own recognizance yesterday after initially being sent to the county detention facility when he was unable to post a $250,000 bond, police said."

Youths Tell Of Grim Life On Traveling Magazine Sales Crews. The New York Times (2/21, Urbina) reports, "Two days after graduating from high school last June, Jonathan Pope left his home in Miamisburg, Ohio, to join a traveling magazine sales crew, thinking he would get to 'talk to people, party at night and see the country.' … Over the next six months, he and about 20 other crew members crossed 10 states, peddling subscriptions door to door, 10 to 14 hours a day, six days a week. Sleeping three to a room in cheap motels, lowest seller on the floor, they survived some days on less than $10 in food money while their earnings were kept 'on the books' for later payment. … By then, Mr. Pope said, he had seen several friends severely beaten by managers, he and several other crew members were regularly smoking methamphetamine with prostitutes living down the motel hallway, and there were warrants out for his arrest in five states for selling subscriptions without a permit. … After persuading his manager to let him leave, Mr. Pope was dropped off, without a ticket, $17 in his pocket, at a bus terminal near San Antonio, more than 1,000 miles from home." The Times continues, "More than two decades after a Senate investigation revealed widespread problems with these itinerant sellers, and despite several highly publicized fatal accidents and violent crimes involving the sales crews in recent years, the industry remains almost entirely unregulated. And while the industry says it has changed, advocates and law enforcement officials say the abuses persist." The Times adds, "In interviews over seven months, more than 50 current and former members from almost as many crews painted a similar picture of life on the road. … With striking uniformity, they told of violence, drug use, indebtedness and cheating of customers during their cross-country travels, often in unsafe vehicles and with drivers who lacked proper licenses."

Rise In Teenage "Sport Killings" Of Homeless Worries Authorities. CNN.com (2/21, Fantz) reports from Milwaukee, WI, "All Nathan Moore says he wanted to do was smoke pot and get drunk with his friends. Killing Rex Baum was never part of the plan that day in 2004. … 'It all started off as a game,' Moore said." CNN continues, "The 15-year-old and his friends were taunting the homeless man -- throwing sticks and leaves -- after having a couple of beers with him. … No big deal, Moore says, but he's sorry for what came next. … It was a mistake, he said, a sudden primal surge that made him and his friends Luis Oyola, 16, and 17-year-old Andrew Ihrcke begin punching and kicking Baum. … They hurled anything they could find -- rocks, bricks, even Baum's barbecue grill -- and pounded the 49-year-old with a pipe and with the baseball bat he kept at his campsite for protection. … After destroying Baum's camp, the boys left the homeless man -- head wedged in his own grill -- under a piece of plastic where they hoped the 'animals would eat' him. … Then, Moore says, they took off to grab a bite at McDonald's." CNN adds, "Baum's murder was indicative of a disturbing trend. … A National Coalition for the Homeless report says last year, there were 122 attacks and 20 murders against the homeless, the most attacks in nearly a decade. … 'It's disturbing to know that young people would literally kick someone when they're already down on their luck,' said Michael Stoops, the executive director of the Washington-based National Coalition for the Homeless. 'We recognize that this isn't every teenager, but for some this passes as amusement.'" CNN notes, "Criminologists call these wilding sprees 'sport killing,' -- largely middle-class teens, with no criminal records, assaulting the homeless with bats, golf clubs, paintball guns. … Some teens have even taped themselves in the act. Others have said they were inspired by 'Bumfights,' a video series created in 2002 and sold on the Web that features homeless people pummeling each other for the promise of a few bucks." CNN notes, "Stoops and Brian Levin, a California State University hate crimes expert, say common themes run through teen-on-homeless violence. The attackers are almost always boys, peer pressure and mob mentality sweep away caution, and parents don't suspect their children could be capable of such actions."

Congress Urged To Enact Federal Journalist-Source Privilege Law. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) Geoffrey Stone, professor of law at the University of Chicago, writes, "Congress should expeditiously enact a federal journalist-source privilege law, which would protect journalists from compelled disclosure of their sources' confidential communications in the same way psychiatrists and lawyers are protected. Importantly, neither Congress nor the press should be unwilling to compromise when the alternative is to forgo such a privilege altogether."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Voids $79.5 Million Tobacco Award.

USA Today (2/21, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court tossed out a $79.5 million award to a smoker's widow Tuesday in its first ever case testing punitive damages in a personal injury dispute." The decision "limits when jurors may consider the harm a company caused people who were not part of the case." The 5-4 ruling "is a victory for Philip Morris USA, which won another chance to challenge an Oregon jury's punitive damages award that was 97 times the actual damages for the death of Jesse Williams, a longtime Marlboro smoker."

McClatchy (2/21, Henderson) reports the 5-4 ruling, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, "said awarding damages to punish a company for harming nonparties to a suit amounted to taking property without due process." Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy, David H. Souter and Samuel A. Alito Jr. agreed with Breyer. Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Clarence Thomas dissented. Thomas and Scalia "objected to Tuesday's ruling for the same reasons they've resisted all the court's decisions limiting punitive damages: They don't think that the Constitution addresses the issue." That puts them "at odds with Roberts, Alito and Kennedy, the remaining justices in the court's politically conservative wing. … Stevens' vote represents a departure for him on this issue; he penned the 1996 ruling that established constitutional limits for punitive damages, but said Tuesday's ruling went too far."

The Legal Times (2/21, Mauro) reports, "Business advocates applauded the ruling as a major body blow, grounded in the Constitution, against high punitive damage awards. … 'This is a huge, huge win for corporate defendants,' said Lori Nugent, chair of the enterprise risks practice of Cozen O'Connor in Chicago, and author of a state-by-state guide on punitive damages. 'Lawyers who exhort jurors to send a message; that has to stop now. It rips the guts right out of a case.' … But plaintiffs groups say the decision won't change much, especially since the Court on Tuesday also said that harm to others could still be considered by jurors in determining the defendant's level of 'reprehensibility.' … 'Ultimately, I don't think this is going to be very significant. The Court was slaying dragons that don't exist,' said Robert Peck, who argued the case on behalf of Mayola Williams, widow of longtime Oregon smoker Jesse Williams, whose estate won the case against Philip Morris. On remand to Oregon, Peck said, the case could still result in a significant punitive damage award." The Times notes, "The ruling also disappointed some business groups because it explicitly stopped short of setting numerical limits on excessive punitive damages -- a holy grail for critics of the tort system. The Court's sidestep caused some tobacco-company stocks to dip on Wall Street after the ruling."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Richey, 59K) notes "the US Supreme Court struck down the verdict because it said the jury violated due-process protections when it sought to punish the tobacco company for injuries suffered by nonparties to the litigation," while the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Barnes, 690K) says that "in sending the case back to Oregon courts for further litigation, the justices sidestepped a decision that industry had most wanted: whether to set a solid cap on how much could be awarded for punitive damages, perhaps based on a specific ratio to the actual damages done to the individual who brought the suit. Still, business advocates praised the decision."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A2, Bravin, O'Connell, 2.04M) calls the ruling "another boon for corporate defendants. But it wasn't the knockout blow against punitive damages that business had sought." The ruling "turned on the court's finding defendants can't be punished for harms suffered by consumers who aren't party to a lawsuit. But the justices refused to impose a formula, sought by business groups, that would limit punitive-damage awards."

ABC World News (2/20, story 2, 2:20, Greenberg, 8.78M) said "lawyers supporting Philip Morris said the ruling will stop runaway jury awards. Not only in tobacco cases, but in other types of lawsuits, including those for defective drugs and automobiles." Theodore Boutrous, Product Liability Advisory Council: "This, along with the court's previous decisions, help significantly bring fairness to the system." But "Robert Peck, a lawyer for Mrs. Williams, says the award was fair. And predicted a lower court will reinstate it, even under the new standard." Peck: "You still can say look how many Jesse Williams there are out there. This was massive misconduct on a scale that requires significant award."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 4, 2:40, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "What is most likely to happen now is a new jury instruction will have to go out in cases where companies have lost, and the jury instruction will be something like you can't punish this company for all the other people it hurt even though it might have hurt other folks. You can't add to the money. That's likely not to eliminate huge jury verdicts but will probable diminish a lot of them."

The New York Times (2/21, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "What happens next in this lawsuit may provide an early indication of the practical significance of the court's ruling, as far as it went. The case now goes back to the Oregon Supreme Court, which has options ranging from reinstating the award to ordering a new trial. The original trial of the suit, brought by Mayola Williams, whose husband, Jesse, died of lung cancer after smoking two packs of Marlboros a day for 45 years, took place in 1999." Sheila L. Birnbaum, a punitive damages specialist with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York, "said the court was requiring jurors to 'unring the bell' in a way that might prove difficult. 'It's very hard for jurors to disregard something they have heard,' she said." The Washington Times (2/21, Lopes, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (2/21, Savage, 850K) runs similar stories.

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) editorializes that the ruling "is a win for corporate wrongdoers. It stretches the Constitution's guarantee of due process in a way that will make it easier for companies that act reprehensibly to sidestep serious punishments." It also "provides unsettling new evidence that the court is more concerned about -- and more willing to protect -- the powerful than the powerless."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) writes in an editorial, "The Supreme Court dealt another blow against runaway tort damages," and "maybe next time the Justices will go even further and provide some clearer guidance to lower courts." The Journal adds, "In any case, inflicting gigantic damages in civil cases without standards to guide either judges or juries are a real problem, despite what Justices Thomas and Scalia seem to believe. And in ruling that standards have to be applied in how these cases are argued -- and not only in the number that is finally arrived at -- the Court may have hit upon an important area for reform. But thanks to the Court's willingness to split too many differences, Philip Morris can't exhale just yet."

Five Indicted In Georgia On Health Care Billing Fraud Charges. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (2/20) reported, "A federal grand jury handed down two separate health-care fraud indictments today, charging a total of five health-care providers with fraudulently billing approximately $6 million, principally for a back pain procedure. According to the U.S. Attorney's office, Howard Berkowitz, 59, of Atlanta; Arthur Hargraves, 66, of Douglasville; and Daniel Puffenberger, 51, of Kissimmee, Fla., were each charged with five counts of health care fraud that they allegedly committed as owners of the Associated Spinal Care Network in Douglasville. … In another indictment, William Stearns, 45, of Marietta, Georgia, and Steven Levine, 50, of Roswell, were charged with health-care fraud and other violations that they allegedly committed as owners of the Comprehensive Care Medical Group in Marietta." The Chronicle noted, "The cases are being investigated by the FBI."

Doctors, Clinic Administrators Indicted In California Medicare Fraud Scam. The Los Angeles Times (2/15, Hanley, 850K) reported, "Nine doctors, six healthcare administrators and three associates were indicted…in a scam in which doughnuts, candy and other gifts were used to lure elderly and mentally ill patients into more than $12 million worth of unnecessary respiratory treatments that were fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal officials said. … The indictment alleges that doctors paid kickbacks to board-and-care administrators and other associates known as 'cappers' to gain access to residents, then ordered respiratory treatment for those residents regardless of whether they were suffering from such conditions. Therapists were paid to treat the residents, who were enticed with sodas, candy and doughnuts, authorities say."

The Orange County Register (2/15, Bernhard) reported, "Administrators at the facilities were typically paid $100 per resident they referred to the recruiter, federal prosecutors said. … All 18 defendants are expected to be arraigned March 19 in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. The defendants face a maximum 10-year federal prison sentence for each health care fraud count, 20 years for each money laundering count and five years for each conspiracy count. The investigation was conducted by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the IRS."

Gonzales Announces New Program To Protect Religious Freedom. The AP (2/21, French) reports from Nashville, TN, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Southern Baptists on Tuesday the Department of Justice is launching a new program to protect Americans from religious discrimination." The AP continues, "Gonzales said the First Freedom Project would increase education about religious discrimination by holding a series of training seminars throughout the country over coming months. … He also plans to create a Religious Freedom Task Force, which will review policies and religious discrimination cases. He said he doesn't yet know how much the program will cost. … 'One of our most cherished freedoms ... is our religious freedom,' he told leaders of the Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant denomination, in Nashville. 'It is a fundamental part of our nation's history.'" The AP adds, "The first training seminar will be held in Kansas City, Mo., in March, followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., in April and Seattle, Wash., in May. Other dates and locations will be announced later. … As part of the new program, the Justice Department is also launching a Web site http://www.firstfreedom.gov, with information on enforcement and how to file a religious discrimination complaint." The AP notes, "On Tuesday the Justice Department also released its report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom, which highlights the number of religious discrimination cases reviewed or investigated by the Department of Justice for fiscal years 2001-06 compared to 1995-2000. … Gonzales said the report shows the Department of Justice has looked into more religious discrimination cases under the Bush administration."

The Nashville Tennessean (2/21, Wadhwani) reports, "Saying the government has not always paid enough attention to religious discrimination, the country's top law enforcement official picked a gathering of Southern Baptist leaders in Nashville on Tuesday to announce a renewed push to protect religious freedoms." The Tennessean continues, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the establishment of a new Religious Freedom Task Force and stepped up enforcement efforts. … The Department of Justice's 'First Freedom Project' will review religious discrimination complaints, hold seminars to educate religious leaders about how to file complaints and launch a Web site with information on religious liberty laws, Gonzales said. … Local civil libertarians greeted the announcement with skepticism. If the First Freedom Project was meant to protect the religious freedoms of all Americans, why was it announced only to a room full of Southern Baptists, asked Hedy Weinberg, executive director of the Tennessee branch of the American Civil Liberties Union. … 'Why was just one particular religious community there?' she said. 'Religious freedom is a right all of us hold dear ... You'd think you'd want the rainbow of religious beliefs represented.'" The Tennessean adds, "Gonzales told reporters that he chose a meeting of the nation's largest Protestant denomination because, 'this is a group that's very interested in religious freedom.' … The gathering is a 'receptive audience that would appreciate' his message, he said."

Judge Schedules Thursday Hearing On Seale Motion To Dismiss. The AP (2/21, Elliott) reports, "A federal judge will hear arguments Thursday in reputed Ku Klux Klansman James Ford Seale's motion to dismiss kidnapping charges against him in the 1964 slayings of two black men. U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate scheduled the hearing for 8:30 a.m. at the federal courthouse in Jackson." The AP notes, "Seale and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards were arrested in 1964. But the FBI -- consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared from Neshoba County that summer -- turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges."

Two California Prison Guards Charged With 2002 Beating, Cover-Up. The Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise (2/21, Austin) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted two officers at the men's prison in Chino on Tuesday on accusations they hurled two shackled inmates to the ground and filed a false report to cover up the incident almost five years ago." The P-E continues, "Officer Robert McGowan, 37, of Apple Valley, and Sgt. Thomas Ramos, 50, of Montclair, were named in a three-count indictment stemming from a May 2002 incident that left two inmates with minor injuries. … Attorneys for the Department of Justice allege McGowan pulled two shackled inmates from a van and allowed them to fall to the ground after an altercation between the inmates and officers. Because of the shackles, the inmates were unable to protect themselves from the fall." The P-E adds, "Two weeks later, according to the attorneys, Ramos filed a false report to his boss. He claimed one of the inmates merely slipped even though he had been told that McGowan assaulted the shackled prisoner, charged the U.S. attorneys. … McGowan faces 20 years in prison on two counts of deprivation of rights under color of law, and Ramos faces 10 years on one count of obstruction of justice if convicted." The P-E notes, "Though nearly five years passed before Tuesday's indictment, the incident created a legislative stir in 2003 amid concerns of prisoner abuse, coverups by guards and dysfunction in the department's internal affairs investigative system. … The California Inspector General ordered the corrections department to hand over its files on the case to the Justice Department, said Bill Sessa, a spokesman for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. … McGowan and Ramos are scheduled for arraignment in March, said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office. … These kinds of cases are rare because it's necessary to prove the officer intended to violate the inmate's civil rights, Mrozek said. … 'The constitutionally protected rights of every citizen is something we take very seriously,' said Mrozek. 'You have the right to be free from assault -- even in prison.'"

DOJ Asked To Intervene In New Jersey Beach Access Dispute. The Asbury Park (NJ) Press (2/21, Williams) reports, "Long Branch (NJ) is waiting to hear from the state Department of Environmental Protection on its boardwalk improvement project." The Press continues, "A senior citizen from Ocean Boulevard is appealing to the U.S. Department of Justice to enforce requirements of the Americans with Disabilities Act in connection with oceanfront beach access. … Austin Gelzer, 80, had come before the City Council Jan. 23 to ask for help with beach access, and although officials said they would study the issue, they made no promises. … So Gelzer returned Feb. 13, determined to go to the Justice Department after having completed a complaint form that will go before the Civil Rights Division." The Press adds, "Gelzer is filing the complaint, he said, 'in the name of the disabled residents of Long Branch who have been denied access to the beach and public restrooms, and to some degree, sufficient parking facilities.' … Gelzer said the city was required, beginning in January 1995, to provide such accommodations. … On July 28, 2005, Gelzer met with City Business Administrator Howard Woolley Jr. and presented him with a petition signed by 150 people, protesting the lack of beach access. … Woolley said then the city could not afford to make improvements without the infusion of some $12 million promised by K. Hovnanian, the proposed developer of Beachfront South. … Mayor Adam Schneider has said the city will improve the steep access staircase, which is an annual necessity, but noted a sweeping boardwalk rebuilding program is set to begin within the next 12 months. … Schneider said even if the Justice Department ruled in Gelzer's favor, the city still would not be able to design and engineer a new ramp, get it approved by the DEP, and installed by Memorial Day."

Pro-Life Activists Highlight Survival Of Premature Baby. ABC World News (2/20, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on the delayed release from the hospital of premature baby Amillia Taylor, "born last October, after just 21 weeks and 6 days in the womb. That, we believe, is a shorter period of gestation than any other infant that has ever survived. The fact that she has survived and grown to more than four pounds is about to go home is a miracle, yes. But a miracle that may have an affect over the debate over abortion." ABC (Harris) added, "Until now, the story of Amillia Taylor was a medical and human interest story. But today, it became a political story, as well." Despite the "fact that she's had some respiratory and digestive problems, her doctor says Amillia's prognosis is excellent." For "anti-abortion activists Amillia is a national poster child today they promised to hold her up as an example in future debates over restricting abortion. Only one state, North Carolina, explicitly prohibits aborting a fetus at the stage Amillia was born. Twelve states permit abortion at that point. Twenty-three leave it to a doctor to decide whether the fetus is viable and in 14 state there's are no laws on the books that would prevent such an abortion." Tony Perkins, Family Research Council: "As we see, with the advancement of medical technology, we have children surviving outside the womb younger and younger. And it really brings into focus how valuable and how precious this human life really is." Harris: "Bioethicists we spoke with today argue that Amillia is a miracle baby, and that it's unwise to change public policy based on miracles."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 12, :25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported the story without playing up any political angle, noting, "Doctors say she is the earliest born preemie ever to survive. She'll be staying in the hospital a bit longer. Amelia Taylor was born in October at just under 22 weeks. She weighed less than 10 ounces, smaller than a can of soda. She's now four and a half pounds."

Dallas Settles Jail Mistreatment Suit. The AP (2/21, Curry) reports from Dallas, "County officials approved a nearly $1 million settlement Tuesday with the families of three mentally ill inmates who were denied medication while in the country's seventh-largest detention complex." The AP continues, "Just over half of the award went to James Mims, a Dallas County jail inmate whose psychiatric medications were withheld for two months in 2004, his attorney David Finn said. Mims also nearly died when water was shut off in his cell for two weeks. … 'They could just not afford to have this case go before a jury'" Finn said. … Commissioners approved the $950,000 agreement without discussion." The AP adds, "The federal civil rights lawsuit was filed in December 2004 on behalf of inmates Mims, Kennedy Nickerson and Clarence Lee Grant Jr., who died in custody. … Grant, who had paranoid schizophrenia, was found dead in his cell after not receiving medicine for five days in 2003, according to court records. An autopsy showed he died from complications of diabetes, pneumonia and other ailments. … Nickerson, who also has paranoid schizophrenia, was released from jail in 2003 without medication. A few days later he was found on the street dehydrated, suffering from fever and seizures, court records show. … The U.S. Department of Justice told the county in December that the jail violates inmates' rights by failing to provide adequate medical and mental health care, and warned that a lawsuit could be filed if the problems weren't fixed."

Judge Declares Schwarzenegger's Prisoner Transfers Illegal. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Warren, 850K) reports, "A Superior Court judge ruled today that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger acted illegally by declaring an emergency in California's overcrowded prisons and transferring inmates to other states. The ruling by Judge Gail Ohanesian says the governor violated the Emergency Services Act and the state constitution, and that contracts sending prisoners to lockups in Tennessee and Arizona are illegal." The judge's order "is stayed for 10 days, giving the state time to file an appeal." Ohanesian's ruling "is a major setback for Schwarzenegger as he grapples with an escalating crisis in the state's jam-packed prisons."

Writer Hopes Next Generation Makes Greater Racial Strides. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/21, 11A), Bruce Kluger, a contributing editor for Parenting magazine, writes, "(A)s we celebrate Black History Month, I wonder: What kind of responsibility do we parents have in educating our children about the sad legacy of racism that has run through our nation's life like a persistent electrical current? Do we bequeath that shame to our kids out of a sense of obligation, charging them with the task of carrying the long, hard fight of our troubled heritage into a new era? Or do we quietly give thanks for their blissful naiveté — their lucky late-century birth — and hope that the deeper sense of fairness that is already evident in their new generation may take root in America's future? Do we leave well enough alone?" Kluger continues, "To be sure, our country is experiencing a transformation that would have been unimaginable half a century ago. … Our last two secretaries of State have been African-American (likewise, both 2007 Super Bowl head coaches); our most talked-about presidential candidate is black; people of color populate executive suites and statehouses across the country in increasing numbers. And the only conversation about race that seems to interest Major League Baseball anymore is the one about the pennant. … Yet just because America's more notorious racial injustices are thankfully behind us — the segregated lunch counters, the unconscionable lynchings, the ignominious Jim Crow laws — thick capillaries of discrimination continue to pulse beneath our national skin. These lingering vestiges of that old-time racism are, in many ways, just as insidious as those we thought we'd thrown off with the great civil rights acts of the '60s, if only because they are more cleverly cloaked from view." Kluger adds, "Blacks continue to be shut out of polling places because of dubious technicalities. Families of color continue to carry a disproportionate share of our country's worst afflictions — from poverty and unemployment to teen pregnancy — at national rates that have consistently remained two to three times that of whites for the past 20 years. Minority youth continue to be isolated, not embraced, by our education system, despite the efforts of No Child Left Behind. And in November, another unarmed black man was killed in a hail of police bullets, just a subway ride from where my daughters go to school. It was a flashback to the bad old days. … This, to me, is what Black History Month is really about — a time to step back and measure our growth as a nation against the work that remains to be done. … We haven't yet reached Martin Luther King's mountaintop in America. But I have to believe that our children may one day take us there."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Orders Mittal To Sell Maryland Steel Mill.

The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Huslin) reports, "The Justice Department yesterday ordered international steel conglomerate Arcelor Mittal to sell off the venerable Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore, to preserve competition in the eastern U.S. tin mill market." The Post continues, "The divestiture of the 116-year-old plant, which in its heyday was the world's largest steelmaker, is not expected to have an immediate impact on its workforce or operations, union officials said. The plant once employed 30,000 people at the mill and nearby shipyards, and produced millions of tons of steel for guns, airplanes and warships during World War II." The Post adds, "Justice Department officials ordered the divestiture of Sparrows Point as a condition of Mittal Steel Co.'s $33 billion acquisition of Arcelor SA. The department had originally called for the Dutch company to spin off a Canadian subsidiary that makes tin mill products. But after that deal proved impossible for legal reasons, the Justice Department said Mittal would have to sell one of its other mills -- Sparrows Point or its plant in Weirton, W.Va. … Yesterday, the department decided it should be Sparrows Point, which manufactures rolled steel sheets primarily used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products. Unlike Weirton, Sparrows Point produces the steel slabs used to manufacture tin mill products and would not have to develop new supply sources for the material if Mittal sold it, Justice Department officials said. … 'With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division."

The AP (2/21, Dishneau) reports, "The proposed consent decree would allow Chicago-based Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, used primarily for food and aerosol cans." The AP adds, "Chicago Heights, Ill.-based Esmark Inc. said it might consider a joint venture to buy Sparrows Point if the Weirton mill is unavailable, and industry experts said a number of German, Indian and Russian companies are shopping for North American steel mills." The AP notes, "The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 production workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal. … The Justice Department said in a statement that a sale of the profitable Sparrows Point plant, with its deep-water port access, diversified equipment and production capacity of 500,000 tons of tin-plated products annually, would 'most reliably remedy the anticompetitive effects' of Mittal's merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor. … Justice officials initially ordered Mittal to try to sell another mill, Dofasco Inc. of Canada. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany. That left either Sparrows Point or the former Weirton Steel Corp. in Weirton, W.Va., Mittal's two U.S. tin-plated steel mills."

The Baltimore Sun (2/21, Connolly) reports, "For the third time in as many years, Sparrows Point is up for sale. And this time it's a rush job. … The Justice Department wants the sprawling Baltimore County steel plant to be under new ownership within 90 days to make sure that its current boss, Mittal Steel Co. NV, does not have too much control over the market for tin plate used to make cans for foods, aerosol sprays, paints and other products." The Sun adds, "Netherlands-based Mittal, which is merging with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA in a $33 billion deal to create the world's largest steelmaker, had wanted to sell its Weirton W.Va., plant instead. … Selling Sparrows Point, an integrated manufacturer that can make steel from scratch, rather than the Weirton plant 'most reliably' addresses antitrust concerns, Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said Tuesday in a statement announcing the order. … 'Sparrows Point is a profitable and diversi fied facility' and 'unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply for this critical input upon its separation from Mittal Steel,' the Justice Department said. … Mittal cannot appeal the order but could be granted up to 60 more days to find a buyer, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. The Justice Department would have to sign off on any deal."

AFP (2/21) reports, "The US government last August had approved Mittal's acquisition of Arcelor on the basis that Arcelor divested a Canadian company it owned called Dofasco Inc. … However, Arcelor was unable to divest the Canadian group due to ownership hurdles, and the Justice Department has now opted to require Arcelor to divest the Baltimore steel mill instead to satisfy US merger concerns."

Mill Expected To Draw Interested Potential Buyers. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A4, Glader) reports, "Mittal Steel Co., ordered by the Justice Department to sell a plant in Maryland, is expected to draw bids from major companies in China, Russia and India as the number of plants for sale is dwindling." The Journal continues, "The Sparrows Point plant, near Baltimore, is more accessible than inland operations for imports of raw materials and exports of steel. It can produce about 3.9 billion tons of steel a year, including 500,000 tons of tin plate used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products, and it could fetch upwards of $1 billion. … Sparrows Point 'has not been consistently profitable,' says New York-based steel analyst Chuck Bradford of Bradford Research/Soleil. 'But at least it is on the water, so it can bring in raw materials at a reasonable price.'" The Journal notes, "Bidders could include JSW Steel Ltd. or Ispat Industries Ltd., both based in India, or Russia's Evraz Group or OAO Severstal Group, both of which already own U.S. operations. China's Wuhan Steel Corp. and Anshan Iron & Steel Group Corp. also have a good deal of cash and are considering expanding. … Other potential bidders are Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG, which was unsuccessful in buying Canada's Dofasco Inc., and Brazil's Cia. Siderurgica Nacional, which failed in its attempt to buy Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp."

Fate Of Weirton Mill Remains Uncertain. The Wheeling Intelligencer (2/21, Hanson) reports, "Mark Glyptis is keeping a positive attitude despite a big letdown Tuesday for his Independent Steelworkers. … Glyptis, president of the union which represents workers at Mittal's Weirton facility, said his union members are disappointed the Justice Department did not choose Weirton to be sold, as the tin mill has not benefited from being owned by Mittal Steel. … However, Mittal may still decide to sell Weirton, he noted. … 'We need to meet with senior officials with Mittal Steel to determine what that means to us and to Weirton,' Glyptis said of Mittal selling Sparrows Point." The Intelligencer adds, "Chicago-based Esmark Steel already has a nonbinding agreement with Mittal to purchase Weirton. However, before any deal is finalized, Esmark must have the ISU's blessing to purchase the Weirton mill. A former International Steel Group executive, Mitchell Hecht, also wants to purchase Weirton. … Meanwhile, according to the Associated Press, Esmark said it may consider a joint venture to buy Sparrow's Point if the Weirton Mill is unavailable. … Esmark President Craig Bouchard said his company would prefer to buy Weirton, but he wouldn't rule out the possibility of acquiring Sparrows Point."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/21, Mortimer) reports, "Glyptis said he will meet with senior Mittal Steel exectives soon, and said he would try to ascertain their plans for Weirton. 'I don't know what their plans are,' he said. 'They can still divest Weirton.'" The Tribune-Review adds, "Glyptis said he volunteered to have Weirton sold because the mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's stewardship. 'We wanted to be sold because we feel our assets could be utilized at a higher rate,' he said. … The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal. … 'The decision is unfortunate. It makes Mittal not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future,' David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee, said in a statement."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/21, Boselovic) reports, "Despite the decision, which seeks to alleviate antitrust concerns raised by the merger of Arcelor and Mittal, the world's two largest steel producers, Esmark Chairman and Chief Executive Officer James P. Bouchard said he remains interested in purchasing some of Weirton's operations as well as the Sparrows Point, Md., plant that Arcelor Mittal was ordered to sell. … Mr. Bouchard was meeting at Weirton with representatives of that plant's Independent Steelworkers Union and the United Steelworkers union, which represents Wheeling-Pitt workers, when they learned of the decision." The Post-Gazette adds, "Mittal's acquisition of No. 2 Arcelor has raised concerns about a tightly controlled market for tin-coated sheet steel used in food cans and other contains. Even before the merger, Mittal and another steelmaker accounted for more than 74 percent of tin mill product sales in the eastern United States, Justice Department officials said. The other producer is U.S. Steel. … Sparrows Point, formerly operated by Bethlehem Steel, can produce more than 500,000 tons of tin product annually."

The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Miller) reports, "A ruling Justice Department antitrust authorities disclosed today promises to complicate Chicago-based Esmark Inc.'s expansion effort." The Tribune continues, "The fast-growing steel-distribution company has been expanding into steel production and it is currently in the process of acquiring a West Virginia steel maker known as Wheeling-Pitttsburgh Corp., through a 'reverse merger' that will turn closely held Esmark into a publicly traded company. … In addition to Wheeling-Pitt, Esmark has been making overtures to acquire Weirton Steel, based in Weirton, West Virginia." The Tribune notes, "Weirton has been thought to be potentially available because of Justice Department concerns linked to the pending mega-merger between the world's two biggest steel makers, Arcelor S.A. of Belgium and Netherlands-based Mittal Steel. … In August, the Justice Department -- which routinely reviews corporate mergers to see if they would damage marketplace competition -- agreed that it sign off on the Arcelor-Mittal combination if Mittal agreed to divest a steel mill that supplied certain products to the eastern U.S. … Under that so-called 'consent decree,' the Justice Department had the right to select for divestiture either Mittal's Weirton mill or Mittal's Sparrow's Point plant near Baltimore. … Most observers had figured that Weirton would be the plant to be jettisoned; that's why Esmark had been publicly expressing interest and holding talks with the plant's union management. … Today, however, the department's antitrust division unexpectedly said Mittal must shed the Sparrow's Point, Md. operation."

Fate Of Radio Merger Hinges On Market Definitions. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, B4, Schatz, Wilke) reports, "Federal approval of the proposed $11.4 billion merger of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. will hinge on how regulators define the companies' market." The Journal continues, "If Justice Department antitrust enforcers find a distinct market for satellite radio, the deal could be dead, because it would create a monopoly. But if the market instead includes the traditional radio industry, iPods and Internet radio, as the companies argue, the deal could win approval, though not without conditions." The Journal adds, "In a preview of the battle that will play out in Washington in months to come, consumer advocates and some lawmakers said yesterday that the deal will stifle competition and should be stopped. Sirius and XM countered that they need the deal to compete with other forms of audio entertainment. They say they face stiff competition from AM and FM radio, with 280 million listeners, as well as the hot new digital-music market, with more than 100 million iPods already sold. They even cite rising competition from music-enabled mobile phones and Internet radio. … History doesn't offer much encouragement for this argument. A similar merger between two satellite-television companies -- Hughes Electronics Corp. and EchoStar Communications Corp. -- was shot down in 2002. At the time, the TV companies argued that the $18 billion deal was needed to combine efforts to fight off strong competition from cable companies. But the Federal Communications Commission rejected the deal even before the Justice Department could act, saying it raised the risk of "immediate and substantial" harm to consumers through higher prices and less competition, particularly in rural areas that aren't served by cable companies. … In contrast, XM and Sirius are arguing, satellite radio competes with all forms of audio entertainment. In meetings with the regulators and on Capitol Hill, the companies will press this sweeping market definition. The broader the market, the more likely a deal will be approved: When Coca-Cola Co. sought to buy Dr Pepper in the mid-1980s, its experts argued in court that their market should include not just soft drinks but all potable liquids sold in North America, including water. The approach was dubbed the 'Lake Erie defense.' (The deal was opposed by regulators and eventually scotched.)"

The Washington Post (2/21, D3, Babington, Birnbaum) reports, "Winning approval for a proposed merger of the nation's two satellite-radio companies turns on whether regulators buy their argument that iPods, Internet radio and other new technologies have expanded so dramatically that a monopoly would not harm consumers' choices or purses." The Post continues, "It may be a difficult argument to win, but XM Satellite Holdings and Sirius Satellite Radio's officers say it's worth the gamble and have assembled an expensive and experienced team of lobbyists to aid them in the fight. Alone, the companies have suffered heavy losses and spent heavily on recruiting personalities such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey and on marketing to compete against each other." The Post adds, "Now, New York-based Sirius and XM of the District are lining up some of the best-known and highest-paid lawyers and lobbyists, while competitors and consumer groups vow to fight back. The biggest potential roadblock for the merger is a 1997 Federal Communications Commission declaration that a single owner may not control the subscriber-only satellite radio business. … But the advance of technologies such as iPods and other MP3 players, music-playing cellphones and land-based radio stations with digital broadcasts offer so much music, news and talk that the competitive climate is radically different and the FCC should waive the 1997 rule, Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin said in a conference call yesterday. 'Consumers today have a significantly broader range of audio entertainment options from which to choose,' he said. … All those new devices, however, are not directly analogous to satellite radio, and Karmazin's plea is a tough sell, said Chad Bartley, an analyst for Pacific Crest Securities. XM and Sirius provide 'the only paid-radio service out there,' he said, and regulators may be loath to turn them into a monopoly. He rated the chances for merger approval at 'less than 50-50.'"

The Financial Times (2/21, Chaffin) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio yesterday portrayed themselves as two small players in an expanding and highly competitive consumer audio market as they sought to win over regulators for their planned merger." The Times continues, "In a conference call with investors, executives from the companies argued that technology had created an array of new competitors for their services beyond traditional free radio, including portable music devices, mobile phones capable of playing music, internet radio services, personal computers and others. … 'Competition in this market is robust, and we're seeing new entrants on a regular basis as disruptive technologies continue to emerge,' said Gary Parsons, chairman of XM, adding that satellite radio was still 'a small player by comparison'." The Times adds, "Antitrust concerns have shaped up as the biggest hurdle to an $11.4bn deal, not including debt, that would unite the two companies. When they were awarded broadcast licences a decade ago, the Federal Communications Commission mandated that neither company could own both satellite licences. … Following the deal's announcement on Monday, Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, reminded the companies that the hurdle for approval would be 'high' given that provision."

Market Watch (2/21, Schroeder, Wilkerson) reports, "A month ago, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said a tie-up between satellite radio companies XM and Sirius wouldn't get past his agency. On Monday, the chiefs of those companies decided to challenge that vow." Market Watch continues, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. said Monday they were taking their proposed marriage to stockholders and regulators to get an OK for a combination worth $13 billion and the ears of 14 million paid subscribers. … It's a bold challenge: On Jan. 17, FCC chief Kevin Martin had said agency rules would prohibit 'one entity owning both of those [satellite] licenses.' … After the merger was announced, Martin issued a strongly worded statement reiterating his concerns. … 'The hurdle here ... would be high as the commission originally prohibited one company from holding the only two satellite radio licenses,' he said. 'The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.'" Market Watch notes, "The Sirius-XM combination would follow directly on the heels of the hotly debated merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth. The five-member commission of the FCC wrangled for nine months over whether to approve that deal, suggesting a similar combination of two big firms would have to endure the same withering scrutiny. … In AT&T's case, though, the company had the support of Martin, a Republican close to the White House. Sirius and XM not only face skepticism from the FCC chairman but probably from the panel's two Democrats, each of whom has been critical of media consolidation. The Democratic takeover of Congress probably doesn't help the cause of the satellite merger partners."

CNET News (2/21, Mills) reports, "Executives at Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio seem to think they have a better chance at turning a profit as one giant company than as bare-knuckled competitors." CNET continues, "The companies, struggling to reach profitability, announced Monday that they agreed to an all-stock "merger of equals," with shareholders of each company owning 50 percent of the combined company. XM shareholders would receive 4.6 shares of Sirius for each of their XM shares, setting the value of XM at about $5 billion. Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons would both retain their titles, but for the combined company. … But getting federal regulators to sign off on the merger won't be easy, and perhaps in an effort to make walking away from the deal easier, the companies have not said what the name of the combined entity would be or where it would be located. The companies expect the transaction to be completed by the end of this year. There are plenty of questions about how this will play out in the coming months:" CNET notes, "The U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission must grant approval, posing a significant challenge. Because Sirius and XM are the only two satellite radio providers operating in the country, their merger would effectively create a monopoly. Federal legislation bars both satellite radio licenses from being owned by the same company to guard against high prices and other negative effects on consumers. … The defense (of the merger) will likely hinge on the definition of 'competition in the digital audio marketplace.' In announcing their merger plans, Sirius and XM said they faced competition from free "over-the-air" AM and FM radio, as well as from iPods and mobile-phone streaming, HD radio, Internet radio and next-generation wireless technologies. Complicating the defense could be the lawsuit record labels have filed against XM alleging that devices that allow people to capture music from XM's broadcasts and turn them into MP3 files for storing and replaying, like the Pioneer Inno, infringe on copyright."

FCC Seen As Tougher Hurdle Than DOJ. The AP (2/21, Dunbar) reports, "When the Federal Communications Commission auctioned off two exclusive licenses to create the satellite radio industry 10 years ago, it did not mince words on whether the competing providers could merge. … The agency said that one licensee will 'not be permitted to acquire control' of the other. The clause was inserted to ensure 'sufficient continuing competition' in the new business, it said. … But when dealing with the FCC, one should never say never. … 'The FCC can undo anything it does,' said

Andrew Schwartzman, president and CEO of the Media Access Project, a public interest law firm in Washington. 'However, when you change course, you need a good reason to do it.'" The AP adds, "The companies will have to gain approval from the Justice Department as well as the FCC. Justice typically goes first in satellite mergers. If it blocks the deal, it's game over. But Schwartzman said that is unlikely to happen. … 'My guess is this Justice Department will be willing to accept any plausible argument that is presented to it,' he said. 'The FCC is a much tougher case.'" The AP notes, "The Justice Department looks at how mergers affect competition. The companies will argue that since the industry was created in 1997, times have changed, and so has the market. It's no longer radio, it's 'audio entertainment,' which includes terrestrial radio, digital 'high-definition' radio that offers better sound and more stations, Internet stations and even Apple iPods. … The FCC's review is different. The airwaves are owned by the public. Therefore the law requires that any transfers of control of licenses be done only if it serves the 'public interest, convenience and necessity.'"

New Climate Gives Hope For Approval. The New York Times (2/21, Sorkin) reports, "Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, made a lot of phone calls seeking advice before he entered into a merger deal with XM Satellite Radio on Monday. … Maybe he should have called Charles W. Ergen, the founder and chairman of EchoStar Communications." The Times continues, "Mr. Ergen could have given Mr. Karmazin an earful about his failed effort to merge EchoStar with DirecTV four years ago, a deal that seems eerily similar to the one Sirius and XM have proposed. … Will the government see things differently this time? … Michael K. Powell, the former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission who blocked the EchoStar-DirecTV deal, is not so sure. … 'I do think it could get through, but I don't think it's going to be an easy one,' he said. 'It's going to be incumbent on the companies to demonstrate that the analysis in EchoStar-DirecTV is different.'" The Times adds, "In opposing that deal, regulators — both from the F.C.C. and the Justice Department — argued the merger would create a monopoly. EchoStar and DirecTV, on the other hand, argued that the market should be defined more broadly than simply satellite television and should encompass cable television operators and telephone companies providing video over phone lines. … When Sirius and XM announced their merger on Monday, they made a similar argument — that their market is much bigger than just satellite radio. … 'In addition to existing competition from free "over-the-air" AM and FM radio as well as iPods and mobile phone streaming, satellite radio will face new challenges from the rapid growth of HD Radio, Internet radio and next generation wireless technologies,' the companies said. … There is no question that times have clearly changed: a decade ago, the argument for a Sirius-XM merger would have never had a chance." The Times notes, "The Justice Department's surprising approval of Whirlpool's acquisition of Maytag — a deal that created the nation's largest manufacturer of appliances with more than 50 percent market share — has encouraged others to proceed with deals that might have seemed to pose regulatory problems. … But Sirius and XM should not necessarily take solace in the shifting attitude in Washington and the Whirlpool decision, some antitrust experts suggest, because the deal's fate may be decided by the F.C.C., which issued two sets of satellite spectrum to Sirius and XM in order to create competition."

USA Today (2/21) reports, "Wall Street sure likes the signals that Sirius and XM Satellite Radio are beaming about their merger plans." USA continues, "XM shares soared 10.2% to $15.41 and Sirius was up about 6% to $3.92 on Tuesday, the first day of trading after the companies announced their deal to create a single — and still unnamed — satellite radio power to be run by Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin. … Despite the boost, the prices reflect some wariness among investors about whether the merger will actually take place. The deal must be approved by each company's shareholders, as well as by antitrust officials. And the Federal Communications Commission will have to agree to change a merger ban that is part of the original agreement when the companies were formed."

Radio Heads Seen As Temperamental Opposites. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Ahrens) reports, "In the radio industry, Sirius Satellite Radio chief executive Mel Karmazin is like Bono or Prince or Charo: One name is sufficient. Say 'Mel,' and everyone knows who you're talking about. … The same cannot be said of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Chairman Gary M. Parsons. That's why some say, if the proposed merger between the two satellite companies is approved by regulators, the two executives may work well together." The Post continues, "Under the proposed merger, Karmazin would be the chief executive of the combined company, with Parsons chairing the board. There is no role in the new company for current XM chief executive Hugh Panero, whose duties have diminished since the XM board appointed director Nate Davis as president and chief operating officer in July. … Karmazin and Parsons are opposite in temperament and style, said Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio, an industry trade paper. Karmazin can be electric; Parsons is more laid-back."

More Commentary. The Financial Times (2/21) editorializes, "Howard Stern, the shock jock, may be the self-styled King of all Media, but his employer, Sirius, was certainly not talking world domination in its proposed merger with XM. For the satellite radio deal, which will create a company with a $13bn enterprise value, hinges more than most on regulatory approval. Expect a lot of emphasis on underserved communities and consumer choice and the vast array of alternatives for listeners. There cannot be many media deals that generate a presentation that includes a slide highlighting how many US vehicle registrations there are." The Times continues, "The companies have a point. Competition from AM/FM radio as well as new services, from iPods to streaming music for mobile phones, are real challenges for satellite radio. But Sirius and XM do not just have to make the pure antitrust case, they also have to convince the Federal Communications Commission that the public interest is best served by changing the rules governing their operating licences. It is a gamble, but US business has pulled off far greater ones. … Having said that, this will be a lobbying bunfight. The broadcasters have already weighed in and the market is taking a cautious view: XM's shares traded up strongly, but not as high as would be implied by the sweet 22 per cent premium tacked on to the terms of what was presented as a merger of equals." The Times concludes, "The companies gave little detail yesterday, bar a range of values for the synergies that, at its higher level, would represent more than the market capitalisations of either company. That looks punchy given the time it may take to realise the benefits. But the economic rationale for merging is still compelling. If only Mr Stern's gift of the gab could be brought to bear in persuading the FCC into thinking the same."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) editorializes, "As the Federal Communications Commission ponders the merits of allowing satellite radio companies Sirius and XM to combine, let's hope the ghost of another proposed merger haunts the proceedings. In 2002 the FCC blocked satellite television rivals EchoStar and DirecTV from joining forces on the grounds that allowing the merger would decrease competition and lead to higher prices. Michael Powell, the FCC chairman at the time, said the deal would create a satellite monopoly. In the event, regulatory intervention, based on an overly narrow definition of the market, has only led to unfulfilled promise in satellite broadband." On news of the radio deal, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin remarked that the regulatory hurdles 'would be high.' If so, the agency might want to write more up-to-date regulations. The current 'digital audio radio service' rules date to the late 1980s, before high definition radio, iPods, Pandora.com, music file-sharing and other options existed. The media landscape has changed a bit since The Police split up."

SCOTUS Overturns $79 Million Antitrust Judgment Against Weyerhaeuser. The AP (2/21, Woodward) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court threw out a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser Co. on Tuesday, but the forest products giant could face a new trial on antitrust claims from a defunct sawmill." The AP continues, "Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. of Vancouver, Wash. - which went out of business in 2001 - convinced an Oregon jury that Weyerhaeuser paid too much for alder logs it didn't need, with the goal of driving competitors out of business. … Under federal antitrust law, the jury's award was tripled to $79 million." The AP adds, "Supreme Court justices overturned that 2003 judgment in a 9-0 ruling Tuesday, saying Ross-Simmons must meet a stricter legal standard than the trial court originally allowed. … Writing for the court, Justice Clarence Thomas said Ross-Simmons should have been required to prove that its competitor had a dangerous probability of recouping the losses it incurred in bidding up prices. … The failure to satisfy that standard 'cannot support the jury's verdict,' Thomas wrote." The AP notes, "Weyerhaeuser applauded Tuesday's decision. … 'The Court's unanimous ruling sets a clear standard that permits companies to bid competitively for raw materials without risk of violating antitrust laws,' Weyerhaeuser Vice President Sandy D. McDade said in a statement. … But Mike Haglund, a Portland, Ore.-based lawyer for Ross-Simmons, said he expects to prevail again if the case eventually returns to U.S. District Court for a new trial. … 'We're going to have to go back and retry it under that new standard,' Haglund said. 'I don't think the result will change - we'll still win. But it is a tougher standard.'" The AP notes, "The Bush administration asked the Supreme Court to take the case, arguing that the San Francisco-based appellate court erred by setting a low and confusing standard that threatened to 'chill pro-competitive conduct by companies that bid aggressively.'"

Bloomberg (2/21, Stohr) reports, "The ruling is a victory for large U.S. companies, giving them more room to bid aggressively for raw materials and other supplies without the risk of violating federal antitrust laws. Dow Chemical Co., Verizon Communications Inc., Coca-Cola Co. and Microsoft Corp. were among the companies that supported Weyerhaeuser at the Supreme Court. … 'There are myriad legitimate reasons -- ranging from benign to affirmatively procompetitive -- why a buyer might bid up input prices,' Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the 9-0 court." Bloomberg adds, "The case centered on a judge's instruction to jurors that they could award damages if Weyerhaeuser bought 'more logs than it needed' and prevented Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. from acquiring logs at a 'fair price.' … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the instruction, rejecting Weyerhaeuser's contention that it was too vague to provide meaningful guidance."

Market Watch (2/21, Anderson) reports, "The decision rejected a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco, that had allowed the lawsuit against Weyerhaeuser to proceed under a broader standard. … 'Predatory pricing and predatory bidding claims are analytically similar,' Justice Thomas wrote, saying the legal theory advanced in lower courts 'cannot support the jury's verdict.'"

Warner Moves Closer To Bid For EMI. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A4, Patrick, Smith) reports, "Warner Music Group Corp. Chief Executive Edgar Bronfman Jr. has taken a step closer to realizing his long-held ambition to buy EMI Group PLC, persuading a small but well-organized group of independent record labels to end their opposition to such a purchase." The Journal continues, "Warner, the fourth-largest music company by revenue, yesterday said it approached EMI about buying the company a month ago, in what would be the fourth attempt in seven years to combine the music companies. EMI, the third-largest music company, confirmed the approach and said it was waiting for a formal offer. … The two companies have felt pressed to combine to cut costs in the face of flagging sales and to achieve sufficient scale to compete with their two much-larger rivals, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG." The Journal adds, "It isn't clear how a Warner bid would be valued. EMI, whose stock has fallen recently after back-to-back profit warnings, has a market capitalization of £1.92 billion ($3.75 billion). Warner's market capitalization is $2.86 billion. … Crucially, Warner has reached an agreement with Impala, a trade group for independent European record labels, to end its opposition to a merger. Legal action by Impala derailed merger negotiations between Warner and EMI last year and threatened to disrupt a potential deal again. While it would be up to the European Commission to rule whether an EMI-Warner merger is anticompetitive, Impala's support makes approval more likely. U.S. antitrust authorities aren't expected to object because EMI doesn't have a strong position in the U.S. … Other hurdles to a deal also appear to be clearing. An antitrust decision on a related case -- the reconsideration of the 2004 merger of Sony's and Bertelsmann's music operations -- is due by summer. If approved, that will also remove one of the last impediments to an EMI takeover."

The Financial Times (2/21, Edgecliffe-Johnson) reports, "Warner Music has struck a truce with independent record labels that could clear the way for the US-listed group to make a $6bn (£3bn) bid for EMI and reset the balance of power in the music industry's negotiations with Apple and other digital distributors." The Times continues, "Warner has secured the support of the music companies' fiercest critic to revive merger talks with EMI, the British company behind Norah Jones and The Beatles. … No formal bid has been made and the terms of any offer are unclear but Warner said Impala, which represents independent music publishers and labels, had agreed to provide full and complete support for a Warner-EMI merger in front of regulators." The Times adds, "Warner has agreed to fund a digital rights licensing platform for independent music labels; to divest certain recorded music assets 'to reinforce the market power of the independent sector'; and to make other, unspecified commitments. … A two-year campaign by Impala led to last year's decision by the European Union's Court of First Instance to refer the 2004 clearance of the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses back to the European Commission. With the Commission expected to announce a second stage to its Sony BMG review within two weeks, Impala said it would not drop its opposition to the Sony BMG deal, or to Universal Music's purchase of BMG Music Publishing."

More Commentary. The Financial Times (2/21, Hill) editorializes, "It is not too late for love between EMI and Warner Music and, however preliminary and imprecise their latest approach, the Americans have sweetened it with a silky skill worthy of Norah Jones herself." The Times continues, "Warner has sought to soothe worries about regulatory approval - still the biggest uncertainty overhanging any deal between the two music groups - by ensuring the support of independent record companies and music publishers that were the deal's biggest opponents. Combined with worsening conditions in the recorded music industry, that should make the European Commission more sympathetic towards a deal this time round. … The timing looks good, too: Warner contacted the British company on January 24, before the second of EMI's two profit warnings, but, by uncanny coincidence, the approach has only now come to light with the shares battered down to levels last seen in the final quarter of 2005." The Times adds, "The recent history of disappointments at EMI makes it difficult to see Warner returning with a bid near 320p - the price on last year's abortive offer, abandoned following a European court decision that threw the Sony BMG deal back into Brussels' merger review process. EMI has also cut costs further since last summer presenting Warner with fewer possible savings. But if the US group is sensible, a bid that splits the difference with yesterday's closing share price and last year's offer would put Eric Nicoli, EMI's embattled chief executive, in an awkward position. … If he were to grab such an offer and the European antitrust authorities later decided to block a merger, then he would have used up his final shred of credibility with investors. On the other hand, if he spurned Warner's advances on the grounds that the regulatory risk remained too high, he might scotch shareholders' best hope of realising decent value from their investment."

FTC Clears Biomet Buyout. The AP (2/21) reports from Warsaw, IN, "Orthopedics maker Biomet Inc. on Tuesday said it received antitrust approval from federal regulators for its proposed $10.9 billion acquisition by a group of private investment firms." The AP continues, "Biomet said the Federal Trade Commission granted early termination of the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … Blackstone Group, Goldman, Sachs & Co., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group agreed to buy Biomet in December for $44 per share." The AP adds, "The deal, which is expected to close by the end of October, still needs the approval of Biomet's shareholders."

EU To Fine Elevator Makers For Operating Price-Fixing Cartel. The Financial Times (2/21, Buck) reports, "ThyssenKrupp, Schindler, Kone and Otis - the world's biggest lift manufacturers - will today be punished and fined by the European Commission for operating a price-fixing cartel." The Times continues, "The European Union antitrust watchdog issued formal charges against the four groups in October2005, and according to several people familiar with the case will hand down its final ruling at a meeting in Brussels tomorrow." The Times adds, "Together, the groups control about two-thirds of the world market for elevators and escalators, with Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, the market leader. … They are accused of operating a cartel in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg between 1998 and 2004. Tobias Buck, Brussels."

EU Gives Antitrust Nod For Freeport-McMoRan To Buy Phelps. The AP (2/21) reports, "EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday cleared Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. to buy Phelps Dodge Corp., a deal that would create the world's largest publicly traded copper company -- and the largest metals and mining company based in North America." The AP continues, "The European Commission said that combining the two U.S.-based companies would not significantly impede competition in Europe, identifying only limited overlaps between the two that would not cause antitrust problems for rivals, suppliers or customers. … The companies announced in November that Freeport-McMoRan would acquire Phelps Dodge for US$25.9 billion (euro20.17 billion) in cash and stock." The AP adds, "The cash portion of the transaction totals US$18 billion (euro14.02 billion), and Freeport-McMoRan said it would issue 137 million shares to Phelps Dodge shareholders. That would give them about 38 percent of the combined company on a fully diluted basis. Freeport-McMoRan's board will also be expanded to include three independent Phelps Dodge directors. … The merged companies will operate under the Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold banner, though businesses operating as Phelps Dodge will continue to do so."

South Korea Fines Nine Petrochemical Firms For Collusion. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Nam) reports, "South Korea's Fair Trade Commission fined nine domestic petrochemical companies a combined 105.1 billion won ($112.2 million) for colluding to fix the prices of petrochemical products for more than 10 years." The Journal continues, "A total of 10 companies, including the country's largest refiner, colluded to coordinate the prices of polypropylene and high-density polyethylene between April 1994 and April 2005, the antitrust agency said in a statement. … 'The collusion has resulted in 1.56 trillion won in damages to consumers,' the commission said." The Journal adds, "The commission said Honam Petrochemical Corp., one of the companies involved in the price collusion, wasn't penalized because of its contribution to the commission investigation. … The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against SK Corp., LG Chem Ltd., Korea Petrochemical Industrial Co., Daelim Industrial Co. and Hyosung Corp."

Nuclear Plant's Safety Margins Eroding, Officials Say. In a 1,600-word story, the Los Angeles Times (2/21, Vartabedian, 850K) reports from the Pantex plant, "[L]ately, outside experts are questioning" whether the facility's "safety margins are eroding. Federal investigators are trying to assess the overall safety of the plant ... amid troubling safety snafus and what employees call an atmosphere of intimidation." DOE "officials acknowledge that the plant has fallen behind schedule on reliability testing of weapons. Long delays have occurred in decommissioning thousands of surplus warheads to satisfy disarmament pacts. They also concede the plant has maintenance problems and has violated safety procedures. But they insist there is no danger of a conventional or nuclear explosion. 'Pantex is safe, no doubt,' said Marty Schoenbauer, the acting chief of [DOE's] nuclear weapons program." Outside experts, "union officials and watchdog groups say ... that safety has regressed since 2000 as the most knowledgeable senior safety experts of the Cold War era retire and the plant's condition deteriorates." The "problems at Pantex came to light in the fall after Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington watchdog group, wrote two letters to Bodman complaining about safety."

Maryland Approves Car Pollution Legislation. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Rein, 690K) reports, "The House of Delegates overwhelmingly approved legislation yesterday that could make Maryland the 12th state to force carmakers to slash emissions thought to cause global warming. Senate leaders predicted approval of a similar bill this week, and Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) has pledged to sign the legislation." The "stricter standards for cars and trucks hitting dealerships in 2010 would put Maryland in the forefront of states seeking to slow climate change, environmentalists said." But "automakers said the requirements would raise prices and reduce choices for consumers -- to make way for more fuel-efficient cars, fewer sport-utility and other large vehicles would be on the market." The 122 to 16 House vote "included Republican support and reflected the power of the state's environmental movement after passage of legislation last year to curb pollution from coal-fired power plants."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Testimony Prompts Biden To Propose Funding For 1,000 New Agents. The Washington Times (2/21, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee that FBI referrals for counterterrorism cases increased a whopping 671 percent between 2001 and 2003 -- and to this day require 'difficult choices in determining how to most effectively use the available agents' -- did not go unheeded." Sen. Joe Biden "has introduced legislation to add 1,000 FBI agents to the bureau's roster, all to focus exclusively on traditional criminal cases. Estimated cost: $160 million per year."

California Border Agents Help DEA, ATF With Pot Seizure. The Casa Grande Valley (CA) Dispatch (2/21) reports, "Border Patrol agents from the Casa Grande station helped in confiscating $3.7 million worth of marijuana over the weekend." The Dispatch continues, "Agents were asked to help a Bureau of Land Management ranger who was pursing two trucks camouflaged with tarps near Stanfield about 6:45 a.m. Sunday. … While agents responded, the ranger reported his vehicle was intentionally struck by one of the trucks." The Dispatch adds, "Agents found both trucks abandoned on Stanfield Road. They found 4,660 pounds of marijuana in the two trucks, as well as a loaded .45 caliber pistol. … One of the trucks was reported stolen in San Diego, Calif., and was turned over to the Arizona Department of Public Safety. … The other truck is being processed for forfeiture by the Border Patrol. The marijuana was turned over to the DEA and the gun was given to ATF. No arrests have been made and no injuries were reported."

Colombian Woman Found Guilty Of Participating In FARC Drug-Smuggling Operation. There are more than 100 media references to the conviction of a Colombian rebel accused in a drug-smuggling scheme, with many media outlets using the AP story. The AP (2/21) reports a Colombian woman "was found guilty Tuesday of participating in an operation to smuggle tons of cocaine to the United States. Authorities say her case showed the main rebel group in Colombia is deeply involved in illegal drugs. Nayibe Rojas, known in the Colombian rebel movement as 'Sonia,' was convicted by a jury of conspiracy to import and-or distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine." The guilty verdict for Rojas "is a victory for the United States and Colombia, which have recently stepped up a campaign to portray the FARC, which is on the U.S. list of 'foreign terrorist organizations' as a drug-trafficking cartel." Media outlets that used the AP story include the New York Times, Houston Chronicle, Denver Post, and Seattle Post Intelligencer.

McClatchy Newspapers (2/20) reported the jury "also convicted two co-defendants, Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo weren't members of FARC, but the prosecutors argued that all three had conspired to send more than 5 tons of cocaine to the United States." The San Jose Mercury News used the McClatchy story.

The Miami Herald (2/21) reports Rojas "was the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, convicted of drug running by a U.S. federal court, although the U.S. and Colombian governments have long alleged that the FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry."

In Mississippi, Former Police Chief Sentenced In Extortion Case. The AP (2/20) reported a federal judge "sentenced Ruleville police Chief Ronald Robinson to 2 1/2 years in prison Tuesday for trying to extort protection money from drug dealers. Robinson agreed to plead guilty to extortion in an October plea deal that wiped out another extortion charge and four counts of attempting to aid in the possession of crack cocaine with the intent to distribute."

The Delta Democrat Times (2/21) reports Robinson "admitted…he obtained a cash payoff of $3,000 to which he was not entitled, in exchange for not pursuing drug and gambling related charges against an individual and for providing protection for an individual that he believed to be distributing crack cocaine." The Democrat Times notes the DEA's involvement in the case.

Jackson (MS) Clarion Ledger (2/20) also reported Robinson's sentencing.

Kentucky Prescription Drug "Kingpin" Gets 20-Year Sentence. The Lexington (KY) Herald-Leader (2/21) reports a Berea man who "was the kingpin of a drug ring was sentenced yesterday to 20 years in federal prison in one of the largest prescription drug investigations in Eastern Kentucky. Danny Clark, 51, was indicted in U.S. District Court in April along with other members of the ring including his brother Richard Clark, Marlene and Rufus Holmes, Samuel Duane Lawson and James Ellis Renner. Clark and others were arrested after a long-term investigation by Rockcastle and Laurel County Sheriff's deputies, London and Richmond police officers, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and the Kentucky State Police." According to the indictment, Clark "was the leader of a drug ring that sold oxycodone and methadone from January 1998 through April 2006 mostly in Madison and Rockcastle counties."

IMMIGRATION:

Increased Border Security Measures Said To Be Reducing Illegal Immigration. Under the headline "Tougher Tactics Deter Migrants At US Border," the New York Times (2/21, McKinley, 1.16M) describes the increase in US border enforcement as experienced by Eduardo Valenzuela, who had been making an illegal journey from Mexico into Colorado for the past decade. "'It's become much more difficult,' Mr. Valenzuela said, echoing the comments of dozens of other migrants." The times continues, "All along the border, there are signs that the measures the Border Patrol and other federal agencies have taken over the last year, from erecting new barriers to posting 6,000 National Guardsmen as armed sentinels, are beginning to slow the flow of illegal immigrants." Though some immigration experts argued that "it was too early to tell if the enforcement efforts had caused a permanent downturn," commanders with the Border Patrol "say they see no explanation for the drop-off across the entire 2,000-mile border other than stiffer enforcement deterring migrants. The slackening flow, they argue, belies the conventional wisdom that it is impossible to stem illegal migration."

Dobbs Says Chertoff Border Trip Likely "Just A Photo-Op." On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/20, 6:30 pm) host Lou Dobbs noted that Secretary Chertoff was in Yuma, Arizona, to discuss new security barriers, but questioned whether it was "just a photo-op." Secretary Chertoff was shown welding part of the barrier and saying, "What the fencing does is it builds a barrier that slows up the people who want to cross illegally." CNN (Sylvester) continued, "A colorful photo-op, but critics say the border fence with Mexico is actually one of the nation's weakest security links. President Bush promised to build 700 miles of fencing as part of the Secure Fences Act signed in October. This year, only 75 miles of new actual border fence will be built. And by the time President Bush leaves office, there will only be 370 miles of fencing along the southern border. And much of it not fence that you can even see or touch: A virtual fence, sensors and cameras. Immigration reform groups say that's not good enough."

New Trial To Be Sought For Former Border Patrol Agents. The San Bernardino Sun (2/21) reports defense attorneys for two former El Paso, Texas, Border Patrol agents "convicted of shooting a Mexican drug smuggler will ask for a new trial based on evidence they say wasn't provided to them in court. Mary Stillinger, co-counsel for former Border Patrol agent Ignacio Ramos, said an April 12, 2005, Department of Homeland Security memo was never provided to them. The memo, written by Christopher Sanchez of the department's Inspector General's Office, acknowledged that all nine agents at the scene, including two supervisors, knew about the shooting, heard about the shooting and covered up the shooting."

Ontario, California's Daily Bulletin (2/20) reported, "Two convicted former El Paso Border Patrol agents accused by the U.S. Attorney of not filing a report when they shot a Mexican drug smuggler were prohibited by their own agency's firearms policy from doing so, according to documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin. … Ramos and [Jose Alonso] Compean were convicted last spring for shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican drug smuggler, in the buttocks on Feb. 17, 2005. The agents are now serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, in federal prison."

TAX:

Judge Refuses To Dismiss Tax-Evasion Charges Against Boston Rapper. The Boston Herald (2/21, Sweet, 184K) reports, "A federal judge refused to dismiss tax-evasion charges against a controversial Hub hip-hop artist on the opening day of his trial yesterday simply because the rapper's accountant was singing to the FBI and IRS about his alleged shenanignans. Lawyers for Ray 'Benzino' Scott, 41, former co-owner of the hip-hop magazine The Source, argued in court papers, 'There is something fundamentally wrong with the government employing (Scott's) controller to gather evidence of other crimes at the very same time the controller is ostensibly putting together the information necessary to prepare (Scott's) tax returns.' But U.S. District Court Judge Rya W. Zobel sided with federal prosecutors, who called Scott's eleventh-hour bid 'far from candid.'

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Presses Case For Healthcare Plan With Insurers. Market Watch (2/21, Watts) reports, "Faced with a growing chorus for some type of universal healthcare coverage, President Bush met with insurers Tuesday to argue his case for changing the tax code in a bid the White House says will make health insurance more affordable for many Americans." After meeting with the CEOs, "including the top executives at Aetna Inc.," Bush said, "I discussed my health care plan that would ... equalize the tax code so that the individual would be more likely to be able to purchase a plan, because I believe a good health care system is one that rewards the consumer, encourages the consumer, and makes sure the consumer has got the capacity to make viable choices." Market Watch adds that Bush, "in his State of the Union address last month, outlined a plan that would significantly alter the tax treatment of employer-provided health benefits." Democratic leaders "have said the Bush plan has little chance of advancing legislatively."

Bush's healthcare meeting generated little media coverage, print or otherwise. The exception were the handful of local TV newscasts that covered the event. KJCT-TV Grand Junction, CO (2/20, 10:08 pm) broadcast near the beginning of its 10 o'clock newscast that President Bush "is taking the next step toward getting his healthcare initiatives turned into law. The President outlined his plan during his State of the Union Address last month. Today, he discussed his objectives in detail with members of the health insurance community and small business leaders."

KCRG-TV Cedar Rapids (2/20, 10:00 pm) reported, "President Bush is trying to get Congress to enact his healthcare initiatives. … Today he" met "with members of the health insurance community and small business leaders at the White House. The President asked participants to lobby Congress to approve the policy."

WDAY-TV Fargo (2/20, 5:01 pm) also noted the White House meeting, adding, "Democrats say the President's plan will encourage companies to drop employee coverage." KEYT-TV Santa Barbara (2/20, 6:39 pm), KIFI-TV Idaho Falls (2/20, 5:23 pm), KTVA-TV Anchorage (2/20, 5:05 pm) ran very similar reports.

West Wing Likes Wyden's Bipartisan Offer On Health Care. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/20) reported that some West Wing insiders "have a new favorite among the Democrats," Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon, who "took the lead in having a small group of senators send a letter to President Bush recently offering to work with the Administration on improving the health-care system, one of Bush's top priorities for the remainder of his Presidency." A GOP strategist "with close ties to the West Wing" tells the Bulletin, "The White House is very appreciative. We think it's sincere and a very good sign that we can have a constructive relationship with the Democrats." Bush is expected to call for bipartisan cooperation on health care -- just what Wyden is urging -- in a meeting on the subject this afternoon at the White House."

Bush Plan Seen As Unlikely To Reduce Uninsured. In a BusinessWeek (2/21) "Viewpoint" article, Robert Greenstein and Edwin Park of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities say that Bush's health insurance proposal "is unlikely to significantly reduce the ranks of the uninsured, in part because it isn't targeted at the people who can least afford coverage. Moreover, the plan could cause many people in poor health to lose coverage by weakening the employer-based health system—the source of most Americans' health insurance—without putting a viable alternative in its place." There are "three basic problems with the President's plan." Most of the uninsured "would receive only modest help." The plan "would weaken employer-based coverage. While highly imperfect, the employer-based health system is the principal means for 'pooling' healthy and sick workers together, so that insurance is affordable for those in poor health." And finally, the plan "provides no viable pooling alternative to employer-based coverage."

Little Public Trust For Bush On Healthcare. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.04M) reports a new Wall Street Journal Online/Harris health-care poll finds "nearly half of Americans don't trust President Bush to reform the nation's health-care system." Asked how much "they trust the president to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system, 49% said 'not at all,' while 16% said 'not much,' according to the online survey of 2,482 U.S. adults. By comparison, 18% said they trust Mr. Bush 'to some extent' and only 9% trust him 'a great deal' on the issue. The survey was conducted Feb. 7-9." The survey "found more confidence in Democrats than Republicans," and among "potential presidential contenders, 48% said they trust Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton on the issue a great deal or to some extent, while 45% said the same about Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, 34% about Republican Sen. John McCain and 19% about Republican Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts."

Bush To Visit Chattanooga To Promote Healthcare Agenda. The Chattanoogan (2/20) reported, "A group opposed to the war in Iraq will protest during President Bush's visit to Chattanooga. But the Hamilton County Republican Party was urging a turnout of support for the President." The president is "set to fly into the Chattanooga Metropolitan Airport on Air Force One Wednesday morning." Bush is "due to make about a 20-minute tour of Erlanger Medical Center prior to going to the Convention Center. There he will hold a 'conversation on healthcare initiatives.'" Gov. Phil Bredesen "will join President Bush in Chattanooga on Wednesday 'for several events that will focus on expanding healthcare options for the uninsured.'" Also "set to be in the entourage are Sen. Lamar Alexander, Sen. Bob Corker and Rep. Zach Wamp."

Local newscasts in Tennessee on Tuesday reported on Bush's planned visit today, noting the stops are part of the President's efforts to promote healthcare reform. Local news also noted Bush's plans to give an award to a local volunteer. Some examples: WDEF-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 11:01 pm) broadcast at the top of its 11 o'clock newscast that the President "will tour Erlanger tomorrow, and plans to discuss healthcare access in a roundtable session later at the convention center. While in town, President Bush will honor one local woman for her dedication to volunteering. Debbie Chadwick will be awarded the USA Freedom Corps Greeter

Award for her years of service at Life Care Center of Missionary Ridge."

WTVC-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 11:02 pm) said that "everywhere…Bush goes" he "honors one person who's made a difference in the lives of others." Debbie Chadwick "has Down's syndrome, but that has not stopped her from starting up three programs at the center. She'll get the award at the Chattanooga airport when the President gets off the plane tomorrow." WRCB-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 11:01 pm), WDSI-TV Chattanooga (2/20, 10:01 pm), WSMV-TV Nashville (2/20, 6:33 pm), WKRN-TV Nashville (2/20, 5:06 pm), and WREG-TV Memphis (2/20, 5:03 pm) also covered the President's visit.

Medicare Benefit Slows Growth In Prescription Drug Spending. The Washington Post (2/21, A6, Lee, 690K) reports Federal number analysts said "that the new Medicare drug benefit appears to be slowing the growth in national spending on prescription medicines because the drug plans are negotiating lower prices with drug companies." However, the analysts "also forecasted that overall health-care spending would continue to rise and would account for nearly 20 percent of the economy -- or more than $4 trillion a year -- by 2016. In contrast, health-care spending was about $2.1 trillion in 2006, accounting for about 16 percent of the economy." The findings "provide new fuel for the debate about whether Medicare could get better drug prices if the government negotiated with pharmaceutical companies. Many Democrats in Congress say it would, and the House has already passed legislation requiring the government to use its negotiating muscle."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "Healthcare spending in the United States will nearly double over the next decade to $4.1 trillion in 2016, government economists said today, prompting concern that Americans cannot keep paying for cost increases that outstrip the growth of the economy." The healthcare bill "will average $12,782 for every man, woman and child in 2016, an increase from $7,498 this year, said the report, published online by the policy journal Health Affairs. Healthcare costs will account for nearly 20 cents out of every dollar Americans spend in 2016, up from about 16 cents today." And by 2016 — 'even before most baby boomers retire and become Medicare recipients — federal, state and local government will be picking up nearly half the national healthcare tab, putting pressure on Congress to curb benefits, raise taxes or both."

Roberts Opposed To Bush's Medicare, Medicaid Budget Plans. The AP (2/21, Hanna) reports Republican Sen. Pat Roberts is working with Democratic Sen. Blanche Lincoln "to block some of President Bush's budget proposals for social services, suggesting those recommendations could amount to 'rationing health care.'" Roberts said he "doubts Bush's proposals enjoy much support, so he would like Congress to avoid a lengthy back-and-forth before providing additional funds for the Medicare and Medicaid programs. He's most concerned about payments to hospitals that provide services to the programs' participants." Bush's proposals "are designed to save $76 billion over five years in Medicare, the program that provides medical services for the elderly. They also would trim $25 billion from Medicaid, the medical program for low-income people."

Employer Groups Want Tighter Family Leave Restrictions. The Hill (2/21, Holzer) reports, "Employer groups are trying to persuade the Bush administration to restrict the illnesses that qualify under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) and make it less tempting for workers to take sporadic time off under the law." The FMLA "requires businesses with at least 50 employees to give 12 weeks' unpaid leave to workers for the birth or adoption of a child or in the case of their own or a close family member's sickness." Employers say "weaknesses in the law and the regulations handed down since it was passed have spawned rampant abuse by shirkers and headaches for managers in charge of approving and tracking leave." The "latest push by employers to modify the FMLA comes on the heels of a Department of Labor (DoL) request in December for public comment on the law and just after Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), one of its original architects, introduced a bill Feb. 1 to expand the act. His legislation would ensure six weeks' paid leave under the FMLA, to be funded by the federal government, the employer and the employee."

Coterie Of Texas Aides Remains At Bush's Side. The New York Times (2/21, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Israel Hernandez "was a fresh-faced college graduate from the Texas border town of Eagle Pass in the summer of 1993 when he landed a job in Dallas as the personal aide to the part-owner of the Texas Rangers George W. Bush." Now, "after nearly 14 years in Mr. Bush's employ, with a short break to get a master's degree, Mr. Hernandez, 37, travels the world promoting free trade as an assistant secretary of commerce. From his sun-drenched corner office, with its sweeping view of the Washington Monument, he can sit at his desk and watch the presidential helicopter, Marine One, ferry around the man to whom he owes his career." The Times adds, "Six years into Mr. Bush's presidency, the corps of loyal Texans who accompanied him to Washington from Austin remains a powerful force inside the administration, a steady source of comfort for an increasingly isolated president. No matter how grim the polls or dire the news in Iraq, they have stood by Mr. Bush — and been rewarded with plum jobs — as their lives have grown increasingly intertwined with one another's and with his." To hear "these people talk about the president is to meet a man many Americans have either forgotten or no longer recognize. Their George W. Bush is the compassionate conservative who helped soften the harsh image of the Republican Party, a man who chokes up at going-away parties, as he did last year for Andrew H. Card Jr., his departing chief of staff; a man unafraid of giving promotions to openly gay people, as he did with Mr. Hernandez, and who always remembers to ask how the family is." The Texas "circle includes three cabinet officials — Ms. Spellings, the education secretary; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez; and Alphonso R. Jackson, the secretary of housing and urban development — as well as some of the best-known names in Washington: Karl Rove, the chief political strategist, Mr. Bartlett and Ms. Hughes."

Snow Appears Not To Be Troubled By Antagonistic Questioning. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/20) reported, "How is White House Press Secretary Tony Snow holding up under the increasingly antagonistic questioning of the press corps on Iraq, Iran, North Korea, President Bush's low approval ratings, and other issues?" One of Snow's "colleagues in the West Wing" tells the Bulletin, "He has fun with it. He loves to parry." The Bulletin adds, "Even amid adversarial sessions with reporters, Snow almost always manages to keep his good humor and he doesn't take the sharp-edged interrogations personally. The former conservative commentator on TV and radio says give-and-take is part of the job." A White House colleague says, "He just rolls with it." The Bulletin adds that other White House insiders "say Snow has learned to delegate, so he doesn't get wrapped up in the minutiae of media logistics, and is willing to refer reporters to other departments of government, such as the Pentagon and State Department, if he isn't comfortable talking about certain topics. This saves him time and lessens the aggravation." But Snow "likes to maintain his role as chief White House spokesman on the truly big issues, such as Iran and how the administration is dealing with Congress. Beyond all this, Snow is still giving speeches to Republican groups around the country to rally support for Bush." GOP insiders "say he is a considerable draw, especially among conservatives who admire his aggressive defense of the President and his daily push-back against the mainstream media."

Administration Officials Pledge To Address Concerns Raised By Walter Reed Expose. The Washington Post (2/21, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports the White House and congressional leaders yesterday "called…for swift investigation and repair of the problems plaguing outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, as veterans groups and members of Congress in both parties expressed outrage over substandard housing and the slow, dysfunctional bureaucracy there." The Post "documented tattered conditions at Building 18, including mold, rot, mice and cockroaches, but also a larger bureaucratic indifference that has impeded some soldiers' recovery. ... Walter Reed's fixes are unlikely to immediately quiet the criticism from members of Congress, who received a flood of calls from the public and veterans groups asking how the problems could have been unknown to officials -- some of whom regularly visit Walter Reed."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 5, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The charges prompted the Pentagon to authorize an independent review of the situation at Walter Reed." NBC added that the President" often visits Walter Reed's state of the art inpatient Ward 57. But today his spokesman referred all questions to the Pentagon." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "Well, I'll tell you what. Is the system working? Yes. Is it working perfectly? No."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/10) reported, "Many of our troops wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan receive treatment at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. The center describes itself as the Army's top medical facility. But tonight, there is rising outrage over what is nothing less than a failure of leadership in the care of our wounded troops at Walter Reed as first reported by the Washington Post. … Top Army leaders say they were unaware of the problem until they read about it in the paper Sunday." Army Secretary Francis Harvey "said the Army will look at conditions, not just here at Walter Reed, but at out-patient facilities around the country." CNN's Lou Dobbs added that for "the commander in chief to permit this" is "despicable."

CNN.com (2/20) reported Harvey "blamed a failure of leadership for substandard conditions in a building that is part of Walter Reed Army Medical Center and vowed Tuesday to move quickly to fix the problem. ... Harvey said he learned about the conditions in the building, a former hotel where some soldiers have been recuperating for more than a year and a half, on Sunday, when the Washington Post broke the story."

The AP (2/20) reports Sens. Barbara Mikulski and Patty Murray "urged Defense Secretary Robert Gates in a letter Tuesday to launch an inspector general's investigation." Sens. Barack Obama and Claire McCaskill "said they are working on legislation to improve the care of war veterans." The AP adds, "The Pentagon responded Tuesday by announcing that the Army has begun a review of medical care at Walter Reed and the Navy has undertaken a similar review at its National Naval Medical Center. The Pentagon also said an independent review group would be formed to investigate outpatient and administrative issues at the two military medical centers." More than 100 sites carried this story.

MSNBC's Hardball (2/20, Matthews) reported, "Today Washington is still focused on this week's big Washington Post story, which detailed the negligent treatment of wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Hospital -- patients recovering amidst filth, mold, rats and overall neglect." McCaskill, during an interview, said, "it's not the hospital that's the problem. It's the outpatient. And I think their system has been overloaded. I don't think they were prepared for the number of outpatients that they have, the serious injuries that are occurring, the loss of limbs, the need for social workers, the reintegration. They've overwhelmed these men and women with paperwork and bureaucracy. And they didn't have any place to put them. So they start putting them places that they shouldn't have put them."

The Washington Post (2/21, A14, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, says that conditions on the post will improve rapidly. His response is commendable, and it should not be forgotten that thousands of professionals and volunteers, civilian and military, are working hard to help veterans heal and adjust. But it also should not have taken newspaper articles to bring change to outpatient conditions at Walter Reed. And while filthy conditions at Building 18 are a temporary problem for these veterans, lowball settlements may leave soldiers and their families impoverished for life."

Budget Deficit Shrinking To Half Of Average Size Since 1970. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Trumbull, 59K) reports, "With the robust economy, tax revenues are pouring in. But rising costs lie ahead. Despite the ongoing costs of US military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the outlook for the federal budget has grown substantially brighter." Tax revenues "are rising much faster than spending, according to Treasury Department numbers released last week. The recent trend is strong enough that, were it to continue, the budget could move into surplus in barely a year, one economist calculates. Already, the federal deficit is shrinking toward about half the size that it has averaged since 1970, when analyzed as a percentage of gross domestic product." The "shift reflects a strong economy, with higher incomes and corporate profits generating a bigger flow of tax revenue. In turn, the Treasury's progress could help the economy by buoying investor confidence in the nation's fiscal position." However, "the improvement does little to stave off the long-run challenges to the nation's financial health, many economists say. Baby boomers are starting to retire, placing new demands on government. Costs for healthcare programs like Medicare are still projected to rise faster than overall inflation."

Murtha Says Peru Free-Trade Deal A Threat To National Security. The Hill (2/21, Swanson) reports Rep. John Murtha (D), "a close ally" of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi), "is calling elements of a Peru free-trade agreement (FTA) signed by the Bush administration a threat to national security. The chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee has warned Democratic leaders on trade that the deal grants a United Arab Emirates company the ability to invest in US ports." Murtha "has asked Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) to demand that the administration alter the free-trade deal it negotiated with Peru to prevent enterprises there from investing in US landside port activities."

White House Defends Rumsfeld. The Washington Times (2/21, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The White House yesterday defended Donald H. Rumsfeld after criticism from Republican Sen. John McCain that he was one of the worst defense secretaries in history for his handling of the Iraq war. … 'We think Donald Rumsfeld was an enormously consequential and effective secretary of defense and somebody who led to the transformation of the Department of Defense. Senator McCain holds a different point of view,' White House spokesman Tony Snow said." The Times adds, "Asked if Mr. McCain's comments should be chalked up to election politics, Mr. Snow replied: 'I left the chalk at home.'"

Bolton Book Expected By End Of Year. The Washington Post's (2/21, A13) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that John Bolton's "tell-all book on his days at the State Department and as ambassador to the United Nations could be coming out as early as the end of this year." Kamen says "top folks in Foggy Bottom and at the United Nations are most surely not going to be happy when this one comes out. The buzz is that it's going to focus mostly on Bolton's work at the United Nations, where he's said to be still upset at his inability to lop off 10 of the building's 38 floors that he had said were expendable." However, it is "unclear how Bolton will treat his most recent bosses, Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice."

Johnson Leaves Hospital, Enters Rehab Facility. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, 690K) reports, "More than two months after suffering a brain hemorrhage, Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) has left a Washington hospital and entered a private rehabilitation facility, his office said yesterday. A spokeswoman refused to say whether the senator remained in Washington or was moved to a facility in South Dakota, citing family concerns about media scrutiny." ABC World News (2/20, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) noted

"Johnson's illness had put the Democrats' one-seat advantage in the Senate in jeopardy."

State And Federal Governments' Unfunded Pension Liability Threatens Budgets. USA Today (2/21, 1A, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports, "More and more, retirees are finding that it pays to have worked for the government instead of the private sector. … As the first wave of 79 million baby boomers heads to retirement, the nation is dividing into two classes of workers: those who have government benefits and those who don't. The gap is accelerating in every way: pensions, medical benefits, retirement ages. Retired government workers are twice as likely to get a pension as their counterparts in the private sector, and the typical benefit is far more generous. The nation's 6 million retired civil servants — teachers, police, administrators, laborers — received a median benefit of $17,640 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service. Eleven million private-sector retirees covered by traditional pensions got $7,692. Governments' generosity could have serious consequences for taxpayers and pensioners. Some states…have troubled retirement systems that may require huge tax increases, spending cuts or even defaulting on promised benefits. The U.S. government has a bigger unfunded liability for military and civil servant retirement benefits ($4.7 trillion) than it does for Social Security ($4.6 trillion). The pension gap will continue to widen because governments pump far more money into employee pensions than companies do."

Survey Results Suggest Many Employees Unaware Of TSP Account Activity. The Washington Post's (2/21, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "For lack of a better phrase, we'll call them the TSP No-Shows. Some members of the Thrift Savings Plan rarely or never check to see how much money is in their retirement accounts. Others have seemingly vanished because their mail is returned to the TSP as undeliverable." The Post adds that the "problem of dropouts in a large organization" is hardly "surprising. The TSP, the 401(k)-type program for government workers, has more than 3.7 million members around the world. With more than $210 billion in assets, it is one of the nation's largest retirement programs. But the no-shows have emerged as a concern at the TSP, in part because of what the staff at the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, which oversees the TSP, learned from a recent survey." The Post adds that the survey results suggest "about 16 percent of TSP members rarely or never review their retirement accounts. What was of more concern was the response from those who have most at stake in the TSP -- employees covered by the newer Federal Employees Retirement System -- because TSP savings will be a larger share of their retirement income. Of that group, 18 percent said they almost never or never look at their accounts."

Helen Thomas To Lose Front-Row Seat In New White House Briefing Room. The Politico (2/21) reports, "Every theater-style seat in the White House briefing room, now closed for renovation, had a brass plaque inscribed with the name of a news organization. Only one, in the middle of the front row, had a name: 'HELEN THOMAS,' it said. The unique assigned seat between the chairs for CBS News and ABC News was reserved for the legendary United Press International correspondent who is now a columnist for Hearst Newspapers." The press corps "is scheduled to move from temporary facilities back into the spiffed-up, rewired briefing room in May or June. Thomas, who has been questioning presidents and press secretaries for 46 years, plans to be there. But her front-row seat won't be." The Politico adds, "Plans call for her to be moved to the second row to make room for a cable news channel – a sign of Washington's changing pecking order, and of the new ways that Americans get their news."

NYTimes Urges Bush To Convene Task Force On Infrastructure Improvements. The New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) editorializes, "As William Yardley reported recently in The Times, the country's water and sewer lines, many of them a century old, are in terrible shape, leading to those collapsing roads. And the Army Corps of Engineers reported earlier this month that more than 120 levees around the country could fail in a major flood. New Orleans needs to remain an exception, rather than a sad model for the future." America's "ability to compete isn't just a matter of being inventive and having a good work ethic, but also depends on the ability to deliver products reliably and on time. The first president with a master's degree in business administration -- hint, he's the current Oval Office occupant -- should convene a task force of federal, state and local officials to address the growing problem."

WPost Urges Congressional Passage Of "Passengers' Bill Of Rights." The Washington Post (2/21, 690K) editorializes, "The renewed push for a passenger bill of rights gained traction in the Valentine's Day ice storm, when nine fully loaded JetBlue aircraft sat on the tarmac at John F. Kennedy airport in New York, some frozen to the ground, for six to 10 hours. In addition to the hundreds who were held hostage on stifling planes that ran out of food and water, hundreds more were stranded as JetBlue's operations ground to a halt." Sen. Barbara Boxer "introduced a passengers' bill of rights on Saturday and Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) plans to do the same next week. Both bills require airlines to allow travelers to get off planes after three hours of delay. That's more reasonable than what JetBlue is offering. And Mr. Thompson's bill goes a step further to mandate frequent updates on the cause and timing of delays.

Dow Closes At New All-Time High. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, McKay, 2.04M) reports, "Solid earnings at Wal-Mart Stores and a drop in oil prices outweighed weak results at Home Depot, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record. The blue-chip average gained 19.07 points, or 0.1%, to end at 12786.64, up 2.6% on the year. … Other market measures posted their highest closes in more than six years. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.3%, or 4.14 points, to 1459.68, up 2.9% on the year." The Nasdaq Composite Index "added 0.7%, or 16.73 points, to 2513.04, up 4% on the year." USA Today (2/21, Shell, 2.27M), Washington Post (2/21, 690K) and Washington Times (2/21, 88K), among other major newspapers, run similar stories this morning.

Pump Prices Rise For Third Straight Week. ABC World News (2/20, story 7, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The price of gas has gone up for the third week in a row. The government says the average price of a gallon rose 6 cents over the past week, hitting $2.30 on average, partly because oil prices have been rising with the cold weather."

Collapse Of Juror Leads To Mistrial In Malpractice Case. The New York Times (2/21, Zezima) reports from Boston, "A mistrial was declared on Tuesday in a medical malpractice case brought by the head football coach at the University of Notre Dame after a juror collapsed and the defendants, two doctors at Massachusetts General Hospital, rushed to help him." The Times continues, "The coach, Charlie Weis, who had N.F.L. coaching positions with the New England Patriots, the New York Giants and the New York Jets, has accused the doctors of negligence by letting him bleed internally for 30 hours after a gastric bypass in 2002. … Mr. Weis's lawyer said that he nearly died after the procedure and that the operation left his legs with nerve damage." The Times adds, "The doctors, Richard A. Ferguson and Charles M. Hodin, said that Mr. Weis knew the dangers of the operation and that bleeding was not uncommon after such surgery. … Around 10 a.m. as another doctor was testifying, a juror gasped and lost consciousness. The witness, with Drs. Ferguson and Hodin, rose and helped the juror, who was taken to a hospital. … After the juror left, Mr. Weis's lawyer, Michael Mone, asked Judge Charles T. Spurlock of Superior County in Suffolk County for a mistrial. In an interview, Mr. Mone said two jurors had told the judge that the events could influence their verdict."

Supreme Court To Hear State's Appeal On Judicial Selection Process. After two lower courts declared New York's judicial selection process unconstitutional on the grounds that it denies the freedom of political association, the New York Times (2/21, Greenhouse) says the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to review that matter based on an appeal by the New York State Board of Elections; several political organizations; the incumbent State Supreme Court justices; and Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. The paper says Gov. Spitzer's view of the case "will be a matter of some interest as it goes forward. Addressing the Rockefeller Institute of Government shortly after his election as governor, Mr. Spitzer indicated that he did not support the existing system, which he said was 'in dire need of reform.' According to an account in The New York Law Journal, the governor-elect said that 'there must be a way to primary onto the ballot,' and added that 'I will not support anything that has a closed convention structure, where only those who came out of the convention could be on the ballot.'" The paper notes that primaries pose the problem of judicial candidates having to raise "considerable amounts of money."

Romney To Air First TV Ads. The New York Times (2/21, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Mitt Romney "will run television advertisements in five states starting Wednesday, the latest sign of how quickly the 2008 campaign is moving." The ads "are an early move to inform Republican primary voters about his views and record at a time when he has come under some criticism by opponents for shifting his views on several issues. The television advertising campaign will begin in Iowa and New Hampshire on Wednesday and then expand to South Carolina, Florida and Michigan, all states with early 2008 contests, his aides said. The advertisements will run for about two weeks." As is "typical with early introductory advertisements, they focus heavily on presenting information about someone who is little known outside his state, focusing in particular on his tenure as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City."

Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) reported that in "an unprecedentedly early move for position," Romney "has launched the first multi-state ad blitz of the campaign, hoping to define himself on his own terms by touching on both socially and fiscally conservative issues." Romney ad: "I believe the American people are overtaxed and the government is overfed. I believe our laws ought to be written by the people and not by unelected judges."

The Politico (2/21, Martin) reports the "spot also allows Romney to boost his name ID in the key early states, where he currently lags far behind the better-known Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani. While Romney has put together a solid organization in each of these initial nominating states and created buzz with the political class, he's yet to penetrate the larger population. These ads aim to change that."

Romney Camp Targets McCain On Abortion Issue. In a report on his blog at the website of The Politico (2/20), Jonathan Martin related, "The campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, whose stance on abortion has often been hard to pin down, now is attacking Sen. John McCain on the issue, accusing the Arizonan of ducking the debate over the right to life since his 2000 presidential bid. 'Ask the pro-life movement where his leadership has been in the six years since 2000 that he's been running for president,' says Gary Marx, who is charged with handling conservative outreach for Romney. 'What has he done?' But isn't it a bit audacious for the campaign of a candidate who was, in his own words, 'effectively pro-choice' as late as his 2002 gubernatorial run, to now take shots at the record of a consistently pro-life opponent? 'We're making sure that all primary voters and [conservative] leaders have full picture on all the candidates,' responds Marx. Which is why Marx sent an e-mail…last night to more than 100 influential social conservatives highlighting various news clips about McCain's stance on abortion, bolding and italicizing those lines that call into question the senator's commitment to ending the practice."

Romney's Political Views Said To Undergoing An "Extreme Makeover." In her Washington Post column (2/21, A15), Ruth Marcus says that in a 2006 interview, Mitt Romney did "his best not to explain his views on abortion," and his "baroque circumlocutions seemed to say so much about him. It was hard to know what Romney actually thought about abortion rights other than that this was a political minefield it was best to avoid stepping into for as long as possible. But it was also hard to see how a man with deeply held convictions on abortion rights -- either for or against -- could take a position so calibrated and inconclusive. Listening to Romney that day was like watching a chameleon in the fleeting moment that its color changes to suit its environment." Romney's "'Extreme Makeover: Political Edition' goes beyond abortion rights."

McCain Defends Outreach To Conservative Christians. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports Sen. John McCain "is defending his outreach to conservative Christians, arguing that his effort is not political pandering to win the GOP nomination." McCain "met privately Monday with religious broadcasters in Orlando, Fla., then answered questions about his appeal to conservatives in Vero Beach." In the 2000 campaign, McCain "angered the party's right by calling evangelist leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell 'agents of intolerance.' Last spring, he spoke at Falwell's Liberty University although hard feelings still linger among some conservatives. Focus on the Family founder James Dobson has said he won't support McCain." McCain said, "Nobody accused me of courting and pandering to the liberals when I went to the New School. What I have found out in my life, is that every time I have done something for political reasons and not the right reasons, I have paid a very heavy price for it — a big price."

McCain Backing For Iraq Surge Hurts GOP Support. The Financial Times (2/21, Luce) reports, "Once considered the un-crowned Republican candidate for the 2008 presidential election, John McCain's fortunes are plummeting rapidly. And the senator's frustrations are beginning to show." At a campaign stop in South Carolina on Monday, McCain "lashed out at Donald Rumsfeld, the controversial former defence secretary, as 'one of the worst secretaries of defence in history.'" The Times adds that in spite "of his criticisms of the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq war since 2003, Mr McCain is starting to pay a price on the campaign trail." Since his strong show of support for President Bush's Iraq troop surge, McCain's "poll numbers among registered Republican voters and among the US public at large have fallen sharply."

McCain Picks Up Endorsements From DeWine, Other GOP Lawmakers. The Hill (2/21, Schor) reports Sen. McCain "yesterday picked up a 2008 endorsement from Ohio's former GOP senator, Mike DeWine, who maintains strong name-recognition in the quintessential swing state, despite losing his seat last year. Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.) also joined McCain's 2008 bid." Of the "17 House Republicans who voted with Democrats on last week's resolution condemning the Bush administration's plan to add troops in Iraq, five are public McCain supporters: Reps. Ric Keller (Fla.), Fred Upton (Mich.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio), Mark Kirk (Ill.) and Castle."

2001 NARAL Speech Could Undercut Giuliani's Conservative Appeal. The Hill (2/21, Bolton) reports a speech Rudy Giuliani "delivered to an abortion-rights advocacy group when he was mayor of New York City and more recent comments about the Supreme Court could complicate his efforts to woo conservative votes in crucial presidential primary states." Giuliani will "test his new abortion talking points with conservative voters today when he campaigns in South Carolina, a state that is expected to pose an obstacle to centrist GOP presidential candidates next year." Giuliani, who "was an outspoken supporter of abortion rights when he ran for city office in the 1990s, has shifted his position to appeal to conservative voters by promising to nominate conservative jurists" such as Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito "to the federal courts if elected president." But the "credibility of that stance is undermined by remarks Giuliani delivered in April of 2001 to the National Abortion & Reproduction Rights Action

League, now known as NARAL Pro-Choice America." In the speech, Giuliani thanked NARAL for "taking the lead in establishing freedom of choice for all of us," and he "indicated then that he supported changing the Republican Party's platform on abortion."

Obama Attends Los Angeles Rally, Hollywood Fundraiser. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Finnegan, 850K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "capped a three-day campaign swing through California today with a South Los Angeles rally where he told thousands of supporters he would 'transform the country' with sweeping change at home and abroad." Vowing to "shatter the insider culture of the nation's capital," Obama "said he would end the war in Iraq, expand health coverage to all Americans and fix the country's ailing public school system." Before "returning to his hometown of Chicago this evening, Obama plans to collect more than $1 million in Beverly Hills at a glitzy fund-raising reception thrown by DreamWorks studio founders David Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg." Celebrities who "bought $2,300 tickets to the Beverly Hills Hilton soiree include Barbra Streisand and George Clooney, said Andy Spahn, an organizer of the event." After the reception, Obama is "scheduled to dine at Geffen's Beverly Hills estate with roughly 40 guests — those who raised at least $46,000 apiece. He raised money earlier this week in La Jolla, San Francisco and Palo Alto." The "huge crowd at the Crenshaw event reflected the extraordinary interest that Obama has generated among Democrats. It is highly unusual for a presidential candidate to draw thousands of supporters to a Los Angeles rally nearly a year before California's primary — or even to try."

The AP (2/21, Blood) reports, "Checks from Hollywood's A-list stars such as George Clooney, Eddie Murphy and Barbra Streisand added up to a one-night take of $1.3 million for" Obama, who "told an audience that included Spielberg, Oscar nominee Eddie Murphy, actress Jennifer Anniston and singer Jackson Browne that they have 'enormous power' that comes with 'enormous responsibility' because of their impact on American culture." Obama's "display of celebrity sizzle and campaign dollars challenges any assumptions that Hollywood dollars would default to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who has long-standing ties to the industry, along with her husband, former President Clinton." Democratic consultant Garry South said, "I think this guy is for real."

The Washington Post (2/21, A4, Mosk, 690K) reports organizers "said they expected the freshman senator to leave town flush not only with money but also with valuable connections in a city that has for decades served as a lifeline for Democratic presidential contenders." The funds "collected now could provide an important boost, in that it will appear on Obama's first quarterly earnings report. Those figures, when released in April, will help signal his campaign's viability." A "clear undercurrent to yesterday's high-profile Hollywood swing was the ease with which Obama swept up support from entertainment industry titans who had once been squarely with President Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.)."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 7, 2:25, Whitaker, 7.66M) reported Obama "is in Los Angeles today being treated like a movie star. He came early, and he'll be here often, because California is set to play a bigger role this election cycle than ever before. Hollywood is abuzz about who's going to win the gold -- not the Oscar, the political pot of gold Hollywood liberally dishes out each presidential election. That's why Barack Obama is in town tonight. A glitzy fundraiser with top-tier stars paying $2,300 each is expected to raise more than $1.5 million for the first-term senator. Obama is a real box office draw, says LA-based political blogger Arianna Huffington." Arianna Huffington: "Hollywood is a city, a town, that understands the power of casting, and, you know, Obama, they have found a leading man." Whitaker: "All the major candidates come to Hollywood for money." But almost "everyone assumed the deep affection and deep pockets Hollywood had for Bill Clinton would transfer to Hillary Clinton. Instead, the money people are hedging their bets. Stephen Spielberg is throwing fund raisers for Obama and Hillary." Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff: "She cannot walk in the room and just say, you know, 'Remember me? I was with Bill Clinton.' That's not going to work anymore. She's going to have to earn it herself." Whitaker: "Next year, California and other big states plan to move their primaries up to early February and overshadow the smaller states." That means "that each candidate will have to raise about $20 million just to run in the California primary."

The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Dorning, Parson, 617K) reports Obama "made his debut as a presidential candidate among an A-list of Hollywood power and fame, tapping into one of the most formidable honey pots of Democratic money and connections." The "fact that the DreamWorks partners are so early in staging such a big party — expected to net at least $1 million — has drawn notable attention to Obama, especially as media from around the world assemble in advance of this weekend's Oscar ceremonies. For others in the circle, say some, it signals Obama as someone to take seriously."

Dowd Compares Obama's Hollywood Entrance With O'Hara's In "Gone With The Wind." In her New York Times column (2/21), Maureen Dowd says Obama has "made an entrance in Hollywood unmatched since Scarlett O'Hara swept into the Twelve Oaks barbecue. Instead of the Tarleton twins, the Illinois senator is flirting with the Dreamworks trio: Mr. Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey

Katzenberg, who gave him a party last night that raised $1.3 million and Hillary's hackles." She "didn't stand outside the gates to the Geffen mansion, where glitterati wolfed down Wolfgang Puck savories, singing the Jennifer Hudson protest anthem 'And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going.' But she's not exactly Little Miss Sunshine, either. Hillary loyalists have hissed at defecting donors to remember the good old days of jumping on the Lincoln Bedroom bed."

Obama To Deliver Keynote At Selma Bridge Commemoration. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports Sen. Obama will "deliver the keynote address next month at the annual Bridge Crossing Jubilee that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, organizers said Tuesday." Obama is "scheduled to speak at a March 4 service at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church, the site in Selma where marchers gathered in the historic protest that gave blacks across the South greater access to the ballot." Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., "who district includes Selma, asked Obama to participate and plans to hold a fundraiser for the Illinois senator."

Race Seen As Perplexing Issue For Obama. In his Washington Post column (2/21, B1), Courtland Milloy says, "Is Obama black enough for the black vote? Is he too black for the white vote? With a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, can he expect to take the mixed-race vote? It's as if the 'color line' had been encoded into the American DNA." According to "a recent survey by Zogby International, a majority of whites, 55 percent, classified Obama as 'biracial,' and 66 percent of blacks classified him as black. To some, it was ridiculous to question whether Obama was 'authentically black' when he was embraced by so many black people. But assigning him to that category only tightens the knot."

Edwards Denies Report He Considers Israel Threat To Peace. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports John Edwards' presidential campaign "wants to make it clear that he does not consider Israel a threat to world peace." An Edwards spokesman "issued a statement Tuesday denying such a report on Variety.com. Columnist Peter Bart reported that Edwards told a Hollywood fundraiser last month that the possibility that Israel would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities is perhaps the greatest short-term threat to world peace."

Clinton Outlines Initiatives For Black Students And Businesses. The AP (2/21, Farrington) reports that during her first campaign trip to Florida, Sen. Hillary Clinton "criticized President Bush's education policy as doing little to help minorities and acknowledged that she is still searching for ways to raise minority student test scores." Clinton " said Bush's No Child Left Behind Act isn't providing a solution for raising test scores." Clinton "spoke and took questions for an hour from the mostly black audience of 300 in the Liberty City neighborhood. The event was sandwiched between fundraisers in Tampa, Miami and Hollywood that were closed to the press. The federal government can do more to help minority businesses by writing a road map for banks' roles in the communities, Clinton said." Clinton "also called for microlending programs and helping business owners to develop stronger business plans so they are more credit worthy."

Clinton's Use Of "Hillary" In Campaign Literature Noted. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) Peter Funt, host of the television program "Candid Camera," writes, "Someone has apparently decided that Mrs. Clinton will be the first major single-name candidate since 1952. … Mrs. Clinton announced her intentions via the Internet on a Web site called 'Hillary for President.' Incredibly, on the day of her announcement, the name 'Clinton' did not appear anywhere in the long text on the site's home page."

Democratic Presidential Candidates Converge On Nevada For Forum. USA Today (2/21, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "With eight prospects participating in a forum today," Carson City, NV "is experiencing a crush of attention usually reserved for places like Keene, N.H. or Davenport, Iowa. … Nevada's sudden clout arises from its new Jan. 19 slot on the Democratic primary calendar, between the Iowa caucuses (Jan. 14) and the New Hampshire primary that start the nomination season. Two questions surround Nevada: Can the state pull it off? Will New Hampshire, now slated for Jan. 22, move earlier to stay second? The Democrats' elevation of Nevada reflects their rising hopes for political success in Western states. President Bush won Nevada by less than 3 percentage points in 2004."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 8, :15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "And the presidential race takes a new twist tomorrow. Most of the Democrats will be on the same stage for the first time in Nevada."

Obama Will Not Participate. Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Hume) noted that Nevada, "with its legalized gambling and prostitution, has been chosen by the Democratic party to caucus second after Iowa. A big candidates' forum is scheduled for Wednesday to promote caucus participation." Sen. Barack Obama visited Nevada Sunday butt is "skipping" Wednesday's forum. Sen. Hillary Clinton is "en-route to Nevada with the rest of the democratic field except for Obama."

Davis Defends Clinton's Iraq Vote. In an op-ed in The Hill (2/21), Lanny Davis says, "Although I am an ardent Iraq war critic and from the earliest days had serious doubts about granting the president discretionary authority to go to preemptive war in October 2002, I believe Sen. Clinton (whom I am supporting for president) has shown integrity and courage in refusing to pander to state that the vote at the time was a 'mistake' — given the information and belief she had concerning Saddam's WMD AND the clear conditions she set in her Senate speech explaining her vote." The "irony here is that Sen. Clinton is often criticized for seeming to be too calculating and opportunistic in taking positions on issues. Yet here she is standing on the truth and the facts known at the time, and refusing to pander and rewrite history."

Increasing Number Of Latino Evangelicals Bodes Well For GOP. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (2/21) reports, "A revolution is underway among America's Latino population that will have profound implications for the future of American politics. Of the 41.3 million Hispanics in the United States today, 37 percent identify themselves as 'born-again' or 'evangelical.' Just 10 years ago, the proportion that did so was about 15 percent. All told, there are now about 11 million Evangelical Protestant and 3 million Evangelical or Charismatic Catholic Latinos in the United States. In 1996, there were only 4 million." That shift "portends huge changes for American politics. With the Latino population swelling from 22 million in 1990 to 41 million in 2004, any change of these proportions in the beliefs of Hispanic-Americans will have a momentous impact on politics. Evangelicals, of any race or ethnicity, are fertile ground for Republicans and may provide a huge opening to swing the formerly Democratic Hispanic vote toward a more even-handed stance or even make it a core element of an emerging Republican majority. … Unfortunately, the hostile reception immigration reform has received from the GOP side of the aisle in Washington is turning off the very voters the Republicans can now, for the first time, hope to attract to their side. … It's time Republicans awakened to the political opportunities of Evangelical Hispanic conversions and got with the program."

Biden's Son And Brother Sue Former Business Partner. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/20, D2, Strasburg, Weidlich) reports that Sen. Joseph Biden's son R. Hunter Biden, a Washington lobbyist, "accused a former business partner of lying about his professional credentials and finances after they agreed to buy a hedge fund investment firm in 2006, according to a complaint in New York state court." Biden and James Biden, the senator's brother, "countersued Anthony Lotito Jr. on Feb. 13, saying he hid debts and falsely claimed he held securities licenses to lure them as partners in the planned $21.3 million acquisition. Lotito also persuaded the Bidens to hire a lawyer who had been convicted of fraud, according to the complaint."

Former State, CIA Officials To Launch Private Intelligence Firm. In its "Inside the Beltway" column, the Washington Times (2/21, 88K) reports Ambassador Cofer Black, the former ambassador-at-large and coordinator for counterterrorism at the State Department, and Rob Richer, who was the CIA's No. 2 for counterintelligence, "will create a new 'CIA-type' organization to address intelligence needs in the private sector. 'Terror attacks,' 'political instability,' 'avian-flu outbreaks,' and even severe weather events will be on the radar of the company, which the pair names Total Intelligence Solutions."

MacKinnon Notes Elderly DC Woman's Death Caused By Shut-Off Utilities. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/21, 11A, 2.27M) Douglas MacKinnon, former White House and Pentagon official, writes, "On Jan. 17, Bessie Sanders of Washington was killed in a house fire. It was determined by the fire department that 'Ms. Bessie,'…lost her life when the candle she was using for illumination in her bedroom accidentally started a fire. During the coldest part of the year, Ms. Bessie was using a candle for light because her electricity, gas and water had all been shut off. In this country, the last remaining superpower, an elderly woman needlessly perished when her government failed her. Even as friends and neighbors alerted the District of Columbia that Ms. Bessie's utilities needed to be reactivated, according to The Washington Post, the bureaucracy apparently failed to do so because she did not personally make the call, and a Social Security number was not provided. District officials said they had no record of her asking for assistance."

Cheney Reassures Japan On Nuclear Deal. AFP (2/21, Knox) reports Vice President Cheney "reassured Japan that the North Korea nuclear deal was a 'good first step' after a worried Tokyo refused to fund the pact." Japan has also "refused to provide energy aid to the nuclear-armed communist regime until it resolves an emotionally charged row over the past kidnappings of Japanese nationals." The Vice President "discussed the kidnappings among other issues in a breakfast meeting with Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki," said Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride.

Under the headline, "Cheney's Visit To Japan Exposes Tensions," the Financial Times (2/20, Pilling) reports Japan's defense minister, Fumio Kyuma, Tuesday "felt obliged to explain why he would not be meeting" Cheney. The US Vice President, "Kyuma explained, could not be expected to meet a mere defense minister." Behind Kyuma's "humble remarks lie an awkward diplomatic moment" after earlier this month he "lashed out at US foreign policy, saying Washington was wrong to invade Iraq and lambasting its arrogant attitude towards Okinawa, the island where the bulk of US troops in Japan are stationed." Kyuma's remarks "provoked outrage among Japan-handlers in the Bush administration and the embarrassment that has followed is one of several points of contention."

Negroponte To Visit Asia To Shore Up Support For Accord. On its front page, the Financial Times (2/21, A1, Dinmore) reports Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte's first mission is expected to take him to Asia next week "to shore up last week's breakthrough deal with North Korea." Negroponte will visit China, South Korea and Japan, officials said. One official said Negroponte "also planned to add Pyongyang to his itinerary, though others either denied this or said such a trip was unlikely at this stage." The Bush administration, "in particular Condoleezza Rice…has been fiercely criticized by Washington hawks over last week's deal." Officials admitted that a high-level visit to Pyongyang "would be controversial internally."

Iran Sets Conditions For Halt Of Nuclear Program. The AP (2/21, Jahn) reports Iran's chief nuclear envoy said Tuesday "his country wants to negotiate over its uranium enrichment program, on the eve of a U.N. Security Council deadline that carries the threat of harsher sanctions." But President Mahmoud Admadinejad "said Iran will halt enrichment only if Western nations do the same." Sanctions "could be triggered" by a report from IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei Wednesday to his agency's 35 board-member nations, which "is expected to say Iran has expanded enrichment activities instead of freezing them."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/21, A6) reports Bush administration officials "dismissed Iran's unusually conciliatory comments." White House spokesman Tony Snow called Ahmadinejad's pledge a "false offer," noting the Administration "hopes to push for new sanctions next month." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (2/21, Sands, 88K) reports State Department spokesman Tom Casey "said intensive negotiations are already under way" among the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council "about a new resolution imposing new penalties and restrictions on Iran." Moscow and Beijing "have been reluctant to back the Bush administration's hard line on Iran," but US officials "were encouraged by reports this week that Russia may delay the delivery of fuel for a planned nuclear plant it is building for Iran."

The Financial Times (2/21, Dombey) reports, "Many western diplomats question why Iran is accelerating its enrichment activities while Bushehr, the nuclear power plant the uranium is intended to feed, is behind schedule and was delayed further this week because of Iran's alleged failure to pay its Russian contractors." In an interview with the Times, ElBaradei said, "Iran sees enrichment...as a strategic goal because they feel that this will bring them power, prestige and influence. They feel that this will bring them into the company of some of the large and influential [states], the 12, 13 countries with enrichment processing, even if they don't have a weapon."

Experts Urge West To "Ratchet Up The Pressure" On Iran, Not Talk. Danielle Pletka and Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute write in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, A17, 2.04M) about how the West will respond to today's missed deadline. Earlier this month, they note, "Sir Richard Dalton, until recently Britain's ambassador in Tehran, called for direct talks between US and Iranian officials and suggested the West modify demands that the Islamic Republic suspend uranium enrichment. Unfortunately, his eagerness for dialogue is being echoed and amplified elsewhere, especially in the wake of the Bush administration's deal to pay North Korea for similar disarmament." However, Pletka and Rubin insist that "to change course now would signal the impotence of international institutions and multilateral diplomacy. History shows that when the supreme leader believes Western resolve is faltering, Iran will be more defiant and dangerous. Now is not the time to talk. If Washington and Europe truly believe in the primacy of multilateralism and diplomacy, now is the time to ratchet up the pressure."

US Commander Says Navy Buildup Came After Moves By Iran. In an interview with the AP (2/21, Krane), US Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh, the top US Navy commander in the Mideast, said Iran "has brought its war games maneuvers over the past year into busy shipping lanes in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow mouth of the Persian Gulf through." These moves "have alarmed US officials about possible accidental confrontations that could boil over into war, and led to a recent build-up of Navy forces in the Gulf," Walsh said. Although the additional US firepower "has ratcheted up tensions with Iran," Walsh "said the increase aims to reassure Arab allies in the Gulf and prevent misunderstandings that could escalate into outright conflict."

Rice Seeks Arab Support For Abbas. AFP (2/21, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Tuesday held talks in Jordan with intelligence chiefs of four Arab states "seen as crucial in backing Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his power struggle with the radical Islamic group Hamas." Rice also briefed Jordan's King Abdullah II on her meeting Monday in Jerusalem with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Rice's Mideast initiative "has been undermined by the power-sharing deal brokered by Saudi Arabia earlier this month which caught the US administration by surprise," according to a senior US official. The deal "infuriated Israel and almost torpedoed Monday's summit," officials said. However, while Rice "succeeded in bringing the meeting off and gaining a pledge by Olmert and Abbas to continue talking, tensions were apparent when neither man appeared at her side for the reading of a joint statement."

The Washington Post (2/21, A12, Kessler, 690K) says the "lackluster outcome of the Israeli-Palestinian summit brokered by Rice in Jerusalem on Monday suggests" the Secretary's earlier "optimism may be misplaced." While, "diplomats and Middle East experts applaud her willingness to invest her prestige in trying to solve an intractable problem," others "wonder whether her efforts are six years too late." However, Rice "insists that the conditions have never been better for peace." One Rice aide "conceded that there is 'diplomatic risk' to Rice forging ahead, but European officials are thrilled that she is now trying ideas they have long urged." A senior European official said Tuesday that "just the fact that Rice did not cancel the meeting in the face of Israeli resistance was a signal, because the administration has had a pattern of halting peace efforts at the first sign of trouble."

Israel Threatens To End Talks With Abbas. The AP (2/21, Gearan) reports Israel said Tuesday "it would stop dealing with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas if he goes ahead with plans to join Hamas in a new government." Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, "ruled out any talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he went ahead with plans to form a new Cabinet including Hamas." Israeli talks with Abbas "would be limited to matters such as improving living conditions for the Palestinians and ending Palestinian attacks against Israel."

The Washington Times (2/21, Kralev, 88K) reports Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said the agreements between Hamas and Fatah "disappoint all who supported separating the extremists from the moderates and creating an alternative government in the Palestinian Authority."

Palestinian Factions Struggle To Maintain Truce. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, A9, Simpson, 2.04M) reports representatives of Hamas and Fatah both "acknowledged in separate interviews yesterday that tensions remain high and that there have been multiple breaches of their accord. Still, they said their fears about open warfare erupting anew were based on political and diplomatic processes far beyond the streets where their men maintain a tense standoff." One key factor, which remains unclear, "is whether Saudi Arabia will abide by its pledge to supply $1 billion to the new unity government. If it does, it is possible Mr. Abbas could continue to press ahead with Hamas even if the US and Israel shun the Palestinian government." US officials "also have declined to say whether they are pressuring the Saudi regime to freeze that pledge." Meanwhile, Secretary Rice "is in a precarious position. If she pushes too hard, she could create an even greater backlash across the region and beyond, since the deal has brought an end to Palestinian bloodshed."

Mecca Accord Added To Challenge US Faces In Brokering Peace Deal. The New York Times (2/21, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) says the Mecca accord "added to the already formidable challenge the United States faces as it tries to accomplish another strategic goal: getting the Palestinians and Israelis back to the negotiating table for peace talks for the first time in six years." The pact "largely torpedoed the American-sponsored meeting on Monday," leaving the Times to question, "So why did Saudi Arabia broker a power-sharing agreement" between Hamas and Fatah "at the same time that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had decided to try to revive peace talks?" One reason, it says, is that Saudi "wanted to help end the Palestinian-on-Palestinian violence," but "another big reason, analysts said, is that the war in Iraq has intensified the split between Sunnis and Shiites, and deepened a power struggle between the Sunni royal family of Saudi Arabia, and Iran, which is largely Shiite." Although the US is "rooting for the Saudis in that power struggle, the two countries have some distinctly different ideas about how Saudi Arabia should fight for its leadership role in the region."

Congress Places Hold On Palestinian Aid. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Richter, 850K) reports Congress is "holding up $86 million that the Bush administration is seeking to strengthen the security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, in a new setback for the administration's efforts in the region." Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-NY), chairwoman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, has put a hold on the funding, "saying she is not convinced the money will go to train and equip Abbas' security forces, as promised." Other lawmakers, including Democrats and Republicans, "have voiced concern that the money could end up in the hands of Hamas."

NYTimes Calls Jerusalem Meeting A "Charade." In an editorial, the New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) writes, "It speaks volumes when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flies to Jerusalem to try to revive peace talks between Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority and cannot even get the two to show up when she reads out the content-free joint statement to which they have grudgingly agreed." The Times says the talks "reminds us of the six feckless years during which the Bush administration has squandered America's once commanding prestige in the region" and "portrays a secretary of state who clearly arrived with no new ideas -- and no idea of how to wheedle or pressure either side into making any of the compromises needed to stimulate the dangerously moribund peace effort." Rice's "diplomatic default was all the keener since this just might have been a moment for breaking the stalemate that has prevailed since Hamas won control of the Palestinian Parliament last year," the Times adds.

Ignatius Says US-Brokered Deal Will Help America's Image. The Washington Post's (2/21, A15) David Ignatius writes, "We are in the ditch in the Middle East. As bad as you think it is watching TV, it's worse. It's not just Iraq but the whole pattern of America's dealings with the Arab world. People aren't just angry at America – they've been that way to varying degrees since I first came here [Qatar] 27 years ago. What's worse is that they're giving up on us -- on our ability to make good decisions, to solve problems, to play the role of honest broker." To "get back on the road," Ignatius says, the US "must broker a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute." In order to achieve a settlement, he says Secretary Rice must insist that "America is a mediator in this conflict" and "its positions are independent of either side, and it is willing to talk to all parties to achieve peace."

Egypt Urged To Release Imprisoned Bloggers. Raja M. Kamal, an associate dean at the University of Chicago, and Tom G. Palmer, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute, writes in a Washington Post (2/21, A15, 690K) op-ed that "sincere friends of Egypt" should "call on the government to drop the charges" two bloggers critical of the regime, saying "it is the right thing to do, and it is the best thing for Egypt's standing in the modern world." Egypt, they note, is a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which guarantees the "freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media." Therefore, Kamal and Palmer argue, "Blogging should not be a crime."

Polish, Czech Officials Rebuff Moscow's Threats Over US Missile Plan. The New York Times (2/21, A6, Kramer, 1.16M) reports officials in the Czech Republic and Poland "vowed Tuesday that they would not be intimidated by Russia, a day after a general in Moscow declared that nuclear weapons could be aimed at their countries if they allowed the Bush administration to build ballistic missile defenses within their borders." In an interview on Polish radio, Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski dismissed the Russian threats as "clearly an attempt to intimidate." Meanwhile, the Czech foreign minister, Karel Schwarzenberg, said, "The Czechs will now think the shield is even more necessary." The Times says the dispute is "another sign of how quickly relations between Russia and Eastern Europe have been disrupted, descending this week and last into ominous talk of nuclear and military leverage reminiscent of the cold war."

The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Finn, 690K) says the "increasingly angry dispute" is "adding strain to already fragile US-Russian relations." Relations between the US and Russia "had already taken a hit this month when Russian President Vladimir Putin lashed out at Washington for its unilateral approach."

The Financial Times (2/21, Cienski, Anderson) notes that "while the right-of centre governments in Warsaw and Prague are keen to begin negotiations with Washington, opinion polls show opponents of the US bases significantly outnumber supporters." However, "Sweeteners could come in the form of a US decision to waive visas for Poles and Czechs, as well as money to modernise the countries armed forces."

Hadley Departs For Moscow. The AP (2/21) reports President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, is embarking "on a high-level mission to Moscow and other European capitals, just over a week after incendiary remarks about Bush and the United States by Russian President Vladimir Putin." Stephen Hadley departed Tuesday for a four-day trip to Brussels, Moscow and Berlin, according to NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe. In Brussels, Hadley planned to meet with NATO and European Union officials. In Moscow and Berlin, he was scheduled to sit down with his counterparts in the Russian and German governments. Although the trip has been planned for weeks, it "comes at a particularly delicate time in the Washington-Moscow relationship, meaning the Russian portion of his travels would be the most closely watched."

UN Approves Somalia Peacekeeping Force. The New York Times (2/21, A3, 1.16M) reports briefly that the U.N. Security Council Tuesday "authorized the dispatch of an African Union peacekeeping force to Somalia to help stabilize the country so a United Nations operation can take over in six months." The British-drafted resolution "urges African countries to furnish troops" and demands "guarantees of safety and access for international aid workers." Meanwhile, in Mogadishu Tuesday, the Washington Post/AP (2/21, A11) reports mortar rounds and rockets hit "in a series of attacks that killed 15 people and wounded more than 40, doctors and witnesses said." The violence, which targeted the presidential palace and seaport, was "among the worst since a two-week war in December."

In a news analysis, the New York Times (2/21, A3, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Nearly every day, government forces and insurgents shell each other across Mogadishu's already dilapidated neighborhoods, scattering bodies and any remaining traces of hope. Gun prices are soaring and more clans are joining the underground, while an outbreak of cholera sweeps the countryside." Though it "is hard to believe," Somalia is "actually becoming a more violent and chaotic place. That is not how it was supposed to be. Nearly two months ago, an internationally-supported transitional government ousted the Islamist forces and steamed into Mogadishu…with great expectations. But confidence in the government -- never very high -- is rapidly bleeding away." Somalia now "seems to be just shy of total collapse -- again -- because the Ethiopian troops who provided the muscle to throw out the Islamists are withdrawing, yet none of the peacekeepers promised from other African countries have arrived."

EU Ministers Pledge Steep Emissions Cut If US And Others Join Effort. The New York Times (2/21, Kanter, 1.16M) reports, "Seeking to persuade other nations to curb greenhouse gas emissions, European Union ministers pledged Tuesday to raise their own targets if industrialized countries like the United States made similar efforts." EU "governments would be ready to cut emissions 30 percent below 1990 levels by 2020, from a current pledge of 20 percent, but only if other heavy polluters joined in, said Sigmar Gabriel, the German environment minister, who led a meeting in Brussels that formally endorsed the European targets." The "pledges, which match a proposal made by the European Commission last month, are signs that nations are gearing up for new negotiations on a global climate accord after 2012, when the first period covered by the Kyoto Protocol expires. The issue is expected to be on the agenda when Germany serves as host of a meeting in June of the Group of 8 nations." EU "countries are hoping to win pledges from big developing countries as well, including China and India."

The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/21) reports, "European Union environment ministers agreed Tuesday on an ambitious effort to cut greenhouse gas emissions to 20% below 1990 levels, a goal likely to lead to mandatory limits for cars." They "said the target could be pushed to 30% if other industrialized countries sign on to a global effort." The "target, which must be approved at an EU summit next month to become official, is a crucial first step in a global warming strategy that must be in place by the time the Kyoto Protocol expires in 2012." President Bush has kept the US "out of the Kyoto treaty, saying it would harm the U.S. economy. The Bush administration has said it is committed instead to advancing and investing in new technologies to combat global warming."

Experts Cast Doubt On Carbon Capture Technology. The New York Times (2/21, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "Within the next few years, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants to meet growing electricity demands. Despite expectations that global warming rules are coming, almost none of the plants will be built to capture" carbon dioxide. The Times adds, "Environmentalists are worried, but they put their faith in a technology that gasifies the coal before burning. Such plants are designed, they say, to be more adaptable to separating the carbon and storing it underground. Most utility officials counter that the gasification approach is more expensive and less reliable, but they say there is no need to worry because their tried-and-true method, known as pulverized coal, can also be equipped later with hardware to capture the global warming gas." However, "influential technical experts are casting doubts on both approaches." A major new study "concludes in a draft version that it is not clear which technology -- the so-called integrated gasification combined cycle or pulverized coal — will allow for the easiest carbon capture, because so much engineering work remains to be done."

UK Climate Change Study Said To Be "Right For The Wrong Reasons." New York Times (2/21, 1.16M) columnist David Leonhardt writes, "Last week, Sir Nicholas Stern, a top adviser to the British government, came to the United States to talk about climate change. In October, a commission he led released a 700-page report calling for 'urgent action' against global warming to prevent economic damage that could rival that of the world wars and the Great Depression." In "the minds of a lot of American economists, however, the review is a badly flawed piece of work." Critics' "main objection revolved around something called the discount rate. The Stern Review assumed that a dollar of economic damage prevented a century from now (adjusted for inflation) is roughly as valuable as a dollar spent reducing emissions today." "Technically," Leonhardt writes, "Sir Nicholas's opponents win the debate. But in practical terms, their argument has a weak link. They are assuming that the economic gains from, say, education will make future generations rich enough to make up for any damage caused by climate change." But "[n]o one knows whether this is true, let alone desirable, because no one knows what life will be like on a planet that is five degrees hotter." Focusing attention on "the catastrophic risks of climate change...is Sir Nicholas's biggest accomplishment, whatever you think of his math." As one critic "puts it, the Stern Review is 'right for the wrong reasons.'"

Global Warming Already "Bringing Misery" To Bangladeshi Village. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Chu, 850K) reports from a village in Bangladesh, "Global warming has a taste in this village. It is the taste of salt." Warmer "weather and rising oceans are sending seawater surging up Bangladesh's rivers in greater volume and frequency than ever before, experts say, overflowing and seeping into the soil and water supply of thousands of people. Their lives are being squeezed by distant lands they have seen only on television — America, China and Russia at the top of the list — whose carbon emissions are pushing temperatures and sea levels upward." The Times adds, "Earlier this month, a long-awaited report by the United Nations said global warming fueled by human activity could lift temperatures by 8 degrees and the ocean's surface by 23 inches by 2100. Here in southwestern Bangladesh, the bleak future forecast by the report is already becoming reality, bringing misery along with it."

Campaign Urges End To Slavery. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Lampman, 59K) reports on the "The Amazing Change" campaign which "encourages people to sign a petition to end modern-day slavery, donate to the cause, and learn how they can take an active part in the movement." While slavery "takes different forms today, the impact remains devastating to lives around the globe," according to UN and US government statistics. The Monitor notes that "an estimated 300,000 children have been forced to serve as child soldiers in more than 30 conflicts. Each year, human trafficking for sexual servitude or forced labor moves 800,000 people across international borders, including some 17,500 foreigners trafficked into the United States. Some 200,000 people are considered to live enslaved in the US."

Kidnappings Paralyze Haitian Capitol. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Roig-Franzia, 690K) reports, "Despite the presence of thousands of U.N. troops and a new military offensive to root out gangs, armed thugs still rule much" of Port-Au-Prince, Haiti, where "a swarm of recent kidnappings is terrorizing residents and scaring away foreign investment." Haiti's government has been "powerless to stop the crisis," and international advisers "describe the police force and judicial system as critically dysfunctional and profoundly corrupt." The U.N., "which is engaged in background checks of police that officials believe could lead to the dismissal of 1,000 corrupt officers, is now overseeing the largest military operation to defeat gangs since being deployed here in 2004," and U.N. officials "hope to stem the flow of kidnap ransoms to gangs."

Weed's Biodiesel Potential Kindles Hope In Africa. The Washington Times (2/21, Palmer, 88K) reports, "Jatropha, a scruffy bush producing dry, black nuts, is triggering a scramble for land in Africa, with Norwegian, Indian and British companies looking to producing clean-burning biodiesel for cars and trucks." The Times adds, "Long used as nothing more than living fences meant to hold back the encroaching Sahara and Kalahari deserts, jatropha oil, the evidence shows, burns cleaner than fossil fuels. That, in turn, has experimental plantations popping up in Africa from Kenya to Ghana to South Africa." With "the growing attention of major oil distributors, jatropha is the little plant that could lift African farmers from lives of poverty and the continent into a fuel oil producer. ... It could, however, go the way of the emu farm: just another expensive farming fad that went bust instead of boom."

Court: Detainees Can't Challenge Cases (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer
AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134495

In a victory for President Bush, a divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Guantanamo Bay detainees cannot use the U.S. court system to challenge their indefinite imprisonment. A Supreme Court appeal was promised.

The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit dismisses hundreds of cases filed by foreign-born detainees in federal court and also threatens to strip away court access to millions of lawful permanent residents currently in the United States.

It upholds a key provision of the Military Commissions Act, which Bush pushed through Congress last year to set up a Defense Department system to prosecute terrorism suspects. Now, detainees must prove to three-officer military panels that they don't pose a terror threat.

Democrats newly in charge of Congress promised legislation aimed at giving detainees legal rights. Attorneys for detainees said they would appeal Tuesday's ruling to the Supreme Court.

"We're disappointed," said Shayana Kadidal of the Center for Constitutional Rights. "The bottom line is that according to two of the federal judges, the president can do whatever he wants without any legal limitations as long as he does it offshore."

The two judges voting with the White House — Judge A. Raymond Randolph and Judge David B. Sentelle — were appointed by Republicans. President Reagan appointed Sentelle, and President George H.W. Bush appointed Randolph. The dissenter, Judge Judith W. Rogers, was appointed by President Clinton, a Democrat.

White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino called the decision "a significant win" for the administration and said the Military Commissions Act provides "sufficient and fair access to courts for these detainees."

At the Justice Department, attorneys urged Chief Justice John G. Roberts to deny legal relief to Guantanamo prisoners. They also said that in the case of Sharaf al-Sanani, a Yemeni being held at Guantanamo, the government was no longer obligated to explain why he was being detained.

About 395 detainees are currently being held at the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba. The first prisoners arrived more than five years ago, after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

At issue is the right of habeas corpus, a basic tenet of the Constitution protecting detainees from unlawful imprisonment. Twice before, the Supreme Court ruled that right gave Guantanamo detainees full access to courts.

But in their latest ruling last June, justices suggested the president could ask Congress for more anti-terrorism authority, prompting passage of the commissions act that in part stripped federal court review.

Randolph, writing for the majority, said the new commissions act clearly blocked court access and was constitutional because a "foreign entity without property or presence in this country has no constitutional rights."

"The arguments are creative but not cogent. To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress," Randolph wrote in the 25-page opinion, which was joined by Sentelle.

In dissent, Rogers said the cases should proceed. She argued that the military hearings — known as Combatant Status Review Tribunals, or CSRTs — deprive detainees of critical due process rights provided by the Constitution by putting the legal burden on detainees to prove they aren't terrorist threats.

"District courts are well able to adjust these proceedings in light of the government's significant interests in guarding national security," Rogers wrote. "More significant still, continued detention may be justified by a CSRT on the basis of evidence resulting from torture."

Under the commissions act, the government may indefinitely detain foreigners who have been designated as "enemy combatants" and authorizes the CIA to use aggressive but undefined interrogation tactics.

A spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy had prioritized a bill that would restore detainees' legal rights, noting that some 12 million lawful permanent residents currently in the U.S. could also be stripped of rights if they were ever designated as "enemy combatants."

Leahy was referring to the case of Ali Saleh Kahlah Al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar, who was arrested in 2001 as an "enemy combatant" while studying in the United States. The Justice Department says the commissions law should apply to immigrants such as him, and the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., is expected to issue a ruling soon.

A provision restoring detainees' rights, introduced by Leahy and then-Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., narrowly failed last year on a 48-51 vote.

DOJ_NMG_0134496

"The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness," Leahy said in a statement.

But Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, who helped draft the new commission law, heralded the ruling as "respecting the will of Congress."

"The detainees held at Guantanamo Bay do not have an unfettered constitutional right," he said. "In fact, the legal and humane actions of the U.S. government stand in stark contrast to our al-Qaeda enemies who behead those they capture."

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, said he will launch a congressional review to determine whether military hearings offer detainees legal protections to which they are entitled.

"The last thing that we would want is to convict an individual for terrorism and then have that conviction overturned because of fatal flaws in the military commissions law passed in the previous Congress," Skelton said.

Jonathan Hafetz, an attorney at the Brennan Center for Justice, said the ruling sends the wrong message about justice to U.S. citizens and the international community. Ultimately, it will be the Supreme Court that will have to sort out the legal mess, he said.

"It's a terrible ruling that contradicts centuries of Anglo-American history and allows the indefinite detention of innocent people without charge or judicial review," Hafetz said.

Court Rejects Detainees' Cases (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A federal appeals court closed the courthouse doors to prisoners held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, ruling that legislation passed late last year eliminated their right to challenge their indefinite detention.

The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit tossed out dozens of pending cases, and was the latest -- although perhaps not the last -- swing of the pendulum on prisoner rights at Guantanamo. The impassioned language of the majority and dissenting opinions, both citing dueling historical precedents, illustrated the divide over the Constitution's relevance to the war on terrorism.

For Judge A. Raymond Randolph, who wrote the majority opinion, the case represented a vindication. In a 2003 ruling, he backed President Bush's claim that Guantanamo prisoners had no rights before federal courts, only to be reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court the following year. The pattern repeated in 2005, when he ruled that Guantanamo prisoner Salim Hamdan had no right to contest the legitimacy of the military trial the Bush administration set up for him -- a ruling likewise overturned within a year when the Supreme Court found that the president had exceeded his powers by acting outside congressional authorization. Congress followed by passing the Military Commissions Act, extending to prisoners some rights Mr. Bush initially had sought to deny, but stripping courts of jurisdiction to hear their habeas corpus claims, a typical right of prisoners to challenge the legitimacy of their detention.

"Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan," Judge Randolph wrote. Noting the act applies to all detainee claims "without exception," he wrote, "It is almost as if the proponents of these words were slamming their fists on the table shouting, 'When we say "all," we mean all -- without exception!'"

In dissent, Judge Judith Rogers wrote that this time, it was Congress that had exceeded its authority. The Constitution provides that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." Neither had occurred, she wrote, and Congress hadn't followed its practice during the four prior times it suspended habeas, most recently in Hawaii during World War II.

The decision is certain to be appealed to the Supreme Court, but even if the justices agree to hear the case, they are unlikely to do so before the court's next term, which begins in October.

On Capitol Hill, several lawmakers are proposing to restore some rights to Guantanamo prisoners. The Senate Judiciary Committee's chairman, Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) and ranking Republican, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, have introduced legislation restoring habeas corpus rights. A separate bill by Sen. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) would go further, limiting the president's power to designate prisoners as "enemy combatants" to those captured in conflict zones. Several Guantanamo prisoners were captured far from the battlefield, in some cases arrested by their home governments and delivered to U.S. agents.

Guantanamo Challenges Rejected (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a victory for President Bush in his global war on terrorism, a divided federal appeals court ruled today that the suspected enemy combatants at the Guantanamo Bay detention camp in Cuba had no right to challenge their imprisonment in U.S. courts.

In a 2-to-1 vote, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held that the detainees had no access to U.S. courts because they were taken into custody overseas and held in a facility over which U.S. courts have no authority.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph for himself and Judge David Sentelle.

In her dissent, Judge Judith W. Rogers said Congress had no constitutional authority to deny individuals held by the U.S. government access to the federal courts.

Today's ruling will not be the last challenge to be lodged by the detainees. They will almost surely appeal to the Supreme Court.

Meanwhile, Congress, which has shifted from Republican control to Democratic since it passed the law under which the appeals court ruled, can repeal that law, although Bush would be likely to veto such a measure.

In an action urgently sought by Bush, Congress last fall passed the Military Commissions Act, which barred detainees from challenging their status in civilian U.S. courts. The Military Commissions Act was Congress' second attempt to validate the administration's effort to bring the detainees to trial at military tribunals.

The first was the Detainee Treatment Act, passed in 2005 after the Supreme Court had ruled that the detainees, with no charges having been filed against them, could not be held indefinitely at Guantanamo.

The Detainee Treatment Act held that "no court, justice or judge" had jurisdiction over the detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

After a legal challenge, the Supreme Court ruled that the measure did not apply to challenges to detainee status that were already in progress when the law was passed.

Congress then passed the Military Commissions Act, which the three-judge panel of the appeals court upheld.

To accept the detainees' arguments, wrote Randolph, "would be to defy the will of Congress."

Court Hands Bush Win In Gitmo Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A federal appeals court panel yesterday, in a 2-1 vote, upheld a key provision of anti-terrorism legislation signed by President Bush that blocks prisoners at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention in U.S. district courts.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph in the 25-page majority ruling, which was supported by Judge David B. Sentelle.

In a key victory for the White House in its war on terrorism, Judge Randolph, named to the bench by President Reagan, and Judge Sentelle, appointed by President George Bush, argued that Congress had successfully stripped the detainees of their right to seek a hearing through a writ of habeas corpus.

"The arguments are creative, but not cogent," Judge Randolph said in response to appeals by two detainees who asked the court to consider their unlawful-detention appeals.

"To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress. ... It is almost as if the proponents of these words were slamming their fists on the table shouting 'When we say "all," we mean all -- without exception!' " he said.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruling will deny court hearings for hundreds of Guantanamo detainees with cases pending.

The dissenting opinion was written by Judge Judith W. Rogers, a Clinton appointee, who said the Defense Department had failed to create a fair substitute outside the federal courts where those detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could challenge their detention.

"While judgments of military necessity are entitled to deference by the courts, and while temporary custody during wartime may be justified in order properly to process those who have been captured, the executive has had ample opportunity during the past five years during which the detainees have been held at Guantanamo Bay to determine who is being held and for what reason," she said.

Congress passed the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which the president signed into law on Oct. 17. It said no court, justice or judge has jurisdiction to consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus by or on behalf of an alien detained as an enemy combatant. The Defense Department is holding 395 enemy combatants at Guantanamo.

White House spokesman Dana Perino called the ruling a "significant win" for the administration, adding that the Military Commissions Act provides "sufficient and fair access to courts for these detainees."

Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said the decision "reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established" in permitting Guantanamo detainees to challenge their detention through military hearings coordinated by the Defense Department.

Attorneys for the detainees said they were "disappointed" in the ruling and would appeal it to the Supreme Court.

"The bottom line is that according to two of the federal judges, the president can do whatever he wants without any legal limitations as long as he does it offshore," said Shayana Kadidal of the Center for Constitutional Rights.

No Federal Court For Guantanamo Detainees (CSM)

By Warren Richey And Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

Detainees being held at the prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have lost their bid for access to US courts to challenge their open-ended detention in the war on terror.

In an important ruling announced Tuesday, a divided federal appeals court panel here dismissed cases filed by 63 detainees raising fundamental legal challenges to various aspects of the Bush administration's approach to the war.

The ruling applies to every pending or future case – in effect closing all but a few doors to the courthouse for those being held at Guantanamo.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," the appeals court declared.

The ruling is expected to be quickly appealed – perhaps to the full US Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia – or directly to the US Supreme Court.

"This is just a stop along the way to the Supreme Court," says David Remes, a lawyer at Covington and Burling in Washington, D.C., who represents 17 Yemenis being held at Guantanamo.

At the center of the appeals case was the assertion that the newly enacted Military Commissions Act of 2006 (MCA) was an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Lawyers for the detainees argued that their clients enjoyed a constitutional right to challenge their open-ended detention before a neutral judge. If the Bush administration's position prevailed, they said, it would mean that terror suspects at Guantanamo could be tossed into a legal black hole.

DOJ_NMG_0134499

Two of the three appeals-court judges disagreed. They ruled that Congress did not violate constitutional protections when it passed the MCA. The law was approved in part to overturn last summer's decision by the Supreme Court in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which overturned the military commission process proposed by the administration. Congress later passed the MCA.

"Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan. Everyone, that is, except the detainees," writes Judge Raymond Randolph in an opinion joined by Judge David Sentelle.

Judge Randolph says the detainee arguments are "creative but not cogent." He adds, "To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress."

In a dissent, Judge Judith Rogers said that she agrees that Congress attempted to withdraw federal court jurisdiction to detainee cases by passing the MCA. But she says Congress violated the suspension clause of the Constitution when it passed the law. The suspension clause says that those held by the US government have a right to challenge the legality of their detentions in court unless Congress has specifically suspended that right because of rebellion or invasion.

"The suspension clause is a limitation on the powers of Congress," Judge Rogers writes. "It is only by misreading the historical record and ignoring the Supreme Court's well-considered and binding dictum in Rasul v. Bush" that the court can conclude that it lacks jurisdiction to hear the detainees' cases.

In that decision, the Supreme Court ruled that some rights extend to detainees at Guantanamo. But the court did not detail the extent of those rights.

Most analysts emphasized the interim nature of the ruling. They view the 25-page panel opinion and 34-page dissent as a prelude to a major constitutional showdown at the nation's highest court.

"What's critical is [that] this case is going to the Supreme Court for final resolution," says Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond Law School. "We have a very splintered DC Circuit opinion."

Richard Samp, chief counsel at the Washington Legal Foundation, praised the appeals court ruling as "sound." But he too predicts the case is headed to high court.

"The issue of who does the writ of habeas corpus apply to has divided a lot of legal scholars and is something that is up in the air and will have to be decided," he says.

About 400 detainees are currently held at Guantanamo. According to MSNBC.com, 110 are labeled ready for release. Among the others, only several dozen are likely to face trial before special organized military commissions. For those remaining, there appears to be no end in sight to their detention.

Writing for the panel, Judge Randolph said that Congress could not have been clearer about its intent when it passed the Military Commission Act. The law says the repeal of habeas jurisdiction in Guantanamo cases applies in all cases without exception. "It is almost as if the proponents of these words were slamming their fists on the table shouting, "When we say 'all,' we mean all – without exception!"

Court Blow For Guantánamo Prisoners (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Prisoners at Guantánamo Bay cannot challenge their imprisonment at the US detention facility, an appeals court said on Tuesday, in delivering a significant legal victory to the White House.

The DC court of appeals ruled 2-1 that recent legislation precluded prisoners at the Cuba-based prison from contesting their detention in US civilian courts. The ruling comes as the Pentagon prepares to bring several detainees before the military commissions.

Congress passed the Military Commissions Act last year after the Supreme Court ruled that the original structure of the military commissions were unconstitutional. But the MCA also stripped detainees of habeas corpus - the right to appeal their detention in the US civil court system.

DOJ_NMG_0134500

In dismissing the case brought by inmates at Guantánamo contesting their imprisonment, Judge Randolph Raymond wrote Tuesday that the detainees had provided arguments that were "creative but not cogent", and that accepting them "would be to defy the will of Congress".

Human rights groups and lawyers for the detainees have argued that the MCA violates the constitution, which says habeas can only be suspended in cases of "rebellion or invasion". But Judge Raymond concluded that Congress was not obliged to provide the same standard for non-US citizens.

But Judge Judith Rogers, in a dissenting opinion, wrote that her colleagues had misconstrued the ability of Congress to suspend the right in the case of the Guantánamo detainees. She said Congress was obliged to provide an "dequate alternative remedy" under the constitution, but had not done so.

"The MCA is therefore void and does not deprive this court or the district courts of jurisdiction," she wrote.

Lawyers for the detainees said Tuesday they would appeal to the Supreme Court. Human rights experts said the ruling underscored the need for Congress to reinstate the right for detainees.

"The ruling highlights the need for Congress to act - and to do so quickly - to restore what is amongst the most important checks on executive overreaching," said Jennifer Daskal, Washington advocacy director at Human Rights Watch.

Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, the top Democrat and Republican lawmakers on the Senate judiciary committee, have introduced legislation that would restore the right of habeas to detainees at Guantanamo.

"I believe the dissenting opinion will be upheld because the Supreme Court has already ruled that detainees have habeas corpus rights even though they are at Guantanamo Bay," Mr Specter said yesterday. "While it will take the Supreme Court at least a year to decide the issue, the Congress could resolve it promptly by enacting the Leahy/Specter bill which restores habeas corpus rights."

Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican senator who was instrumental in the move to strip habeas rights, yesterday welcomed the decision, which he said would prevent "frivolous" lawsuits.

"Never in the history of warfare have enemy prisoners been able to bring lawsuits about their detention," said Mr Graham. "Thousands of Germans and Japanese soldiers were captured and held by the military during World War II. Not one case was allowed in federal court where they were allowed to sue for their release. Our rules for the War on Terror should be no different."

Human Rights First said the ruling ran "counter to one of the most important checks on unbridled executive power enshrined in the US Constitution".

"If allowed to stand, this ruling would permit the government to hold prisoners, potentially indefinitely, without having to show to a court of law why the person has been detained," said Hina Shamsi of Human Rights First. "US courts are well able to decide detention cases that raise both national security and individual liberties concerns."

Court Endorses Law's Curbs On Detainees (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — A divided federal appeals court on Tuesday upheld a new law stripping federal judges of authority to review foreign prisoners' challenges to their detention at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The decision set the stage for a third trip to the Supreme Court for the detainees, who will once again ask the justices to consider a complex issue that tests the balance of power among the White House, Congress and the courts in the murky context of the fight against international terrorism.

It also prompted some senior Democratic lawmakers, who have fought the Bush administration on the matter before and who now hold sway in Congress, to vow enactment of a law more favorable to the prisoners.

The Supreme Court previously ruled twice that federal statutes empowered the courts to consider Guantánamo prisoners' habeas corpus petitions challenging the grounds for their detention. In response to those rulings, Congress twice rewrote law to limit the detainees' avenues of appeal. The most recent rewriting was at issue in Tuesday's 2-to-1 decision.

That law, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, was signed by President Bush last October. Its enactment followed the Supreme Court's rejection of his administration's earlier arguments that the right of habeas corpus — the fundamental right, centuries old, to ask a judge for release from unjust imprisonment — did not apply to foreigners being held outside the United States as enemy combatants.

The new law explicitly eliminated the federal courts' jurisdiction over habeas challenges by such prisoners. It instead set up military panels to review the justification of detention in individual cases, with limited right of appeal to the courts afterward.

In its ruling Tuesday, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that the new law did not violate the constitutional provision that bars the government from suspending habeas corpus except in "cases of rebellion or invasion." Two of the three appeals court judges, citing Supreme Court and other historical precedent, held that the right of habeas corpus did not extend to foreign citizens detained outside the United States.

The majority decision was written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, whose two earlier opinions on habeas corpus and Guantánamo prisoners had also favored the Bush administration. Those opinions were reversed by the Supreme Court, but on statutory grounds rather than constitutional ones.

The dissenting judge on Tuesday, Judith W. Rogers, said the new law did violate the constitutional provision restricting the suspension of habeas corpus.

Administration officials welcomed the decision as a vindication of its position on the rights of detainees, after years of its halting efforts to create a legal process that would withstand tests in court.

"The decision," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, "reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the Military Commissions Act permitting Guantánamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said at his daily news briefing, "The court decided the position that we put forward." He declined to say more.

Lawyers representing the detainees vowed to seek a new review by the Supreme Court.

Shayana Kadidal, a lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, said, "This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore."

Mr. Kadidal said the ruling encouraged "a contempt for international human rights law" and "such notorious practices as extraordinary rendition": sending terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation, where, rights advocates say, they may face torture.

Democrats now in control of Congress said they would move quickly on legislation they recently introduced that would unambiguously give federal courts the right to consider detainees' habeas petitions.

"The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who heads the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Last week Mr. Leahy joined a group of other Senate Democrats, including Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, in introducing the legislation restoring habeas rights for the Guantánamo prisoners. Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, also endorsed that measure last week, and said Tuesday that he believed the dissent from the new appeals court decision would ultimately prevail in the Supreme Court.

But other Republican lawmakers, including Senators John Cornyn of Texas and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, both of whom also serve on the committee, applauded the ruling.

The decision, Lakhdar Boumediene v. George W. Bush, involved a consolidation of the cases of 63 detainees, all from foreign countries, who had sought review in two federal district courts. One judge had ruled that she had the authority to consider the cases, while another had ruled that he did not, and granted the administration's motion to dismiss the inmates' habeas petitions.

Writing for the appeals court, Judge Randolph first turned to the statutory issue. He said arguments put forward by the detainees' lawyers that the new law was not meant to apply to the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay "are creative but not cogent." Congress, he said, clearly meant to keep the federal courts from considering the detainees' cases.

Turning to the question of whether Congress had acted within the Constitution, he said there had been no earlier cases in which a court had granted a habeas corpus petition for a foreign national held at an overseas military base. The Constitution, he said, "does not confer rights on aliens without property or presence within the United States."

The opinion was also signed by Judge David B. Sentelle.

In her dissent, Judge Rogers said: "Prior to the enactment of the Military Commissions Act, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the detainees held at Guantánamo had a statutory right to habeas corpus. The M.C.A. purports to withdraw that right but does so in a manner that offends the constitutional constraint on suspension."

Administration Backed On Detainees (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 21, 2007

A federal appeals panel handed the Bush administration a victory Tuesday in the long legal battle over foreign "enemy combatants" held without trial at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit ruled 2-1 that hundreds of prisoners have no right to challenge their detention in federal court.

The decision upholds a law pushed through Congress in October after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down President Bush's plan to try detainees in military commissions. The high court ruled that the commissions were not authorized by federal law. It was the second time the justices had sided with the detainees on the issue of their right to challenge their detention in the courts.

Tuesday's ruling on the new Military Commissions Act sets up a third Supreme Court showdown.

"This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it off shore," said Shayana Kadidal, attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees and plans an immediate appeal. "The matter will have to be resolved by the Supreme Court for a third time."

The Military Commissions Act allows the government to detain "enemy combatants" indefinitely. Its most criticized provision prevents detainees from challenging the legality of their detention in U.S. courts. Instead, under the law, military panels will review whether there is sufficient evidence to justify detention.

Aside from the court battle, the new Democratic-controlled Congress pressed efforts to revamp the law, which passed when Republicans controlled both chambers. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, announced a new review of detainees' legal protections. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, promoted revisions to the law to restore detainees' legal rights. Leahy, in a statement, disagreed with the appeals panel's assessment, calling it "dangerous and misguided."

In dismissing the detainees' challenge, Judge A. Raymond Randolph wrote: "The arguments are creative but not cogent. To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress."

Judge Judith Rogers dissented, arguing that the military hearings deprive detainees of their due process rights by placing the legal burden on them to prove they are not a terrorist threat.

"The decision reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman.

Pentagon spokesman Jeffrey Gordon said the detainees at Guantanamo include some of the world's "most vicious terrorist operatives." He said none of Guantanamo's many critics "have put forth a viable option to handle these dangerous men and prevent their return to terrorism."

The prison at Guantanamo, which now houses 395 detainees, has drawn international criticism in the five years since it opened. President Bush repeatedly has said he would like to close it.

Guantanamo Detainees Lose Appeal (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134503

A federal appeals court ruled yesterday that hundreds of detainees in U.S. custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, do not have the right to challenge their imprisonment in federal courts, a victory for the Bush administration that could lead to the Supreme Court again addressing the issue.

In its 2 to 1 decision, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld one of the central components of the Military Commissions Act, the law enacted last year by a then-Republican-controlled Congress that stripped Guantanamo detainees of their right to such habeas corpus petitions. Lawyers have filed the petitions on behalf of virtually all of the nearly 400 detainees still at Guantanamo, challenging President Bush's right to hold them indefinitely without charges. Yesterday's ruling effectively dismisses the cases.

Attorneys for the detainees vowed to quickly petition the Supreme Court to hear the case.

Judge A. Raymond Randolph wrote in the majority opinion that to overrule the new law, which Bush signed in October, would "defy the will of Congress." He and Judge David B. Sentelle also found that historical interpretations of habeas corpus do not apply to foreign nationals not on U.S. soil, determining that the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay is a leased property that falls under Cuban sovereignty.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," Randolph wrote in the combined cases of Al Odah v. USA and Boumediene v. Bush. "Our only recourse is to vacate the district courts' decisions and dismiss the cases for lack of jurisdiction."

In a lengthy dissent, Judge Judith W. Rogers raised two central questions of constitutional law that could form the basis of arguments before the Supreme Court, if it chooses to hear the case. She wrote that the writ of habeas corpus can apply to foreign nationals outside the United States and that Congress has not properly suspended habeas corpus, something it has done only four times, including during the Civil War.

Rogers wrote that Congress may suspend that right "when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it" but that Congress has not invoked that power now, adding that its actions "exceed the powers of Congress."

Justice Department lawyers have argued for years that foreign detainees should not enjoy constitutional rights when they are detained in other countries amid accusations of terrorism against the United States and its allies.

"We are pleased with the decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upholding the constitutionality of the Military Commissions Act (MCA) and dismissing the consolidated Guantanamo detainee cases for lack of jurisdiction," Erik Ablin, a department spokesman, said in a statement.

Shayana Kadidal, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents hundreds of Guantanamo detainees, said defense attorneys will petition the Supreme Court "as quickly as possible." He said the decision grants government officials broad latitude in its treatment of detainees and gives detainees no legal way to address it.

"This decision allows the president to basically do what he wants to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore," Kadidal said. He said that his clients at Guantanamo have experienced "disgust and exasperation at the American legal system" and that their "feelings of desperation" now will only grow.

Washington lawyer David Remes, who also represents Guantanamo detainees, said he is disappointed by the decision but not completely surprised. He expects the Supreme Court to hear the case.

In two decisions, the Supreme Court has upheld Guantanamo detainees' rights to contest their incarceration in federal courts. But the court also made it clear that Congress could weigh in on the issue, which it did by approving the Military Commissions Act. That law mandated special military trials for the detainees.

Douglas W. Kmiec, a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, said it appears that Congress clearly intended to remove the court's jurisdiction. He said, however, that questions remain about the application of habeas rights and their evolution since the late 1700s.

"We're dealing with an area that has been subject to some difficult and subtle rulings from the beginning of the foundation of our country," Kmiec said. "The law has been a moving target."

Democrats, who now hold the majority in both houses, have vowed to quickly amend the Military Commissions Act with provisions that would restore habeas rights for detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0134504

Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and the committee's ranking Republican, Arlen Specter (Pa.), have introduced a bill that would restore habeas corpus rights. Specter urged congressional action because the Supreme Court could take months to hear the case.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, introduced a bill last week that would return habeas corpus rights to detainees while clarifying other parts of the law. Dodd said yesterday his legislation is now "even more critical."

It is unclear whether Bush would veto such legislation, which would challenge a central element of his anti-terrorism platform.

D.C. Circuit Denies Detainee Challenges (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 21, 2007

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit Tuesday ruled that Guantanamo Bay detainees do not have a right to petition for habeas corpus, letting stand a key piece of the Military Commissions Act passed by Congress late last year.

The 2-1 decision was sharply critical of the plaintiffs, who had argued that the language of the act forbidding U.S. courts to hear challenges to the detention of aliens detained as enemy combatants was ambiguous and did not necessarily apply to detainees whose cases were already pending in court.

"The arguments are creative but not cogent," wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph. "Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan," wrote Randolph, referring to the 2006 decision, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which ruled that the military commissions set up by the Bush administration to try military detainees violate both international and U.S. military law.

"To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress," Randolph added, later calling the plaintiffs' argument "nonsense."

Randolph was joined in his decision by Judge David Sentelle.

After dispensing with the detainees' argument that the law was ambiguous, the court went on to assert the act's constitutionality. The Constitution's suspension clause, which says that the writ of habeas corpus can only be suspended for reasons of public safety during "rebellion or invasion," does not apply to areas outside U.S. sovereignty. And it is Cuba, the court asserted, not the United States, that has sovereignty over Guantanamo Bay.

In her dissent, Judge Judith Rogers strongly disagreed, writing that the majority opinion "fundamentally misconstrues" the nature of the suspension clause. "Far from conferring an individual right that might pertain only to persons substantially connected to the United States," she wrote, "the Suspension Clause is a limitation on the powers of Congress."

The decision makes it likely that the issue of habeas rights for the Guantanamo Bay detainees will end up in the Supreme Court.

"The Supreme Court has given detainees cert three times -- each time one of these cases has gone to them," says Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, an associate at Dorsey & Whitney, who represents two Bahrainis still being detained in Guantanamo Bay. "These are very fundamental questions."

Court Upholds Military Proceedings For Detainees (NPR)

By Ari Shapiro

National Public Radio, February 21, 2007

The federal appeals court has upheld the controversial detainee bill known as the Military Commissions Act. In a 2-1 ruling, the court said the measure constitutionally wiped out all of the pending court cases from detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

The act allows the government to try detainees in military proceedings, giving detainees access to federal civilian courts only for appeals.

Writing for the majority, Judge Raymond Randolph calls the detainees' arguments, "creative but not cogent." He says the logic in the dissent is "filled with holes."

DOJ_NMG_0134505

In that dissent, Judge Judith Rogers shoots back that the majority can only reach its conclusion, "by misreading the historical record and ignoring the Supreme Court." She says the Military Commissions Act is unconstitutional as written and cannot take away the courts' right to hear these cases.

The ruling is a clear blow to the Guantanamo detainees. Bill Goodman is legal director at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents a number of them.

Many of these people have done nothing," Goodman says. "They're there by accident and happenstance." He added that not being able to "raise the basic defense that 'I've done nothing wrong' means that this is a huge trampling of rights."

This decision wipes out cases that challenged everything from lack of medical treatment at the facility to abusive interrogation tactics. David Rivkin worked in the Justice Department under President Reagan and the first President Bush. He says enemy combatants were never intended to get the same court access as criminal suspects.

There's been more judicial involvement in these types of decisions than in any war in American history," Rivkin says. "And for the critics it's still not enough."

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos noted in a statement that the Military Commissions Act, or MCA, does give detainees some legal review.

"The decision reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the MCA," Scolinos said, "permitting Guantanamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit."

So although the detainees cannot file traditional habeas corpus claims challenging their detention, they can challenge the Combatant Status Review Tribunals that determine whether they are enemy combatants. Those challenges go directly to the court that decided this case today.

Wake Forest law professor Bobby Chesney says it's unclear how deeply those challenges can probe.

"One of the key issues here is whether that is an adequate alternative to habeas corpus," Chesney says, "and if it is, if it's a sufficient alternative, then habeas has not actually been suspended."

The final word on whether the detainees' lawsuits can continue is likely to come from the Supreme Court.

EDITORIAL Restore Habeas Rights (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

IN UPHOLDING A LAW that denies detainees at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base the ancient right of prisoners to challenge their confinement in court, a federal appeals court has presented the Democratic-controlled 110th Congress with a challenge. Does it have the fortitude to undo an injustice perpetrated by the Republican-controlled 109th?

The injustice came in the 2006 Military Commissions Act, which barred detainees at Guantanamo — now numbering 395 — from contesting their imprisonment by seeking writs of habeas corpus. This exclusion, like Guantanamo itself, has been an embarrassment to the United States.

In 2004, the Supreme Court ruled 6 to 3 that detainees at the facility (which the U.S. leases from Cuba) could seek relief under a federal habeas corpus statute because Congress had previously placed the area under the "complete jurisdiction and control" of the U.S. But on Tuesday, a 2-1 majority of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled that the Military Commissions Act essentially overruled the Supreme Court and should apply to all detainee cases, even those filed before the law was passed.

The high court could still correct the situation by ruling that the detainees have a constitutional right to bring habeas actions. In the 2004 case, Justice John Paul Stevens noted that habeas corpus is a "writ antecedent to statute … throwing its root deep into the genius of our common law." But in his opinion for the appeals court, Judge A. Raymond Randolph preempted that argument by claiming that, under English and early American law, habeas was not available to "an alien outside the territory of the sovereign." Congress, he suggested, has now placed Guantanamo in that "outside" category.

There's a good reason to suspect that the Supreme Court might actually affirm this disappointing decision: It's not the same court that ruled for the detainees in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0134506

Sandra Day O'Connor, one of the six justices in the 2004 majority, has been replaced by Samuel A. Alito Jr., who is more sympathetic to claims of government power. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who concurred in 2004 because "Guantanamo Bay is in every practical respect a United States territory," might defer, as the appeals court did, to the Military Commissions Act's exclusion of Guantanamo from habeas jurisdiction.

Rather than hope that the Supreme Court will rectify the act's flaws, Congress should act on its own to undo the law's habeas restrictions. Last year, 48 members of the Republican-controlled Senate voted for an amendment by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that would have allowed detainees to file such petitions. Of the 51 who voted no, six are no longer in the Senate.

That change — plus dramatic Democratic gains in the House — augur well for passage of the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act of 2007, co-sponsored by Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), now chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. And although the margin for approval may not be veto-proof, President Bush would be wise to allow Congress to atone for its own mistake.

Audit: Anti-terror Case Data Flawed (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Federal prosecutors counted immigration violations, marriage fraud and drug trafficking among anti-terror cases in the four years after 9/11 even though no evidence linked them to terror activity, a Justice Department audit said Tuesday.

Overall, nearly all of the terrorism-related statistics on investigations, referrals and cases examined by department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine were either diminished or inflated. Only two of 26 sets of department data reported between 2001 and 2005 were accurate, the audit found.

Responding, a Justice spokesman pointed to figures showing that prosecutors in the department's headquarters for the most part either accurately or underreported their data — underscoring what he called efforts to avoid pumping up federal terror statistics.

The numbers, used to monitor the department's progress in battling terrorists, are reported to Congress and the public and help, in part, shape the department's budget.

"For these and other reasons, it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics," the audit concluded.

Fine's office took care to say the flawed data appear to be the result of "decentralized and haphazard" methods of collection or disagreement over how the numbers are reported, and do not appear to be intentional.

Still, the errors led Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., to question whether the department had exaggerated the number of terror cases.

"If the Department of Justice can't even get their own books in order, how are we supposed to have any confidence they are doing the job they should be?" said Schumer, who sits on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees the department. "Whether this is just an accounting error or an attempt to pad terror prosecution statistics for some other reason, the Department of Justice of all places should be classifying cases for what they are, not what they want us to think them to be."

Auditors looked at 26 categories of statistics — including numbers of suspects charged and convicted in terror cases, and terror-related threats against cities and other U.S. targets — compiled by the FBI, Justice's Criminal Division, and the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys.

It found that data from the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys were the most severely flawed. Auditors said the office, which compiles statistics from the 94 federal prosecutors' districts nationwide, both under- and over-counted the number of terror-related cases during a four-year period.

The office has since agreed to change the way it counts and classifies anti-terrorism cases, said department spokesman Dean Boyd.

Boyd denied suggestions that the department pumped up its numbers. He said Criminal Division prosecutors at Justice headquarters and the FBI have overhauled their respective case reporting systems since 2004 for a more accurate picture of terror-related workloads. Both agencies, he said, were strained to accurately report terrorism data in the flood of cases immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"The notion that the Justice Department intentionally inflated its statistics is false and flatly contradicted by the OIG report itself," Boyd said.

In all but one area, Criminal Division prosecutors either accurately stated or underreported their data — the ones the department usually uses in public statements about its counterterror efforts, Boyd noted. He said the Justice Department has already completed most of the fixes recommended in the audit.

Much of the problem stemmed from how that office defines anti-terrorism cases.

A November 2001 federal crackdown on security breaches at airports, for example, yielded arrests on immigration and false document charges, but no evidence of terrorist activity. Nonetheless, the attorneys' office lumped them in with other anti-terror cases since they were investigated by federal Joint Terrorism Task Forces or with other counterterror measures.

Other examples, according to the audit, included:

_Charges against a marriage-broker for being paid to arrange six fraudulent marriages between Tunisians and U.S. citizens.

_Prosecution of a Mexican citizen who falsely identified himself as another person in a passport application.

_Charges against a suspect for dealing firearms without a license. The prosecutor handling the case told auditors it should not have been labeled as anti-terrorism.

"We do not agree that law enforcement efforts such as these should be counted as anti-terrorism," the audit concluded.

Report: Feds Overstate Terrorism Cases (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal prosecutors and the FBI have significantly overstated the number of terrorism-related investigations and prosecutions they pursue, according to a highly critical report released Tuesday by a Justice Department watchdog.

The study by Inspector General Glenn Fine concluded that the overstatements occurred in large part because authorities count offenses such as document and marriage fraud and immigration violations as terrorism-related even when there was no discernible tie to terror.

Although the Justice Department and the FBI have reorganized since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to make preventing future attacks a priority, Fine found that the agencies have done a poor job of providing statistical documentation for the work they are doing.

His report reviewed 26 categories of statistics and found inaccuracies, because of either inflated numbers or undercounting, in 24 of them.

Fine did not allege a deliberate attempt to mislead. He said information was "inaccurately reported for a variety of reasons, including that [Justice] Department components could not provide support for the numbers reported, could not provide support for a terrorism link used to classify statistics as terrorism-related, and could not document that the activity reported occurred in the period reported."

He also found collection and reporting of terrorism-related statistics "decentralized and haphazard."

In 2004, U.S. attorneys reported 379 terror-related convictions, but Fine's investigators found documentation for 240.

That same year, the FBI reported tracking 4,499 terrorism-related threats, but Fine said only 4,049 were connected to terrorism, according to information supplied by the bureau.

The numbers of terror-related incidents dealt with by federal authorities are important because they could affect anti-terrorism funding, as well as the government's credibility on terrorism threats.

DOJ_NMG_0134508

The bulk of Fine's 140-page review covered cases from 2003 and 2004.

Dean Boyd, a spokesman for the FBI and the Justice Department, which oversees U.S. attorneys, said both agencies were under stress from having to quickly ramp up an anti-terrorism capability after the 2001 attacks and have subsequently upgraded their tracking and labeling of cases to comport with many of Fine's recommendations for improvement.

Fine also found that unlike the FBI and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, which coordinates the activities of 93 federal prosecutors in the U.S. and overseas territories, the Justice Department's Criminal Division consistently reported lower numbers of terrorism cases than it actually handled.

For instance, the criminal division recorded 195 guilty pleas or convictions in terrorism cases from Sept. 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, but Fine said there actually were 216.

Boyd said Fine's report should not be read as undercutting the Justice Department's credibility because Criminal Division figures are the ones "used by DOJ in publicly quantifying their work."

But Fine cautioned against taking too much comfort in the Criminal Division's understatement of its anti-terrorism work because the record-keeping behind it was so weak that there "was no accurate basis for its reported numbers."

The report is the latest in a string of analyses to question the accuracy of the Justice Department's terrorism data.

In the past, department officials have emphasized that they are aggressively combating terrorism and would use so-called preventative prosecutions to deport or imprison people on immigration violations or other crimes rather than wait for a terrorist plot to develop.

Fine said his office "looked for, and accepted, any terrorism linkage" asserted by department officials but found many cases "where department officials provided no evidence to link the subject of the case to terrorist activity."

Among such cases were those of immigration violators caught up in sweeps like Operation Tarmac, begun soon after the Sept. 11 attacks, in which authorities combed airports looking for people linked to terrorism.

Boyd defended labeling such immigration cases as anti-terror matters because they were part of an effort to discourage terrorist infiltration of vulnerable facilities. But he said the Justice Department had agreed to clarify how it defines them.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism expert at the RAND Corp. think tank, said there is a significant deterrent value to sweeps and other crackdowns, but authorities need to be careful not to exaggerate what they're doing and to be as forthcoming as possible.

"Without explaining their methods more clearly, the public could look at it as 'crying wolf,'" Hoffman said.

Justice Dept. Statistics On Terrorism Faulted (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Most of the Justice Department's major statistics on terrorism cases are highly inaccurate, and federal prosecutors routinely count cases involving drug trafficking, marriage fraud and other unrelated crimes as part of anti-terrorism efforts, according to an audit released yesterday.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine found that only two of the 26 sets of important statistics on domestic counterterrorism efforts compiled by Justice and the FBI from 2001 to 2005 were accurate, according to a 140-page report. The numbers were both inflated and understated, depending on the data cited and which part of the Justice Department was doing the counting, the report said.

The biggest problems were in numbers compiled by the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, which counted hundreds of terrorism cases that did not qualify for the designation because they involved minor crimes with no connection to terrorist activity, the report said.

In short, the report concluded, "The collection and reporting of terrorism-related statistics within the department is decentralized and haphazard."

The Justice Department said in a statement that it has already made most of the improvements suggested by Fine's office and that the U.S. attorneys' office would rename its "anti-terrorism" category to remove the implication that every case involves terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0134509

The analysis is the latest to find serious faults with the Justice Department's terrorism statistics, some of which have been featured prominently in statements by President Bush or the attorney general as evidence of the terrorist threat and the department's successful efforts to combat it.

The data are used to justify expenditures and explain to Congress and to the public how the Justice Department is using its resources to protect the country against terrorist attacks, officials said.

"Congress, department managers and the public need accurate statistics in order to fully assess the department's anti-terrorism efforts," Fine said in a statement.

A 2005 Washington Post analysis of terrorism cases tallied by the Justice Department's Criminal Division showed that most defendants were charged with minor crimes unrelated to terrorism.

Fine's office examined similar data as part of its analysis but, unlike The Post, it accepted at face value any claims of a terrorism link by the government. Under those conditions, the report said, the Criminal Division actually understated the number of cases that would qualify as related to terrorism.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said "the notion that the Justice Department inflated its statistics is false and flatly contradicted by the [inspector general's] report itself, which found that the Criminal Division either accurately stated or understated the department's terrorism statistics in nearly all categories."

Fine's report was careful to stress that the inaccuracies did not appear to have been intentional but instead were the result of shoddy recordkeeping, disagreements over definitions and other problems.

Much of the report's criticisms centered on the U.S. attorneys' office at Justice headquarters, which compiles statistics from 93 federal prosecutors nationwide and in U.S. territories. The office dramatically over- or understated the number of terrorism-related cases during a four-year period, due in large part to the way officials defined "anti-terrorism" cases, the report said.

A prime example was a massive operation to crack down on security problems at airports, which yielded dozens of arrests for immigration charges and other crimes but none related to terrorism. Even so, Fine's report said, all of the cases were counted as anti-terrorism efforts.

The only two sets of accurate statistics were compiled by the FBI, which nonetheless provided inaccurate data in eight other categories, the report said.

Terror Statistics Deemed Inaccurate (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

The Justice Department's reporting of terrorism-related statistics is "decentralized and haphazard," according to an internal audit, which said immigration, marriage fraud and drug cases often were wrongly counted as terrorism-related.

In examining the accuracy of 26 terrorism-related statistical reports by the FBI, the Justice Department's criminal division and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys (EOUSA), Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said all but two were inaccurate -- lacking documentation and "significantly overstated or understated" by 10 percent or more.

"Department officials either had not established internal controls to ensure the statistics were accurately gathered, classified and reported, or did not document the internal controls used," he said. "We found many cases involving offenses such as immigration violations, marriage fraud or drug trafficking where department officials provided no evidence to link the subject of the case to terrorist activity."

The statistics, collected from the FBI, the department's criminal division and all 94 U.S. attorneys, are reported to senior Justice Department managers, Congress and the public.

Mr. Fine's office focused on terrorism convictions during fiscal 2003 and 2004 reported by EOUSA; the number of persons convicted or who pleaded guilty resulting from terrorism convictions from September 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, reported by the Criminal Division; and the number of terrorist threats tracked by the FBI in fiscal 2003 and 2004.

"The Justice Department agrees fully with the Office of the Inspector General that the department must collect, verify and maintain accurate statistics on the important national security work being conducted at Main Justice, the FBI and in United States Attorney's Offices around the country," according to the FBI.

The FBI said it has made improvements to its statistical reporting systems in recent years, specifically its case management and supporting information technology programs.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the EOUSA has changed the way it counts and classifies anti-terrorism cases, and that the IG's findings, with respect to U.S. attorneys' statistics, "largely boiled down to a difference of opinion over the definition of anti-terrorism."

He also said criminal division prosecutors and the FBI also have changed their case reporting systems to more accurately reflect terror-related cases.

The report said the EOUSA significantly overstated the number of anti-terrorism defendants in cases it filed, the number of terrorism and terrorism-related convictions, and the number of terrorism-related defendants sent to prison. It said the criminal division significantly understated the number of persons convicted or who pleaded guilty in terrorism cases, and the number convicted with material support of terrorism.

Also, it said the FBI significantly overstated the number of counterterrorism threat assessments it issued, the number of presidential terrorist threat reports, and the number of terrorism-related convictions, but significantly understated the number of intelligence assessments and bulletins it issued and terrorist threats it tracked.

Audit Questions Accuracy Of Federal Terror Statistics (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department has routinely misrepresented the number of terrorism prosecutions, possibly undermining decisionmaking in the war on terrorism, an independent government audit found.

The report, released Tuesday by the Justice Department's inspector general, concluded that the department in most cases "could not provide support for the numbers reported or could not identify the terrorism link used to classify statistics as terrorism-related."

All but two of the 26 statistics reviewed from October 2000 through September 2005 were wrong. "These inaccuracies are important because department management and Congress need accurate terrorism-related statistics to make informed ... decisions," Inspector General Glenn Fine said in the report.

Part of the problem, according to Fine, was that the Justice Department routinely counted criminal cases as terrorism-related even when prosecutors had found no links to terrorism. Fine also blamed a "decentralized and haphazard" system.

Some in Congress have accused the department of manipulating the statistics to claim success in the war on terrorism.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the inaccuracies found from 2002 to 2004 resulted partly from the reorganizations of the Justice Department and the FBI after 9/11. Since then, terrorism-case reporting has improved, he said.

Judge Rejects Delay Of Phone Wiretap Suits (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 21, 2007

U.S. seeks dismissal in appeals court over national security

A federal judge rejected the Bush administration's request Tuesday to put wiretapping lawsuits against telephone companies on hold while the government asks an appeals court to dismiss the suits on national security grounds.

The ruling came from Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker of San Francisco, who is hearing more than 40 suits from around the nation accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the government's electronic surveillance program.

Walker refused in July to dismiss the leading case, a suit accusing AT&T of sharing its telephone records and e-mail network with the National Security Agency. Walker rejected Bush administration arguments that allowing the case to proceed would expose vital secrets about the clandestine program and the company's alleged role in it.

The Justice Department has asked the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the ruling and dismiss all the lawsuits. While that appeal is pending, government lawyers argued, any further action in Walker's court would waste time and money and increase the risk of a security breach.

But Walker ordered the companies Tuesday to respond to the suits by March 29 unless plaintiffs in particular cases agreed to a delay.

The judge also said lawyers for AT&T customers could ask him for permission to question company officials and to seek evidence on limited issues. Attorney Kurt Opsahl of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which represents the plaintiffs, said those topics could include the company's structure and operation of its networks.

Opsahl said plaintiffs' lawyers may also ask AT&T to present to Walker, in private, any evidence of government authorization that exists for its actions -- a subject that Justice Department lawyers have described as among the most sensitive in the case. Such secret submission of evidence, a procedure spelled out by federal law, would allow the judge to determine whether any surveillance in which the company participated was legal, Opsahl said.

Walker "is trying to advance the case while being very sensitive to national security concerns," Opsahl said.

An AT&T spokeswoman was unavailable for comment. The phone companies joined the administration's request to put the cases on hold.

In a separate order, Walker denied a request by The Chronicle and other news organizations to unseal some documents in the AT&T case. They include a statement by a former AT&T engineer, Mark Klein, about installation of equipment that allegedly would allow the government to screen customers' Internet messages, and a supporting declaration by J. Scott Marcus, a former Federal Communications Commission technology adviser.

AT&T says the documents contain trade secrets. Walker noted that the company released edited versions of the material last year, after negotiations with the plaintiffs, and said he may reconsider unsealing the rest of the documents if their content becomes critical to the outcome of the case.

Karl Olson, an attorney whose clients include The Chronicle, the Los Angeles Times, the Associated Press, the San Jose Mercury News, Bloomberg News and USA Today, said he was disappointed that Walker had deferred to AT&T's claim of trade secrets, which he described as flimsy. Among the information that remains sealed, Olson said, were the names of the city, San Francisco, and the street, Folsom, where the company's facility is located.

FBI Translating Over 1,000 Wiretap Conversations A Day (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, February 21, 2007

Spurred by adding hundreds of new linguists and help from allies overseas, the FBI is translating a record 34,000 wiretapped conversations a month, bureau officials tell the Bad Guys blog. Long criticized for its lack of language specialists, the FBI, they say, is finally catching up to an unprecedented intake of foreign-language surveillance recordings, electronic data, and text since 9/11.

Most of the wiretaps are tied to counterterrorism and counterintelligence cases, officials say. Since 9/11, the FBI's counterterrorism agents, in particular, have collected a mother lode of intelligence. In a widely overlooked report to the Senate Judiciary Committee in November, bureau officials ticked off their counterterrorism take over the past four years:

519,217 hours of audio

5,508,217 electronic data files

1,847,497 pages of text

A July 2005 audit by the Justice Department's inspector general found that the bureau's counterterrorism audio backlog had doubled over the preceding year to 8,354 hours. But in their Senate report, FBI officials counter that the backlog represents only 1.35 percent of all the audio collected, and that nearly all of the agency's text and electronic data files have now been translated.

"We've made great strides," says Jeff Lanza, an FBI spokesman. "Ninety-nine percent of the backlog has been eliminated." Nearly a third of what remains is "white noise" not expected to yield anything of value, officials say. Of most concern are 3,240 hours of "audio from very obscure languages and dialects," which the bureau is scrambling to find linguists for.

The FBI has eased its backlog by markedly increasing its reservoir of translators. Since 2001, the number of FBI staff linguists has grown to 1,409, an 80 percent jump, officials say. The FBI has also turned to "the language programs of allied intelligence agencies," as well as to contract linguists, according to testimony by FBI Director Robert Mueller.

Since the 9/11 attacks in 2001, the number of national security wiretaps approved by the secret U.S. Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court more than doubled, according to the Justice Department, from 934 in 2001 to 2,072 in 2005 – an increase of 122 percent. These include wiretaps of counterterrorism suspects as well as counterintelligence targets such as foreign spies in America. In addition, thousands of electronic intercepts are thought to have been made under the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless surveillance program begun after 9/11. (That program was recently brought under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's purview.)

By contrast, the growth has been much slower in criminal wiretaps, which include eavesdropping on Mafia bosses, corrupt officials, and other suspected lawbreakers. In 2001, authorities completed 1,491 of these intercepts authorized by federal and state courts, according to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. That number grew to 1,773 in 2005, representing an increase of 19 percent.

American Faces Charges In Qaeda Case (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 20 — A thin and weakened 28-year-old American who the government says was captured last month in Kenya after joining Islamic terrorists fighting in Somalia appeared on Tuesday in federal court here to face charges of conspiring to use an unconventional weapon and receiving military training from Al Qaeda.

The defendant, Daniel J. Maldonado, is a convert to Islam who grew up in Boston before moving here. Chained, Mr. Maldonado stayed impassive as F.B.I. witnesses and prosecutors said he had admitted to having guarded a suspected spy who was later killed, to praising the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and to offering himself as a suicide bomber.

“What we have is a U.S. citizen homegrown Islamic jihadist right here,” said Gary Cobe, an assistant United States attorney.

The hearing, to determine whether enough evidence exists to continue to hold Mr. Maldonado without bond, hit a snag when his chief public defender, Brent E. Newton, argued that he could not properly examine F.B.I. witnesses without seeing their written reports.

Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley asked prosecutors to provide the reports for the resumption of the court on Wednesday.

The testimony added details to the government complaint and affidavit filed on Feb. 13, a day after Mr. Maldonado was taken into custody here after being flown from Kenya. He had been seized in Kenya on Jan. 21.

John McKinley of the counterterrorism squad of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Houston said an unidentified confidential witness who corroborated Mr. Maldonado’s account told of Qaeda efforts to recruit American women to travel to Somalia to train for terrorist attacks in the United States.

The weapon in the complaint was said to be a bomb that the F.B.I. said Mr. Maldonado had seen how to make while “consorting” with a bomb maker in Kismayo, Somalia. The bomb maker reportedly used match tips and TNT to create explosive devices. No evidence was offered that Mr. Maldonado had made such a device.

The bureau also said that Mr. Maldonado had been trained in using an AK-47 and that he had pointed it at a prisoner, an unidentified flight attendant accused of spying against Al Qaeda by taking photographs with his cellphone.

Mr. Maldonado poked the man with his weapon and told him to “shut up,” Mr. Cobe, the prosecutor, said. Someone else later executed the prisoner, Agent McKinley said Mr. Maldonado had told him.

Agent McKinley, one of six who questioned Mr. Maldonado in Kenya, also testified that Mr. Maldonado’s wife and three children had joined him in Mogadishu, Somalia; that his wife had died of malaria there; and that agents had escorted the children back to Mr. Maldonado’s parents in New Hampshire.

Mr. Maldonado had been ill in Somalia, too, Mr. Newton, his lawyer, brought out in cross-examination. The testimony showed that he suffered from malnutrition that shrunk him to 105 pounds from 165. In court in green prison scrubs, he appeared gaunt, with shoulder-length brown hair parted in the center and a wispy beard and mustache.

DOJ_NMG_0134513

The government said Mr. Maldonado was also known as Daniel Aljughaifi. He also appeared to have undergone changes of heart.

"He told me some of the folks in the camp lied to him about taking care of his family," Agent McKinley testified. "He seemed kind of disillusioned by that."

Another agent who had questioned Mr. Maldonado in Kenya, Loretta Eglen-Anderson, said he at one point "advised us he had made false statements." Agent Eglen-Anderson said he made corrections in the written record "and signed that."

Mr. Newton's cross-examination suggested that he intended to make an issue of Mr. Maldonado's treatment in custody and whether his client had properly waived his rights to a lawyer before F.B.I. agents questioned him.

Agent McKinley said Mr. Maldonado told him that he had been in Somalia "to fight jihad, raising the word of Allah."

"He said he was angry at America," Agent McKinley testified. "He said he had no problem with the 9/11 attacks."

When asked in cross-examination, "Did he indicate why he was angry with America?" the agent replied, "Not to me."

Houston Al-Qaida Case On Hold (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 21, 2007

A federal judge cut short a hearing for accused terrorist Daniel Joseph Maldonado late Tuesday to give his lawyers time to review reports about FBI interviews with their client.

Maldonado, 28, is the first American accused of training with al-Qaida in Somalia. The hearing, which will determine whether the government's case will continue, is to resume at 10 a.m. today.

Also known as Daniel Aljughaifi, the Muslim convert left the U.S. in late 2005, spending his last few months in Houston. He trained at radical Islamic camps in southern Somalia from November until January, when Kenyan soldiers captured him and others — including British citizens and a Swede — as they fled Ethiopian fighters in Somalia, FBI Agent John McKinley testified Tuesday.

In Kenya, two senior FBI officials questioned Maldonado, who gave conflicting information during later interviews with another FBI agent and a Houston police officer.

"That's what their case hinges upon — the words he supposedly told the case agent and the police officer," Brent Newton, a federal public defender, told U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley.

The seven-page criminal complaint against Maldonado alleges there were al-Qaida fighters where he trained and studied bomb-making, a charge for which he faces up to life in prison.

Newton argued that even if Maldonado went overseas to fight jihad, there is no evidence that he intended to affiliate with al-Qaida. FBI agents escorted Maldonado back to Houston from Kenya last week.

Tuesday's delay was an unusual twist to a fairly routine process in which prosecutors argue to proceed with their case.

The hearing was postponed shortly after prosecutor Gary Cobe passionately launched into the government's argument.

"What we have here," Cobe declared, "is a U.S. citizen-homegrown-Islamic jihadi."

As Cobe raised his voice to explain how Maldonado went overseas to fight jihad, Botley interrupted and told prosecutors to hand over the FBI reports to Newton by 8 a.m. today.

Accused Terrorist From Houston Described As 'Militant' (KPRC)

KPRC-TV, February 21, 2007

HOUSTON -- A former Houston man suspected of training with al-Qaida was in federal court downtown Tuesday afternoon and described as a militant young man angry with the U.S., KPRC Local 2 reported.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, covered his face as he arrived for a detention hearing.

He's been held without bond on suspicion that he joined with al-Qaida to try and overthrow the Somali government.

During the hearing, more information about Maldonado was released.

He moved to Houston from New Hampshire in 2005. His last known address in the United States was a southwest Houston apartment.

An FBI special agent said Maldonado traveled to Egypt in November 2005 and to Somalia in 2006. That's where he allegedly joined the Islamic Courts Union and al-Qaida to fight jihad.

Special Agent John McKinley said Maldonado received training from a terrorist organization in physical fitness, weapons and explosives. In federal court, it was revealed that Maldonado was approached to return to America and recruit English-speaking women to receive training in Somalia, a notion that alarmed local Islamic leaders.

"To take matters in your own hands and interpret the religion the way that you see it fit by rejecting a life that you came from and then you become militaristic in that sense -- that's not the way to go about it," said Rodwan Saleh, the president of the Islamic Society of Greater Houston.

It was also detailed in court how Maldonado allegedly took part in the beating and interrogation of a flight attendant who he accused of being a spy after the flight attendant took cell phone pictures of high-ranking al-Qaida members on a flight. The FBI agent said the flight attendant was eventually killed.

The official testified that Maldonado initially intended to fight Somalians but said he then broadened his targets to Ethiopians and Americans.

The agent also said Maldonado was angry at America and had no problem with the Sept. 11 attacks.

Maldonado was captured in Kenya in January. He faces federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device.

Maldonado's arrest marks the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining terrorists in Somalia, officials said.

GOP Donor Hit With Terror Charges (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

A New York man accused of trying to help terrorists in Afghanistan has donated some $15,000 to the House Republicans' campaign committee over three years.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari pleaded not guilty Friday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to charges that include terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering.

From April 2002 until August 2004, the man also known as "Michael Mixon" gave donations ranging from $500 to $5,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee, according to Federal Election Commission reports and two campaign donor tracking Web sites, http://www.politicalmoneyline.com and http://www.opensecrets.org.

Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the NRCC, said if Alishtari is found guilty, the organization would donate the money to charity.

"We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges, but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward," Boulanger said.

In the federal indictment, the government said Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, N.Y., also known as Mixon accepted an unspecified amount of money to transfer $152,000 to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support an Afghanistan terrorist training camp. He also stands accused of causing the transfer of about $25,000 from a bank account in New York to an account in Montreal, money the government says was to be used to provide material support to terrorists.

Also, the indictment says, Alishtari schemed to defraud investors by obtaining millions of dollars in a loan investment scheme that he called the "Flat Electronic Data Interchange" and that promised high guaranteed rates of return.

The charges carry a potential penalty of 95 years in prison.

Alishtari was detained pending a court appearance this week. Prosecutors said he was a danger to the community and a flight risk.

On campaign finance forms, Alishtari identified his occupation as either the owner, president or chief executive of a business called Global Protector Inc., or GlobalProtector.Net, Inc. In some filings he listed the business as being located in the Bronx and in other filings in Scarsdale, N.Y.

DOJ_NMG_0134515

A resume listed in his name and posted on an MSN group Web site on Jan. 8, 2007, identifies him as being an "industrialist and philanthropist" and references previous connections to the Republican Party.

The resume says that in 2003 Alishtari was named a National Republican Senatorial Committee "Inner Circle Member for Life" and was appointed to the NRCC's "White House Business Advisory Committee." The resume also says Alishtari was named the NRCC's New York state businessman of the year in 2002 and 2003.

The 2007 resume identifies him as the founder of IDPixie LLC, which is described as an "ID theft protection agency."

Terrorism Suspect Is Republican Donor (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 21, 2007

A New York man who pleaded not guilty last week to charges of supporting terrorism contributed about $15,000 to the House Republicans' campaign committee and claimed to be involved with the Senate Republicans' campaign committee in recent years.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, also known as Michael Mixon, donated almost all of the money to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) during the 2004 election cycle and listed on his résumé that he was an "Inner Circle Life Member" with the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), the Associated Press reported.

The NRSC website says people can become "Inner Circle Life Members" by being nominated by a selection committee and donating $15,000 per person or $20,000 per couple.

An indictment states Alishtari accepted money to send $152,000 to Afghanistan and Pakistan to support a terrorist training camp. He is charged with terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering, and faces 95 years in prison.

Democrats are asking how much access Alishtari had with Republicans and whether the NRCC would return the money.

"We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges, but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward," NRCC spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said. "If the individual in question is found guilty of a crime, it is our intent to donate the money to charity."

The NRSC did not comment by press time.

Propagating Terror (WT)

By Rachel Ehrenfeld

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Six years after al Qaeda attacked the United States, many policy-makers and "terrorism experts" retain the misconception that terrorism does not require large amounts of money. This myth was strengthened first with the September 11 Commission's report in 2003 and later reinforced by its October 2005 Progress Report, giving the government an A- for its "vigorous efforts against terror financing."

The Feb. 13 Terrorism Index of the Center for American Progress also lauds U.S. success in stopping terrorists' money all over the world. The Center for American Progress asked 116 U.S. foreign policy and terrorism experts to indicate how much progress has the U.S. government "made in implementing the 9/11 Commission recommendations since July 2004... to curtail terrorist financing." Most experts, in fact, "95 percent... said that some or a great deal of progress had been made."

The press release by the Center for American Progress offers the explanation that this is not surprising since "terrorists do not need large sums of cash to be deadly effective." Indeed, individual terrorist acts do not cost much; the World Trade Center attack on September 11 is estimated as al Qaeda's most costly, at $500,000, while the bombing of London's transit in July 2005, cost merely $2,000. Therefore, the report argues, the $140 million in terrorist assets, which the United States froze in 1,400 bank accounts worldwide during the last six years, is a great success.

But freezing $140 million did little to stop the fund flows to terrorists, especially when compared to the more than $90 billion that the Saudis spent since the 1970s to spread Wahhabism, one of the world's most virulent forms of Islam, which also produced al Qaeda. This Saudi-sponsored propagation of Islamist extremism is described by former CIA Director James Woolsey as "the soil in which Al-Qaeda and its sister terrorist organizations are flourishing." The hundreds of millions of dollars that the Saudis donated to the Palestinian Liberation Organization and Hamas just to fuel the intifada is but one example.

The report also ignores Iran's $100 million-plus in annual subsidies, for decades, to Hezbollah. Nor does it mention Iranian funds and weapons that bolster Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, whose cells are spread all over the world. Incredibly, there is nothing about the Iranian support of the Shi'ite in Iraq, or the cost of the Iranian made and supplied deadly weapons, including roadside bombs, and grenades "which spray molten metal ... [and] are responsible for the deaths of scores of American soldiers."

The Center for American Progress report talks about "terrorists money" in abstract. It says nothing about who transferred the money or who was the intended recipient. Was this al Qaeda's money? Hamas'? Or perhaps the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC)? Most importantly, the report failed to take into account the cost of building, maintaining and expanding the multilayered international infrastructure of radical Islam, thus making terrorists attacks possible on demand.

Another major source for financing terrorism comes from the illegal drug trade. But following the lead of the September 11 Commission's reports, this Index also ignores the billions of dollars generated by heroin, cocaine and other illegal drugs, which corrupts many governments and destroys millions of lives while filling terrorists' coffers worldwide.

It boggles the mind that the Bush administration continues to ignore terrorism's need for, and access to, a strong, international funding base, with large pockets even in the United States. More disturbing is the administration's unwillingness to identify the funding sources. As long as the terror financiers remain unknown, we will not be able to sever the terrorists' lifeline.

This willful blindness continues to undermine U.S. credibility with its allies and foes, and therefore its ability to curtail the money flow. Ultimately, this U.S. approach allows the expansion of the Islamist terrorists' agenda and the spread of terrorism, further risking U.S. national security.

Rachel Ehrenfeld is director of the American Center for Democracy.

Muslim Groups Fast For Jailed Al-Arian (WT)

By Audrey Hudson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A coalition of Muslim groups is calling for a worldwide fast in support of Sami Al-Arian, a former college professor convicted of raising funds for a terrorist group who remains in jail on contempt charges for refusing to testify before a Virginia grand jury investigating other financiers of terrorism.

The American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections on Monday asked Muslims to fast every Monday, Wednesday and Friday along with Al-Arian, who has been on a hunger strike since Jan. 21.

Task force spokesman Agha Saeed says the response has been "compassionate, caring, supportive and concern about Professor Al-Arian's health."

The former University of South Florida computer-science professor was arrested in 2003 and pleaded guilty last year to assisting the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group. He was sentenced to time served and given an additional 18 months for refusing to testify against the International Institute of Islamic Thought (IIIT) and its role with the terrorist group.

The task force calls the additional sentence "a form of harassment," and along with Amnesty International, is demanding his release. The task force is made up of larger Muslim groups, including the American Muslim Alliance, Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), the Islamic Circle of North America and United Muslims of America.

"The Muslim coalition is urging local communities to host information sessions at houses of worship and on college campuses to educate the public about Dr. Al-Arian's case," the task force said in a statement.

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross, a counterterrorism analyst and author of "My Year Inside Radical Islam," says prosecutors want Al-Arian's testimony to demonstrate the financial links between IIIT and his group and how the Palestinian Islamic Jihad was financed.

Mr. Gartenstein-Ross called the support through fasting "simply puzzling."

"I think on the one hand, there is a perception that Muslim civil rights are threatened, and there is a desire to support someone who might be a victim of an overzealous system, but it's important to take a look at the record and not blindly support something," Mr. Gartenstein-Ross said.

In sentencing Al-Arian last year, U.S. District Judge James Moody called him a "master manipulator" who "looked your neighbors in the eyes and said you had nothing to do with the Palestinian Islamic Jihad."

DOJ_NMG_0134517

"This trial exposed that as a lie. ... The evidence was clear in this case that you were a leader of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad," Judge Moody said. "Your only connection to widows and orphans is that you create them, even among the Palestinians; and you create them, not by sending your children to blow themselves out of existence. No. You exhort others to send their children."

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales earlier this month, Amnesty International asked for an investigation into Al-Arian's treatment in prison, calling it "unacceptably harsh and punitive" and that he is being abused by guards "based, at least in part, on his political background."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Attorney General To Inspect Supermax (PUEBCH)

By Peter Roper, THE PUEBLO CHIEFTAIN

The Pueblo Chieftain, February 21, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will visit the federal Supermax prison complex at Florence on Wednesday, four months after a federal inspection report cited a staff shortage as the reason for security and supervision problems there.

Gonzales will tour the prison complex with Colorado Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, who urged him to visit the nation's highest security federal prison after a Justice Department inspector general's report found a list of security problems. The most glaring was that the mail and telephone calls for convicted terrorists being held at the prison were not always being monitored.

Allard, a Republican, and Salazar, a Democrat, both met with Gonzales earlier this year and were told that Bureau of Prisons officials had added staff to Supermax, which holds 400 of the most dangerous prisoners in the federal prison system, such as Ramzi Yousef, who led the first bomb attack on the World Trade Center.

Supermax officially is known as the U.S. Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum (ADX). According to a CNN broadcast last November, the inspector general's investigation was begun when Spanish police found letters from a Supermax inmate, Mohammed Salameh, were sent to a terror cell with links to the train bombings in Madrid.

The Justice Department report found that staffing at the prison had become so short that there were times when inmate mail and telephone calls were unmonitored. Also, there were times when there were no guards available to be in some cellblocks for an entire shift - although the cellblock was still staffed at the perimeter.

Other Supermax inmates have been accused of sending messages to prisoners in other states, ordering racial attacks and other criminal acts.

According to officers with the guards' union, Supermax is supposed to have 240 guards but has been functioning with fewer than 200.

Federal BOP officials said in January they were adding 18 additional guards to the staff.

Gonzales Plans Supermax Tour (CANCDR)

By Vic Vela

Canon City (CO) Daily Record, February 21, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will tour Supermax on Wednesday in Florence, as will Congressional representatives as security concerns regarding the federal prison continue to capture the attention of those in Washington, D.C.

Colorado Sens. Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard will join Gonzales on the Administrative Maximum facility tour Wednesday. Fifth District Rep. Doug Lamborn, State Rep. Liane “Buffy” McFadyen, Florence Mayor Cindy Cox and union representatives will also tour the facilities.

A press conference will follow the tour.

“We want to be sure the Bureau of Prisons and the Department of Justice are putting resources into secu-rity at Supermax,” said Salazar during a conference last week.

Correctional officer safety and terrorism concerns have worried those who have been vocal in the issue of security at Fremont County's federal institutions. A report released in October of last year by the Department of Justice's inspector general indicates that mail and phone calls received from convicted terrorists at ADX have not been totally checked by BOP staff. Also, the inspector general reported that not enough staff was sufficiently capable of monitoring phone calls in foreign languages.

These concerns could because of an overall lack of staff at the prison. In November, the Bureau of Prisons — the governing body of a federal institutions — increased staff at Supermax, but the number of those staffed still lagged behind the number the prison opened with in 1994; that number was 240 correctional officers, today it is 220.

But the staffing concerns do not stop at Supermax. Earlier this year, a riot situation was narrowly averted at the United States Penitentiary in Florence. Correctional officers from ADX and the Florence Correctional Institution came to the aid of staff at USP where seven officers were injured breaking-up fighting inmates.

"We have a guard-inmate ratio that I'm not sure is sufficient," said Salazar.

McFadyen agrees.

"You can't take staff from other institutions and put them in another," said McFadyen, who has been instrumental in bringing prison security concerns to the forefront. "It needs to be across the board."

While McFadyen's concerns have not totally eased, she sees some of the latest developments as good news. In late January, Congress passed the President signed a $463.5 billion appropriations bill for the Veterans Administration, Social Security Administration and the Bureau of Prisons.

With those moneys, the Bureau will received $4.97 billion for the 2007 fiscal year for salaries and expenses aimed at increasing the number of staff within the Bureau; this is a $143 million increase from the 2006 fiscal year budget.

In addition, the Bureau's buildings and facilities account will net the department $432 million, a substantial increase of $332 million to help construct new facilities and help alleviate overcrowding.

These budget increases, combined with the attorney general's visit Wednesday, please McFadyen, who says things are going in the right direction.

"We've been looking for attention at the national level for two years," she said. "I believe the crusade we've been on is now being heard."

Bush Swears In New Intelligence Director (USAT)

USA Today, February 21, 2007

President Bush installed retired vice admiral Michael McConnell as the nation's second national intelligence director and said his challenge is to improve the quality of spy data and analysis in wartime. Bush said the intelligence community needs significant improvements more than five years after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. He instructed McConnell to focus on finding more recruits with the language skills and cultural background to collect information on terrorist groups.

"Old policies have hampered some common-sense reforms, such as hiring first- and second-generation Americans who possess native language skills, cultural insights and a keen understanding of the threats we face," McConnell said.

McConnell, 63, replaces John Negroponte in the 2-year-old office overseeing activities across 16 agencies, including the CIA, FBI, National Security Agency and Defense Intelligence Agency. Negroponte has been nominated to be deputy secretary of State.

Romney to air campaign's first ad

Republican Mitt Romney airs his first presidential campaign ad today to introduce himself to voters in early primary states. The 60-second spot describes the former Massachusetts governor as a "business legend" who "rescued the Olympics" and "turned around a Democratic state." Romney himself says, "This is not a time for more talk and dithering in Washington. It's a time for action." The ad will air in Michigan, Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Florida.

It is the first ad by a top-tier contender in a race where total spending by all candidates could top $1 billion by the time it ends in November 2008.

Sen. Johnson released from hospital

DOJ_NMG_0134519

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., has entered a private rehabilitation facility, more than two months after suffering a debilitating brain hemorrhage. Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher would not say where Johnson is getting treatment. He was released Friday from George Washington University Hospital in Washington. After a stroke Dec. 13, Johnson underwent surgery to repair a malformed cluster of blood vessels in his brain.

Grants awarded for homeless programs

The Department of Housing and Urban Development awarded $1.36 billion in grants to support local homeless programs, a slight increase from last year. President Bush has requested $1.6 billion for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1. Local agencies compete for most of the grants, which support more than 5,300 programs for such things as emergency and transitional housing, job training and substance-abuse counseling.

Justice audit faults terror-crime reporting

The Justice Department regularly counted crimes such as identity theft and immigration fraud as terrorism despite having no evidence linking them to terrorist activity, an inspector general's audit found.

The report by Inspector General Glenn Fine found serious errors in 24 of 26 sets of department data compiled from 2001 to 2004. The report called the methods for collecting and reporting terrorism-related data "haphazard," but said the errors appeared to be unintentional. Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the office has since made improvements to track data. — Donna Leinwand

Retired Admiral Sworn In As Director Of Intelligence (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Retired Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, sworn in yesterday as the second director of national intelligence, said new technologies and capabilities are needed to collect and analyze intelligence "because today's threats move at increasing speeds."

"The time needed to develop a terrorist plot, communicate it around the globe and put it into motion has been drastically reduced," he told the audience of 300 at his swearing-in ceremony, which included President Bush and the leaders of the nation's intelligence agencies. "The timeline is no longer a calendar -- it is a watch."

McConnell becomes the president's chief intelligence adviser and manager of the 16 agencies and about 100,000 people making up the U.S. intelligence community.

Bush described McConnell's job "one of the most difficult and important positions in our government in this time of war -- and we are a nation at war." And although the president and his advisers have been criticized for ignoring prewar intelligence about the dangers in Iraq, Bush said yesterday: "He'll find that I value the intelligence product. . . . He's going to find that the intelligence product is an important part of my strategic thought."

Bush also paid tribute to McConnell's predecessor, Ambassador John D. Negroponte, who has moved back to the State Department as deputy secretary, saying he served with "talent and distinction." Nevertheless, Bush said that many elements of improving the intelligence community remain, including information sharing and the hiring of employees with the right language and cultural skills. McConnell repeated yesterday a plan he disclosed to Congress at his confirmation hearing: that he will change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first- and second-generation Arabic-speaking Americans for very sensitive jobs.

Although it was not mentioned yesterday, another of McConnell's highest priorities will be in proposing a deputy DNI, a position that has been vacant since Gen. Michael V. Hayden moved to the CIA last year. He told the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence that his preference would be someone from within the community on the civilian side who is working on terrorism-related issues.

U.S. Official Admits To Big Delay In Revamping No-Fly Program (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134520

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — The federal takeover of checking passenger names against terrorist watch lists, a top priority for aviation officials since the 2001 terrorist attacks, is not expected to be complete until 2010, more than five years behind schedule, a top Department of Homeland Security official acknowledged on Tuesday.

The delay in the timetable is the latest setback in a long-promised program intended to enhance aviation safety, while reducing the number of passengers mistakenly identified as possible terrorists.

Since the 1990s, airlines have been required to do the checks on their own. But they do not always use the most up-to-date watch lists, or computer software that is sophisticated enough to distinguish between similar names, like Catherine Stevens, and Cat Stevens, the former name of the British Muslim folk singer who had been added to a no-fly list.

The Transportation Security Administration, the agency in the Homeland Security Department leading the effort, has invested nearly $140 million and four years trying to start the system. Two earlier versions of the system, which is now called Secure Flight, failed, mostly because of civil libertarians' complaints that the vast new database would violate passenger privacy.

The agency's administrator, Kip Hawley, said in an interview Tuesday that after spending a year re-examining Secure Flight, officials have come up with a way to reduce mistakes, protect privacy rights and achieve the reliability needed to screen some two million passengers who fly each day.

It will cost some $80 million more in the next year and a half to develop the enhanced system, which will then require more than a year of testing, resulting in the estimate that it will be in full use sometime in 2010. Officials would not release an estimate of how much they expected to spend before the system was complete.

"All of us are anxious to get it started as soon possible," Mr. Hawley said. "But we are going to get it right before we set an artificial date and try to rush."

The government effort first drew scrutiny when officials disclosed that they intended to search for unknown terrorists by buying access to commercial repositories of personal data collected about consumers to look for any possible link between a passenger and a known terrorist like a common address or phone number.

The new system, which will not use commercial data, will simply check, ideally with greater accuracy, if a passenger is on the no-fly list or a "selectee list," which requires more intensive screening.

To reduce false alarms, under the new program, airline passengers will probably be required to provide a date of birth, Mr. Hawley said.

Mr. Hawley said he hoped that the start of the new system could be accelerated, assuming that opposition to it was not too intense.

Officials are looking for ways to reduce false alarms. That has included a detailed review of the existing no-fly list to eliminate erroneous, redundant or incorrect listings, which Mr. Hawley said should result in its being cut almost in half. He would not say how many names remained.

Park Police Survey Shows Doubt In Chief, Terror Readiness (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A survey of U.S. Park Police officers shows 97 percent of those who responded lack confidence in Chief Dwight E. Pettiford and 98 percent do not think the agency is as prepared as others to respond to a terrorist attack.

The survey also found that 98 percent think the agency's command staff was not doing its best to protect the public. In addition, 94 percent said inadequate staffing makes their work sites unsafe, and 85 percent described their work conditions as "unsatisfactory," according to the survey.

"These results are extremely disappointing," said James Austin of the Fraternal Order of Police, which conducted the survey. "If there has been a change in our mission, we have not been notified."

Mr. Austin, chairman of the union's Park Police Labor Committee, also asked that agency officials consider the survey findings if they want to improve morale.

Park Police spokesman Lt. Scott Fear confirmed that the agency had received the findings but said officials would not discuss them with a reporter.

DOJ_NMG_0134521

Much of the criticism about Chief Pettiford, who was promoted to the job from a deputy position in March 2005, is that he has not pushed hard enough for funding increases.

The lack of federal funding for the agency has been a concern for years. Several field officers and supervisors, who asked not to be identified for fear of losing their jobs, say the situation is hurting the agency's ability to accomplish its mission and is understaffed by at least 20 percent.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative, has vowed to seek more money for the agency this year and has called ongoing budget shortfalls the result of "congressional neglect."

Mrs. Norton, a Democrat, has said Park Police has received funding increases of 23 percent since the September 11 attacks, while Capitol Police have received funding increases of 105 percent. However, she made clear that bolstering protection around potential terrorist targets such as the Capitol was "fully warranted." She also said Congress, not Chief Pettiford, should address the issues.

Former Chief Teresa C. Chambers, who was fired after making public statements in December 2003 about the lack of employees and resources, told The Washington Times that continuing budget shortages for the agency provide "a good opportunity for the new Congress to pick up this important issue."

She said "a long history of insufficient staffing" contributed to the 2002 death of Officer Hakim Farthing, who was struck by a drunken driver while trying on foot to secure an accident scene on the Baltimore-Washington Parkway. Mrs. Chambers said Officer Farthing was killed because of an inadequate number of officers and police cars.

"I maintain that a contributing factor in Hakim's death was the lack of adequate staffing," she said.

Critics of Chief Pettiford, who replaced Mrs. Chambers, also say he lacks the visibility to get Congress' attention for additional manpower and other resources.

Others blamed the National Park Service, which oversees Park Police, for the budget shortfalls.

This is not the first time agency officers have complained about inadequate funding and the potential for dangerous consequences.

In July, officers at Park Police, the country's oldest uniformed federal police agency, said funding problems forced them to cancel several important programs, including cadet training classes.

Earlier this year, they said the lack of funding has resulted in vehicles too broken and dangerous to drive. Though no officer had been hurt or killed as a result of the shortfalls, "it is just a matter of time" before such an incident occurs, Mr. Austin said.

About 179 of the agency's roughly 600 officers responded to the survey, which also found that 96 percent think they have inadequate equipment to carry out their duties during a terrorist attack. In addition, 72 percent thought their level of training was inadequate for their job and 60 percent said their special training or certifications were not up to date.

Roughly 85 percent said the "icons" the agency is assigned to protect from terrorist attacks -- including the Statue of Liberty, the Washington Monument and the Golden Gate Bridge -- were not as secure as they could be, according to the survey.

The agency also provides foot, mounted, marine and air patrols to protect the Mall, Rock Creek and Anacostia parks, the Baltimore-Washington and George Washington Memorial parkways and dozens of parks in the District, Maryland and Virginia. It also provides escort to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Nichols Says Bombing Was FBI Op (DESERET)

By Geoffrey Fattah, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, February 21, 2007

Detailed confession filed in S.L. about Oklahoma City plot

The only surviving convicted criminal in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City is saying his co-conspirator, Timothy McVeigh, told him he was taking orders from a top FBI official in orchestrating the bombing.

A declaration from Terry Lynn Nichols, filed in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City, has proven to be one of the most detailed confessions by Nichols to date about his involvement in the bombing as well as the involvement of others. However, one congressman who has investigated the bombings remains skeptical of Nichols' claims.

DOJ_NMG_0134522

The declaration was filed as part of Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue's pending wrongful death suit against the government for the death of his brother in a federal corrections facility in Oklahoma City. Trentadue claims his brother was killed during an interrogation by FBI agents when agents mistook his brother for a suspect in the Oklahoma City bombing investigation.

The most shocking allegation in the 19-page signed declaration is Nichols' assertion that the whole bombing plot was an FBI operation and that McVeigh let slip during a bout of anger that he was taking instruction from former FBI official Larry Potts.

Potts was no stranger to anti-government confrontations, having been the lead FBI agent at Ruby Ridge in 1992, which led to the shooting death of Vicki Weaver, the wife of separatist Randy Weaver. Potts also was reportedly involved in the 51-day siege of the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas in 1993, which resulted in a fire that killed 81 Branch Davidian followers.

Potts retired from the FBI under intense pressure and criticism for the cover-up of an order to allow agents to shoot anyone seen leaving the Weaver cabin at Ruby Ridge.

When contacted, the FBI's main office in Washington, D.C., said it could not provide immediate comment on Nichols' claims Tuesday.

Nichols claims that, in December 1992, McVeigh told him that "while he was serving in the U.S. Army, he had been recruited to carry out undercover missions."

In the next few years, the two men hatched the bombing plot. In October 1994, "McVeigh and I stole explosives from a quarry in Marion, Kansas consisting of 8 1/2 cases or boxes containing 229 (2-inch by 16-inch) sticks of the gel type explosive known as Tovex," Nichols wrote, adding that only a small amount was used in the actual bombing.

It was while traveling the gun-show circuit that Nichols claims the two obtained bombmaking knowledge and the materials used in the bombing. One example is that McVeigh allegedly attended a gun show in Knob Creek, Ky., in 1993.

"At this gun show, McVeigh had the opportunity to make contact with about 20 people who were bomb experts. McVeigh told me that he himself had no knowledge about how to construct a bomb, but that he always wanted to gain more knowledge about how to construct bombs," Nichols stated.

Nichols says he knew McVeigh was building the bomb, and in November 1994 he left for the Philippines to get away from the area to avoid being implicated.

"I did not want to be present when and if McVeigh did explode a bomb. Consequently, I left for the Philippines to be out of the country," he wrote.

That statement contradicts findings of Congressman Dana Rohrabacher, R-California, whose study on the bombing was made public last December. It indicated Nichols had traveled to the Philippines to receive bombing training by a possible foreign terrorist.

Having not heard of any bombing, Nichols said he returned to the U.S. in January 1995. It was later that, in a fit of rage, McVeigh mentioned Potts' name, Nichols wrote.

"McVeigh said he believed Potts was manipulating him and forcing him to 'go off script,' which I understood meant to change the target of the bombing," Nichols stated.

It wasn't until April 18, 1995, that Nichols said he helped McVeigh construct a bomb at Geary Lake. The bomb was comprised of "metal and white plastic" barrels which were filled with ammonium nitrate fertilizer and mixed with nitromethane. In all he estimates between 90 to 92 fifty-pound bags of fertilizer went into the barrels and explosive sticks were placed in the holes of each barrel.

Nichols said he had no further role in renting the Ryder truck and claims he did not know the target, only that McVeigh "wanted to make a statement" by "targeting some structure."

After hearing about the bombing of the federal building, which killed 168 adults and children, Nichols said he panicked when his name came up on the radio and he wanted to turn himself in — but not before hiding evidence, including explosives used in the bombing.

The claims made in the declaration have added yet more twists to the mystery surrounding the bombings. Some familiar with the bombing's history say Nichols' claims seem to indicate the FBI put McVeigh up to the plot as a draw for radicals, but that the situation got out of control and McVeigh became a runaway informant.

DOJ_NMG_0134523

After reviewing the declaration, Rohrabacher told the Deseret Morning News that Nichols' claims should be investigated but treated with extreme skepticism.

"I need to caution people to remember that Terry Nichols is a mass murderer," Rohrabacher said. "But if Terry Nichols is beginning to reveal some of the information that's been kept from the public, I'd be very happy about that."

Rohrabacher also expressed disappointment with the FBI and the Department of Justice for not adequately following up on indications there were others who helped Nichols and McVeigh.

The congressman said he no longer is chairman of the subcommittee that conducted the investigation and is "dismayed" that no one else in Congress seems interested in the matter.

Nichols said he has much more information, which he offered to former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft in 2004, but is willing to divulge only under sworn video deposition. Trentadue said he plans to seek that deposition of Nichols, but "I expect one hell of a fight with the Department of Justice."

Nichols is serving life in prison without parole after being convicted by a jury for his role in the bombing. McVeigh also was convicted and on June 11, 2001 was executed in Terre Haute, Ind.

FBI, DHS Launch Third Fingerprint System Data-sharing Pilot (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 21, 2007

The government's massive, technologically ambitious project to achieve connectivity between two critical biometric databases took a step forward as the Homeland Security Department and the FBI unveiled an additional pilot project.

The project to achieve information sharing between the FBI's Integrated Automated Fingerprint Identification System (IAFIS) and the Homeland Security's Automated Biometric Identification System (IDENT) database dates back in various forms for many years and is planned to extend forward for several years.

IDENT contains millions of two-fingerprint records gathered by the former Immigration and Naturalization Service, which now is part of DHS.

The FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division in Clarksburg, W.Va, maintains IAFIS to service customers in the federal, state and local law enforcement communities, the intelligence community, and other authorized users of federal fingerprint data. IAFIS' 10-fingerprint records date back in millions of cases to the dawn of federal fingerprint collection, ushered in by the bureau in the last century.

The technological core of the data-sharing project involves modifications to the fingerprint comparison engines of the databases, among other changes. The bureau and the department already exchange data about each other's "worst of the worst" criminal suspects, fugitives and immigration law violators.

Two existing pilots, in the Boston Police Department and the Dallas County Sheriff's Office, started testing the data exchange technology last year.

The new pilot, which started operation on Feb. 1, will allow the sheriff's office in Harris County, Texas, to tap into additional IDENT records.

In a joint press statement, the bureau and the department said that the Harris County Sheriff's Office already had "booked a person for assault causing bodily injury to a family member and submitted the fingerprints for a background check.

"Despite previous use of nine aliases and four different dates of birth, the person's fingerprints revealed a lengthy criminal and immigration history, including deportation proceedings; entered without inspection; probation violation; driving while intoxicated; fraud in connection with an immigration document; supervised release violator; and assault," FBI and DHS said. The new system automatically advised the law enforcement officers of the criminal history, the agencies said, facilitating state and federal prosecution of the accused

Spitzer Makes Switch Official: He Supports Freedom Tower (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134524

Gov. Eliot Spitzer announced yesterday that he supported going ahead with construction of the Freedom Tower at ground zero, making official his change of mind about a project that he once called a white elephant.

Mr. Spitzer's remarks — made with no great enthusiasm — came at a news conference downtown with Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey. Despite the setting for his remarks, Mr. Spitzer said he "would not be in the business of having a press conference every time a brick is added to the foundation or a column goes up."

That was an apparent swipe at the public relations approach to ground zero under his predecessor, Gov. George E. Pataki. Rebuilding has moved only in fits and starts during the last several years, with most visible activity until recently accompanied by news conferences and photo opportunities.

David M. Catalfamo, a spokesman for Mr. Pataki, responded later: "I'm not sure if it was one too many or one too few press conferences. What I do know is that today's announcement is a reaffirmation of the vision advanced by Governor Pataki and a sign that the progress at the site will continue unabated."

The $3 billion Freedom Tower, the tallest and most symbolic of the five towers in the plan, has been widely criticized for its size, expense and design, as well as its failure to interest nongovernment tenants. Mr. Spitzer was critical of it during his campaign for governor, and when he took office he put the 1,776-foot building under review.

Last week, however, city, state, and Port Authority officials indicated that Mr. Spitzer had changed his mind, encouraged by the improving real estate market and apparent interest by some private investors in buying the Freedom Tower.

Yesterday, Mr. Spitzer said that while he had felt obligated to criticize aspects of the project he disliked, it was time to move on.

"This should not be interpreted to mean that this is the project I would have designed at its initiation," he added. "But where we are today, this is clearly the best and the wisest alternative."

Like Mr. Spitzer, Mr. Corzine and Mr. Bloomberg appeared more relieved than elated, a sign of how tumultuous the rebuilding effort has been since the Sept. 11 attacks.

"Maybe we would have done it differently if you could roll it all the way back to another day, but we live in the world we live in," Mr. Corzine said.

All three men deflected criticism of the tower's current design, saying it struck a necessary balance between security and aesthetics.

"I've said to Ray Kelly, our police chief, 'Would you let your kids work in this building?' " Mr. Bloomberg said; the Police Department had insisted on plan revisions to make the tower safer. "That's the standard that we have to build to. And he's looked me in the eye more than once and said, 'Yes.' "

After Mr. Bloomberg left for another event, Mr. Spitzer took more questions and seemed to wade into the controversy over the arrangement of the names of the dead at the 9/11 memorial. While the mayor, as chairman of the memorial foundation, contends that the matter has been settled, some families of the victims are not satisfied.

Mr. Spitzer said there was still room for discussion. "It is something that we will try to work through at the right time and the right place and get to a resolution that satisfies everybody," he said.

NY, NJ Govs Sign Off On Freedom Tower (AP)

Govs Sign Off on Freedom Tower, but Push Sale of WTC Skyscraper

NEW YORK (AP) -- The governors of New York and New Jersey said Tuesday they support continued construction of the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower but also would favor selling the multibillion-dollar symbolic skyscraper being built at ground zero.

New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine and Mayor Michael Bloomberg appeared together to sign off on the delayed, redesigned skyscraper that has been under construction for more than nine months.

Spitzer, who once called the planned building a "white elephant" that could not be profitable for the government agency that owned the World Trade Center, said after he was elected governor that he would look at the project again.

DOJ_NMG_0134525

He said Tuesday that a booming commercial real estate market and the need to move forward with long-delayed rebuilding at ground zero changed his mind.

"We're confident that this is not only viable, but profitable," said Spitzer. The federal and state government has promised to lease half of the tower's office space and the skyscraper -- which will cost more than $2.4 billion to build -- is on budget, he said.

But Spitzer added, "I don't have any opposition" to selling the tower, which the Port Authority is scheduled to finish building by 2011. "We will entertain these options if and when they arise."

Corzine said that selling the tower "would be good public policy." He said the Port Authority, which is run by both governors and owns airports, shipping terminals and bridges, should stay focused more on transportation than real estate.

Private investors have recently come to the agency with interest in ownership and development rights for the skyscraper and a second tower under the agency's control, Port Authority officials have said.

The agency agreed to build and lease two of the five planned towers last year when it renegotiated its lease with private developer Larry Silverstein, who is building three other towers on the site. It is sharing more than $7 billion in insurance proceeds and tax-exempt bonds to rebuild office space destroyed by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack.

No design changes are foreseen, despite critics' complaints that the tower's height makes it too much of a terrorist target and that a 20-story, windowless base makes the building look too forbidding.

The base "speaks less of resilience and tolerance than of paranoia. It's a building armored against an outside world that we no longer trust," wrote New York Times architecture critic Nicolai Ouroussoff in a column on Monday, urging that the building be redesigned.

Spitzer called the design a compromise "between the security needs that are real and pure aesthetics."

"I don't think it will look like a fortress," Bloomberg said. "There's nothing wrong with taking appropriate security actions."

Spitzer Says There's Time To Resolve 9/11 Memorial Names Issue (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) _ Mayor Michael Bloomberg has said several times that his decision on how to arrange names of the dead around the Sept. 11 memorial is final. But Gov. Eliot Spitzer on Tuesday said that there was still time to talk about it.

"Yes, I have opinions. No, this is not the moment to begin that very public discussion," Spitzer said when asked about the issue of naming the dead on the memorial, which has pitted the mayor against some Sept. 11 families that have launched a Web site to oppose his decision.

The mayor, who chairs the board of the nonprofit foundation building the memorial, announced in December that the nearly 3,000 victims of the 2001 attack and the 1993 World Trade Center bombing would be grouped by the tower or plane in which they died, and he said first responders' companies would be listed.

Families that opposed the decision wanted to list their loved ones' ages, the ranks of first responders, the tower floors on which they died and the names of the companies in the trade center. A Web site launched last month has 18,000 signatures on an online petition, Sept. 11 family member Edie Lutnick said.

Spitzer said Tuesday: "It is something that we will try to work through at the right time and the right place and get to a resolution that satisfies everybody."

The governor intended to speak to Bloomberg and New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine about the names, Spitzer spokeswoman Jennifer Givner said later.

Bloomberg's office did not comment Tuesday. Last month, the mayor said of the issue: "You can't please everybody. I think the naming issue is something that has been decided."

After 9/11, Ailing Residents Find A Place To Turn (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

They say they suffer the same rasping cough, shortness of breath and gastrointestinal pains as thousands of rescue and recovery workers who fell ill from the dust and smoke at ground zero. They worry, as the others do, that the future may bring more health problems.

DOJ_NMG_0134526

Yet residents, workers and students who returned to Lower Manhattan after the Sept. 11 attack say that their medical problems have largely been overlooked as officials focus increasing attention on the responders who were more exposed to the hazards.

"Not to take anything from them, but everything has been concentrated on the fire, police and E.M.T. guys," said Agustin Chaves, who lives and works in an apartment building two blocks from the World Trade Center site. "Nobody has been helping regular working people."

Mr. Chaves, 53, developed asthma and severe acid reflux about a year and a half after Sept. 11, 2001. As his condition worsened, he tried to find out whether it was connected to the dust he had breathed in after the twin towers collapsed. Then last fall he heard that the city was giving millions of dollars to Bellevue Hospital Center to treat people excluded from other programs, like the one that monitors and treats recovery workers at Mount Sinai Medical Center.

Since that announcement in September, the number of people being treated at the W.T.C. Environmental Health Center at Bellevue Hospital has doubled to more than 900. Several hundred more people are on a waiting list, including many low-income residents of Chinatown and the Lower East Side, and immigrant workers without health insurance. And after Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg last week encouraged residents who might have been exposed to the dust to be checked by the clinic's specialists, the number of patients is expected to rise substantially.

Dr. Joan Reibman, a pulmonologist who directs the center, said that most of her patients had not been exposed to the dust as intensively as firefighters and workers who toiled on the debris pile, but that they might have been affected by the contaminated air nonetheless.

Doctors and scientists have not definitively linked the dust to serious illnesses like cancer. But certain symptoms of respiratory and gastrointestinal ailments have been strongly associated with exposure to the dust. Thousands of firefighters developed gastrointestinal problems and what has become known as World Trade Center cough; the seriousness of their symptoms was found to be related to how soon they arrived at ground zero after the towers collapsed. Medical studies have also shown that they suffered substantial losses in lung capacity after working at the site.

Testing done by the Fire Department is considered especially important because all firefighters undergo thorough physical examinations every year, making it possible to track with a degree of medical certainty illnesses that developed after 9/11.

Most other studies about exposure to trade center dust — for example, the World Trade Center Health Registry of 71,000 workers, residents and volunteers — have been based on people's own reporting of when an ailment began, and thus were less reliable indicators of a link between the dust and disease.

However, in the past year, both the federal and city governments have expanded monitoring and treatment programs for recovery workers and others, based on the premise that there is some association between the dust and those respiratory ailments.

An overwhelming majority of residents in Lower Manhattan have not developed any illnesses because of the dust, Dr. Reibman said. But whether some patients who have come in complaining of symptoms actually were reacting to the dust may be determined by looking at the extent of the dust exposure and the person's medical history.

While ground zero recovery operations ended in June 2002, dust could have remained in interior spaces and duct work in nearby office and apartment buildings far longer. In many buildings that were never thoroughly cleaned, that dust may still be present.

Dr. Reibman said it was possible that some clinic patients believed that their symptoms were associated with the dust even though there may not be a connection. As a doctor in a public hospital, she said that did not matter to her as long as those who were sick could be cared for.

But she said many of her patients do have "asthma-like symptoms that we're treating. And a small number have more complex diseases. Where you fall in that spectrum depends on exposure and susceptibility."

Most patients are treated with medication, though a few who develop more serious illnesses are hospitalized at Bellevue whether or not a specific link to trade center dust can be proved.

DOJ_NMG_0134527

The half-dozen examining rooms at the clinic have been serving a constant stream of patients since Mr. Bloomberg pledged $16 million over five years for the clinic to treat anyone who needs it without charge. Dr. Reibman has so far adopted a policy that accepts nearly everyone.

Many people, like Mr. Chaves, arrive at the clinic with worry in their eyes and asthma inhalers in their pockets. He is the resident superintendent of a condominium complex on Greenwich Street. When his building was engulfed by dust on Sept. 11, he was standing guard in the lobby and was covered in a layer of fine particles.

About 18 months later, Mr. Chaves started having trouble breathing and began to think that his symptoms were connected to the trade center dust. His family doctor could not pinpoint what was wrong even as his condition worsened. He was once athletic and agile, he said, a basketball-court terror his sons could not catch.

"Now I can barely run around with the grandchildren," he said.

All the apartments in his building were professionally cleaned several years ago. But he finds the dust — a toxic mixture of chemicals and concrete that scientists say can be as caustic as drain cleaner — when he has to work in spaces above ceiling tiles.

Most alarming, he said, is finding the fluffy, gray dust when he or his men are called to remove a balky air conditioner from its slot in the building wall.

"We pull it out of the wall," Mr. Chaves said, "and all the dust is still in there."

The Bellevue clinic, which he visits every few weeks, has its roots in an asthma clinic that Dr. Reibman started in 1991 to investigate why the city had some of the highest rates of the disease in the country.

In 2002, she collaborated with the State Department of Health on a survey of residents who lived within a mile of ground zero. The study, one of only a few to deal with the effect on residents, found that about 60 percent of the 2,812 residents who responded complained of coughing, wheezing or shortness of breath that began after the terror attack.

The study has limitations. Those who responded to the survey were not given physical examinations, nor were their medical records checked for pre-existing health problems. Their responses were based on their own estimations of when their symptoms began.

In the same 2002 study, in a control group of residents about five miles from ground zero, 20 percent reported similar symptoms, again based solely on their own recollections.

Dr. Reibman's asthma clinic became part of the city's overall public health response in the months after 9/11. But it played a relatively small role until Mr. Bloomberg sharply increased funding in response to community pressure and emerging medical issues among recovery workers and others.

This month Manuel S. Bruno, 82, had his first examination at the clinic after reading news articles that said firefighters and police officers were developing serious, and sometimes fatal, illnesses.

Mr. Bruno said that shortly after he and his wife cleaned ground zero dust from their apartment on the Lower East Side, he developed an eye infection and an unusual rash. He said his regular doctors dismissed any possible link to the dust, attributing the symptoms to his age. Now he said he is willing to undergo specialized tests that the clinic's doctors ordered because, whether they find a link to ground zero dust or not, "at least maybe they can help me."

Another recent patient, Miguel Lopez, 40, said he had felt awful since he worked several months for a company that cleaned the dust from office buildings in Lower Manhattan. Without health insurance, he struggled for years to find someone to treat his severe rash and muscle ache before he heard about the specialists at the Bellevue clinic in October.

Mr. Lopez said he wanted to return to Ecuador, his native country, but was afraid to do so until he knew more about his medical condition.

"If something happens in 5 to 10 years," he said, "I don't want to be in Ecuador."

Dr. Reibman recently added psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers to the clinic staff because so many of her patients also have stress-related symptoms, stemming in part from their concerns about medical problems that could develop.

She said she was so overwhelmed with new patients that she had not had the time or staff to conduct a follow-up to her 2002 residential survey. And she is likely to get even busier. Mr. Bloomberg, in describing the city's comprehensive plan for dealing with 9/11 health problems last week, said that the Bellevue clinic might need to care for as many as 12,000 patients.

DOJ_NMG_0134528

Dr. Reibman said she did not know the extent of the health problems among Lower Manhattan residents, or how much money would be needed for treatment. But she shares data with the Mount Sinai program and the Fire Department and hopes to reach conclusions about 9/11-related symptoms and treatment.

Meanwhile, officials from the federal Environmental Protection Agency have said that trade center dust poses little continuing danger to residents. Still, in December, the agency offered to test and clean apartments in Lower Manhattan. (To register, residents and building owners can call 1-888-747-7725.)

In 2004, residents, workers and students in Lower Manhattan filed a federal class action lawsuit against the E.P.A., its former administrator, Christie Whitman, and other federal officials, seeking a more thorough cleanup and an aggressive screening and treatment program.

The suit, which does not ask for individual monetary awards, claims that Ms. Whitman deliberately distorted information and put families at risk by encouraging them to return to apartments, schools and places of business before comprehensive tests of the air quality were available.

Last year, Judge Deborah A. Batts of Federal District Court in Manhattan said that Ms. Whitman's statements that the air downtown was safe to breathe were misleading and "conscience-shocking." She allowed portions of the suit against Ms. Whitman and the agency to go forward.

Screening For Unions (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Democrats figure they owe Big Labor for helping them take Congress, and now comes the payback. Tucked away in House and Senate bills that purport to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission is a provision that the Commission most assuredly did not recommend: collective bargaining rights for the Transportation Safety Administration's 43,000 airport screeners.

Congress created TSA in 2001 without union rights on common sense grounds that the agency overseeing airport security was more like the Defense Department than, say, Agriculture. Unionization, with its myriad work rules, would make it harder for the executive branch to hire, fire, train and reassign workers to best meet changing terrorist threats.

Democrats haven't stopped trying to overturn that decision, and in 2002 they forced a showdown with President Bush over union rights as part of creating the Department of Homeland Security. Mr. Bush opposed the effort by Senate Democrats who were then in the majority, and the dispute helped the GOP gain Senate seats that November. This may explain why Democrats are now trying to unionize TSA sotto voce, under the cover of 9/11 Commission "reforms," and so far the press corps has barely noticed.

The Bush Administration has caught on, however, and opposes the change in TSA rules. Democrats are betting the White House won't have the nerve to veto an otherwise popular, if ill-understood, bill over this single provision. Our guess is that if Mr. Bush did veto such a bill, he'd find public sympathy for an argument that he was protecting a vital national security function from being corrupted by union politics.

La. Levee Plan Leaves Some Helpless (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, February 21, 2007

VENICE, La. — State and federal plans for a massive hurricane protection bulwark for Louisiana would sacrifice dozens of coastal communities, some with thousands of residents, to the next Katrina-sized hurricane. The reason: Protecting them would cost too much.

"We believe that it's probably not possible to provide adequate protection that people should be living down there," says Randy Hanchey of the state's Department of Natural Resources, which drafted one of the plans. Even so, the state has not encouraged residents to move from those areas.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, ordered by Congress last year to design its own set of storm defenses, reached a similar conclusion, project manager Tim Axtman says. "The reality is, the cost of protection doesn't equate to what's there," he says.

If state and federal recommendations are adopted, places such as Venice, a riverbank town of about 2,000 people south of New Orleans, will be left with hurricane protections comparable to the levees they had before Hurricane Katrina swamped them. Venice was devastated by Katrina, a Category 3 storm that came ashore with winds of 127 mph. In most places, existing barriers could not defend against a similar strike today, says Andrew MacInnes, who manages coastal issues in Plaquemines Parish.

The state and federal plans are due to be turned over to lawmakers this year. Together, they will recommend stringing hundreds of miles of fortified levees across the Louisiana coast and restoring or protecting vast stretches of fast-disappearing coastal wetlands, creating defenses around New Orleans and other populated areas that could withstand a storm more powerful than Katrina.

Final costs haven't been tallied, but Hanchey and Axtman each say the work will easily top $30 billion.

Most of the places that would be outside the new barriers are rural towns slung along the few remaining patches of high ground near the receding coast. A draft of the state's plan released this month shows new levees would exclude areas that were home to more than 20,000 people before hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit.

"We know they need to draw a line somewhere," MacInnes says. "But here?"

Efforts to rebuild those areas will be undermined if the government can't deliver better defenses against the next storm, says Lynda Banta, a councilwoman in coastal Plaquemines Parish. The area is still dotted with government-issued travel trailers. "People feel like they've been pushed under the rug — like the government doesn't want us to go back," she says.

Axtman says engineers are concerned that defending small coastal towns would siphon resources from bigger cities where more people are at risk. He says building bigger levees closer to the coast could increase the power with which storms can hit places such as New Orleans.

WAR NEWS:

Sen. Reid Discusses Iraq Troop Strategy (AP)

By Brendan Riley

AP, February 21, 2007

U.S. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid questioned Tuesday whether word of a possible British troop withdrawal from Iraq would pressure President Bush into changing his war strategy, and said Senate Democrats will move ahead with their own efforts to limit the president's authority.

Asked about the impact of a possible announcement by Prime Minister Tony Blair of a new troop withdrawal timetable, Reid, D-Nev., said he doubted whether "it would make too much difference" for Bush.

"Well, in the past they've ignored everybody. So they might must ignore him too," Reid said. "Realistically it will give those of us who believe the course in Iraq is headed in the wrong direction ... more confidence that what we're doing is the right thing to do."

Reid also said Senate Democrats may move ahead on Monday with an effort to limit the 2002 measure authorizing Bush's use of force in Iraq. That move is planned despite a warning from Senate Republicans that it's certain to be vetoed and the veto would be upheld.

The new move follows a failed weekend effort by Democrats who control the Senate to force debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's deployment of 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq.

The 56-34 vote fell four short of the 60 needed, but Reid said the vote still showed a majority of senators voted against the escalation.

Reid also repeated his statement that Iraq "is the worst foreign policy blunder in the history of our country." He said the war can't be won militarily, and what's needed is a political and regional solution that involves those with "a larger stake in the neighborhood," including Iran.

Reid, in Carson City for a forum of most Democratic presidential candidates, also said he's not favoring any candidate at this point. He added it's "not the easiest thing to say" to the candidates — other than Hillary Clinton — that his son, Rory Reid, has signed on as her Nevada chairman.

"I can't put numbers on who's No. 1, No. 2, who's going to win. I'm going to stay neutral on this," Reid said, when asked about the decision by his son, a former state Democratic Party chairman and currently chairman of the Clark County Commission.

Reid also declined to criticize U.S. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who was one of several Republican senators not present for the weekend vote on Iraq.

"You haven't heard about our pact" to keep their differences out of the public, said Reid. "It's still there."

Reid commented at a news conference held prior to an address to the Nevada Legislature.

For Democrats, War Is Front And Center (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

CARSON CITY, NEV. — The Democrats seeking the White House may be united in opposing the war in Iraq. But that hasn't stopped them from fighting over the conflict.

It is a skirmish over judgment, character and political mettle.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois stresses his opposition to the invasion from the start and says those who voted to authorize the war, only to come around later, are at least partly to blame for today's problems. It shows, Obama says, the decision-making capacity each candidate would bring to the White House.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has apologized for his initial war vote, suggests Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has been too measured in her opposition. Implicit is the notion that a calculating front-runner has shaped her views more out of political consideration than principle.

Clinton has sharpened her tone and stepped up her antiwar rhetoric, but has not apologized for her initial stance on the war. Take it or leave it, she says, telling voters she would not make the same decision today but acted on the best information at the time.

That the war is front and center in the Democratic primary, as it was in 2004, is hardly surprising. Congress has spent weeks focused on the issue, and grim news from Iraq dominates the headlines. "Nothing is more central or important to the American public than what's going on in Iraq, period," said Peter Hart, a veteran Democratic pollster who is neutral in the party's primary.

A national survey released last week by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center found that support for the war continues to decline, with 53% of Americans believing the U.S. should bring its troops home as soon as possible. Opposition is even fiercer among Democrats — 83% in the Pew poll said things in Iraq were not going well and more than six in 10 said the U.S. mission there would definitely or probably fail. That is the audience Democrats are playing to in Iowa, New Hampshire and on Jay Leno's "Tonight Show," where former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack drew a burst of applause last week with his call to cut off funding for the war.

"People don't want political spin. They want someone decisive, someone who tells the truth," said Craig Varoga, a strategist for Vilsack. (The ex-governor has emerged as one of the most assertive antiwar critics, bringing to mind a similar long-shot candidate four years ago.) "If you flunk the No. 1 issue of our era by treating it as a political Rubik's Cube … you flunk the principal character issue of what it is to run for president."

Never mind that the differences among the major Democratic contenders are largely a matter of degree. All of them oppose an increase in U.S. troops. By contrast, the top Republican candidates have given President Bush their qualified support. And while the Democrats offer different timetables and exit strategies, each of them wants to reduce U.S. involvement in Iraq sooner rather than later.

"The truth is we're in a primary contest," said Mark Mellman, a 2004 strategist for Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, who, like Kerry, is sitting out this race. "A lot of times the goal is to magnify small differences into giant divides."

The leading Democratic contenders — all save Obama, who is campaigning in Iowa — will be in Carson City today for the first Western forum of the 2008 presidential campaign. The session in Nevada's pint-size capital is supposed to focus on working families and the food-on-the-table issues they face. But even if the candidates stray from those topics, there will be little chance for give-and-take on the war or any other subject.

The candidates will appear sequentially over two hours, fielding questions from ABC's George Stephanopolous. They will not share the stage, but have been invited to pose for a group photo. (Only Democrats will participate in the labor-sponsored event, held with an eye on the Nevada caucuses set for mid-January. Republicans have yet to settle on their nominating calendar.)

Four years ago, former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean used his vociferous antiwar position to launch himself from back in the Democratic pack and, for a time, emerge as the front-runner for the nomination. Dean surged not just because of his blunt talk on Iraq but also because he gave voice to the anger of many Democrats who thought the party had lost its spine after losing the 2000 campaign.

Winning back control of Congress might have taken some of the edge off that anger. But plenty of people in the party, especially activists, view Iraq as a test of a candidate's toughness — not as a potential commander in chief, but a partisan warrior. That too is driving the war debate among Democrats.

"There is a very significant part of the base that thought the party was too accommodating and too willing to capitulate to Bush, and the war was the prime symbol of that," Mellman said. In that sense, he said, the parsing of positions on Iraq reflects a larger debate "over the kind of Democratic Party one wants to see."

Of course, Dean's candidacy faded and Iraq receded as a voting issue in the 2004 primary. All of the leading Democratic presidential hopefuls converged in roughly the same place, criticizing Bush and the war.

Many expect the same thing to happen this time. They don't minimize the war — it may be the paramount issue facing the next president. But they say Democrats are, in a literal sense, playing to the crowds that are turning out for events at this early stage of the race.

"The people out there now are among the top [percent] of voters who will actually go the polls in January," said Dante Scala, a political scientist at New Hampshire's St. Anselm College. "A lot of them are motivated by single issues, especially the war, and you just have to wonder whether most voters who turn out are going to have that same concern."

For now, however, no truce is in sight.

Former Admiral Says All American Forces Should Pull Out By Year's End (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - After the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, U.S. Adm. Joe Sestak commanded a carrier battle group in combat near Afghanistan, then in the Persian Gulf in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Now a freshman member of the House of Representatives, Sestak, a Pennsylvania Democrat, has introduced a bill calling for withdrawing all American forces from Iraq by the end of this year, while strengthening the U.S. military presence in the region and in Afghanistan.

Sestak, who defeated 10-term Republican incumbent Curt Weldon in November, has a Ph.D. in political economy and government from Harvard University. He served as the director for defense policy on President Clinton's National Security Council and once was the director of the Navy's anti-terrorism unit.

His bill would cut off most money for military operations in Iraq by Dec. 31.

"I honestly believe that in the next few months we will move to this position," Sestak said in an interview. "It may not be my bill, but it will be something very similar."

The main reason, he said, is that the war in Iraq is hurting American national security: It's diverted resources and attention from the fight against terrorism in Afghanistan and from other challenges to U.S. interests around the world.

"We diverted our attention, our resources and our forces ... to Iraq," he said. "To my mind Afghanistan is the poster child for what isn't being done in this world where the real war on terrorism is elsewhere, not Iraq."

While focused on Iraq, he said, the military has been unable to move effectively from World War II-era tanks to 21st-century high-tech communication and intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0134532

Spending on the war also has diverted investment from what he calls three "pillars of national security": health, education and economic development at home.

He rejects the worst-case scenario arguments that Iraq will descend into genocide and a regional war if the United States leaves.

"It changes all the incentives," Sestak said of his withdrawal plan.

Iraqi sectarian leaders would realize that without the American military holding down the violence, "they would have to accept the consequences that if they go too far, the retaliation against them might go too far."

Iran and Syria want to see the United States bleed in Iraq, Sestak said. But once the United States is gone, they'd want to avoid getting into a proxy war. Moreover, mostly Shiite Muslim Iran doesn't want Sunni Muslim terrorists growing powerful next door, he said.

Sestak's bill calls for moving Iraq-based American forces to bases outside the country but nearby and to Afghanistan or other trouble spots and sending some home. A strong U.S. presence near Iraq would permit special forces to be sent in on counterterrorism missions or to support Iraqi forces from the air, he said. American efforts to rebuild Iraq's government and economy would shift to diplomacy.

Sestak said that what got him into politics wasn't Iraq but his little daughter, Alexandra, age 5, who was diagnosed with a malignant brain tumor in July 2005. She's doing well after surgeries and chemotherapy, and Sestak hopes that buys time until a cure is found.

The walls of Sestak's office are covered with his child's art. He wears her blue plastic bead bracelet. Life in the cancer ward, he said, made him realize that he was fortunate to have access to top care, and inspired him to ponder how to improve the nation's health system. When doctors advised him to resume a normal life, he opted for politics. He serves on health-related House subcommittees and on the Armed Services Committee.

Cheney: U.S. Won't Relent In Iraq War (AP)

By Eric Talmadge,

AP, February 21, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney reaffirmed the Bush administration's commitment to the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq during a visit to a U.S. aircraft carrier Wednesday, saying "the American people will not support a policy of retreat."

Cheney, who arrived in Japan on Tuesday, was given a 19-gun salute as he boarded the USS Kitty Hawk at this U.S. Navy base just south of Tokyo.

"We want to complete the mission, we want to get it done right, and then we want to come home, with honor," he told about 4,000 troops in the hangar bay.

Cheney said his brief visit to Japan was a gesture of appreciation for Tokyo, which has been one of Washington's most valuable allies in the war on terror.
